IOHN KIPLING,

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE FATHER OF ARTS AND ARMES, CHARLES LORD HOWARD, BARON OF EFFINGHAM, EARLE OF NOTTINGHAM, HIGH Conſtable of the Caſtle and Forreſt of Windſor, Lord Chiefe Iuſtice in Eyre of England, Gouernour and Captaine Generall of all her Maieſties maritime Forts and Caſtles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Suſſex and Surrey, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, and one of her Maieſties moſt honourable priuie Councell.

RIght Honourable, there is a ſaying in Zenophon moſt worthy the citing and inſight, that matters of worth and conſequence are both to be committed and commended to their truſt and protection, who know the waight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the ſame by Authority and Reaſon. For this cauſe and vpon this ground, I haue choſen your Honour out for a moſt noble Patron of this moſt famous and accompliſhed Hiſtorie of the Iewes: which (for dignity and antiquity of the ſubiect, the elegancie and purity of the ſtile, the choiſe proprietie and copie of words, the grauitie and variety of ſentences, the alterations and memorable euents; and laſtly, for the birth and dignity of the author) requireth a ſpirit of no leſſe wiſedome, courage, and nobility then your ſelfe, who haue power to defend, and knowledge to diſcerne the worth thereof. Vouchſafe therefore to leuell the eye of your eſteeme vpon the Center of this happy Hiſtory: and as Themiſtocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophees; and Alexander in ſeeing Achilles tombe, did grieuouſly ſigh with an honourable emulation: ſo let the zeale, magnanimity, and admirable conſtancy which euery where affronteth you in this Booke (and rauiſheth the beſt mindes from the boundleſſe troubles of this world, and draweth them into the contemplation of true perfection) ſo ſettle your honourable loue and affection to emulate the ſame, that as for glory in Armes; ſo for preſeruing and protecting Artes, you may outſtrip your competitors, and amaze too curious expectation. And in mine opinion the time challengeth no leſſe at your hands: for as your tranſcendent dignity and courage hath returned vs a happy harueſt in our expected and long poſſeſſed peace, as by your ſecond care and diligence next vnder her ſacred Maieſtie, we all reape the fruit and felicity of bleſſed abundance: ſo by your example in reading and reſpecting both learning and the learned, you ſhall pull downe that Babel, which confuſed ignorance hath raiſed to ouer-reach induſtrie; yea you ſhall ſtrengthen the weakened ability of learning, which (alas the while) is now-adaies like a commodity without requeſt ſcarce ſaleable by the hands of a cunning broker. Nothing is more worth money, and leſſe in requeſt: onely the worlds blinde creatures as S. Hierom tearmeth them) the vnlettered, take delight in their errors, whoſe writings (as Plutarch ſpeaketh of Ariſtophanes poeme) are written for no moderate mans pleaſure. Let therefore your vpright eſtimation of this worke (moſt noble Earle) awaken the dead deuotion of ſuch as contemne Artes; and let no ſuch corrupt drones (as made ſale of ſinfull thoughts for good marchandiſe) buz about the hiue of true ſcience: But as Emperors, Kings, and Princes haue euer in their Greeke, Italian and French, with a reſpectiue acceptance, and bountifull hand, entertained this Hiſtory; ſo let this tranſlation of Ioſephus which courteth you now in Engliſh, be accepted at your hands, and countenanced by your Honour: for whoſe vnconfined felicity both I and other of my name haue euer prayed, and will neuer ceaſe to ſtudy.

Your Honours vnfainedly deuoted,

THOMAS LODGE.

TO THE COVRTEOVS Reader, as touching the vſe and abuſe of Hiſtorie.

IF Hiſtory were as eaſily conceited and made vſe of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the gouernment of mans life; I ſhould hold it no ſin, ſo preciſely to preſcribe a limitation and bound, to ſuch as ſhould enter the Liſt, and conſult with example; for what more pleaſing to our ſelues, or profitable for ſocieties could euer befall vs, then in this Theater of mans life, (wherein Hiſtory affordeth all ſorts of Actors) to ſit and learne preuention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wiſe by forrain wrecks? All which being traduced to our priuate vſe, we may either as partners in what we haue paſt, or obſeruers of future caſualties, by precedent euents, tye ages to our memories; and preuenting our eſcapes, by ſuruey of other mens repentance, briefely beget experience by ſight, or foreſight of worldly caſualties, and forme a mirror of fore-paſſed errors, to fore-iudge our future calamities. But for that it behoueth vs to enter this worldly Academy, the more prepared, the more that Hiſtory is fraught and fulfilled with plentifull fruit: and whereas the difficulty and difference is alike, to yeeld an vpright verdict both of a mans owne, and other mens life; neither may any man rightly examine another (how wiſe ſoeuer he be) except in equall ballance he weigh his owne imperfections; it muſt neceſſarily follow on both ſides, that with the more wiſedome, and the greater obſeruation we ought to entertaine Hiſtory, leſt our mind like the winde ſhould wander vncertainly, and our deuotion ſhould preuent our reſolution; our eſteeme, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furniſhed and affluent banquet; although ſome things, (and they to few men) ſeeme pleaſant, otherſome to other are without taſte and ſeeme tart, and euery one iudgeth his meate not by proofe, but by the palate; yet notwithſtanding there is a certaine meane, which either Natures ordinary, or the refined kind of nutriment (being ſimple and incorrupt) hath faſhioned and fixed for moſt apteſt for the body; from which, whoſoeuer varieth, or either beyond meaſure, or without iudgement, followeth his fooliſh appetite, in glutting himſelfe beyond diſcretion, reapeth more incommodity then pleaſure by theſe pleaſures: So in the diuerſity of mans life, although 1000. formes, 1000. ſimilitudes be offered, and that euery man faſhioneth other mens maners to his mind, yet there is but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whoſoeuer tracteth with iudgement, doth truly know the vſe of life; whereas they that ſit in a plentifull banquet, in affecting all things, can make vſe of nothing. Now, how many are there, I pray you, that in reſpect of either of their own, or other mens acts and words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choiſe in iudging minds, than meates, and that in this matter ſeemeth not ſufficiently inſtructed? Wherein I wonder that men eſpie not their errors, whereas they imagine that Hiſtory is the inſtructor of ſuch as read the ſame; whereas it onely yeeldeth matter of inſtruction, euen as the banquet miniſtreth meat according to euery mans affection. Some therefore are ſeduced with the ſweetnes of the Stile, and in ſeeking their pleaſure, loſe their profit; who reape no other fruit of Hiſtory, then to beguile time, and beget officious idlenes, laughing away houres, and nouriſh repent: others in reading glory, hunt it in a ſhadow, where if they could make vſe of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aſpire to true glory without true vertue, neither no wiſe man will hope further: yet ſee we many men, that becauſe they haue read many excellent workes, will be Capricious and pretend wiſedome; reſembling thoſe tragedians, who will, after they haue diſcharged themſelues of their parts and apparell

wherein they counterfaited the Emperour, yet retaine his Royall and Princely manners: Some triuiall and light witted, that made an Eclipſe of a ſhadow, make more of the embleme, then the worke; the habit then the Doctor: ſo admirable effects worketh Hiſtory in mens mindes. Now whereas it is the moſt exact and chiefeſt intent of Hiſtory to awaken mens idleneſſe, and arme them againſt caſualties, and the whole bent of example hath no othrr iſſue; it falleth out through mens ſecurity (who ſuppoſe that their neighbours perils concerne them not) that whatſoeuer is of note, is ouerſlipt with a deafe and ſleeping iudgement, and things that memory ſhould beſt loue, are loſt in her. To conclude, there are ſome that will haue euery mans ſhooe fitted on their owne Laſt, and tye all mens pennes to their owne pleaſures: For which cauſe, partly by reaſon of this ſecret, partly through this ill ordered, confuſed and raſh method of reading, as of corrupt humours, ſo is there growne a certaine [illegible] of iudgement and reſolution: and as in temperate bodies, meate yeeldeth very little profit; ſo reape they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maiſt eaſily conceiue, how a Hiſtory ought to be read: how mens liues ought in themſelues be examined: finally how equall a proportion is required in both. And truly in my opinion, the chiefeſt ground of this difficulty, is the peruerſeneſſe of our iudgements: which is the cauſe, we the rather reſpect our owne inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no leſſe miſery then the former, that ſuch as write, ſet downe ſuch things as are acted, not onely for our profit ſake, but to feede their owne humours: and like to certaine Architects (by interpoſing their iudgements) do vainly praiſe ſome things, ſuppoſing that our imitation ſhould be tied to their pleaſure; where if they performed what they ought to doe, the Reader ſhould encounter with no ſuch diſtractions: but now, in like manner as Cookes, who rather reſpect their maſters pleaſurable taſte, then his profit; would God the Hiſtoriographer did not affect flattery. It therefore appeareth, that in two ſorts (firſt in our owne iudgement; and next, to the preiudice of thoſe that write) we are circumuented; in that they ſet not downe ſuch euents as paſſe, in their owne nature and as they are. For he that writeth an Hiſtory, is the interpretour of thoſe things that are paſt: whoſe iudgement being depraued, it fareth with them as with the pureſt and moſt richeſt wine, which waxeth muſtie by reaſon of that veſſell wherin it is inclozed, or is by ſophiſtication corrupted: which is the greateſt folly, and moſt intolerable deceit that may befall men. They therfore, who negligently vndertake a Hiſtory, (or ſuppoſe that life were to be paſt raſhly, and without an exact obſeruance of all offices) are no leſſe deceiued then certaine countrey peſants in the laſt troubles of France (of whoſe folly I drew ſome example) who attempting and entring vpon a city not farre off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries ſhop furniſhed with all kind of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleaſure, odours and delight of the confections they taſted; and ſuppoſing all to be of the ſame kind, deuoured, taſted, and ſwallowed downe euery thing: whereupon ſome fell ſicke of feauers, ſome grew phrenſie, and many loſt their liues to pleaſe their appetites; at leaſtwiſe, he that ſcaped beſt, gaue occaſion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, ſo Hiſtory (the image of life) is fraught with pleaſure, and diſpleaſure; and onely in the vſe of life, the wiſedome of life conſiſteth. Farewell: vſe this, and my ſelfe, as two twinnes borne for thy profit.

Thine, THOMAS LODGE.

The Iewes haue two ſorts of yeers: the Politique ſort, which beginneth in September; and the Sacred or Eccleſiaſtique, which beginneth in March.

They haue twelue Moneths or Moones, euery third yeere hath a thirteenth Moneth of 22. daies, and the fourth yeere hath a thirteenth moneth of 23. dayes.

Before the Captiuity of Babylon, they accounted the moneths ſucceſſiuely by 1. 2, 3, &c. ſince their returne they haue named them rather after the manner of the Chaldees then Hebrewes.

For

For the better vnderſtanding of the Coines and Meaſures, whereof there is ſome mention made in this Hiſtory; obſerue I pray you that which followeth.

SAth was a meaſure containing about ſome ſeuen pintes French.
The Epha contained three Saths.
The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to ſay thirty Saths, and was the ſame meaſure both in drie and liquid things.
The Log contained a French meaſure.
The Hin contained twelue Logs.
The Bath contained as much as the Epha.
The Cad was a kinde of pitcher containing ſuch a quantity as a young maiden might well carry.
The common Sicle contained the waight of foure ounces, whether it were of gold, ſiluer, or of any other metall.
The ſacred or holy Sicle waighed halfe an ounce of any metall whatſoeuer.
The common Sicle of ſiluer was valued at about ſome ſhilling of our money.
The holy Sicle of ſiluer was valued at about ſome two ſhillings.
The common Drachme was the eighth part of an ounce.
The ſacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.
The pound waighed twelue ounces.
The ordinary Talent contained fifty foure pounds, eight ounces, and a quarter of Troy waight in any metall: yet was it not currant money, but a maſſe made vp after the manner of an ingot.
The ſacred Talents contained one hundreth pounds.
Furthermore, note this for your better knowledge, that when as Ioſephus quoteth the Olympiades without any ſpecification of the yeeres therein contained, hee ordinarily comprehendeth the ſpace of foure yeeres compleat.
Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath diuers ſignifications amongſt both Greeks and Latins (as the controuerſie betweene Plinie and Diodorus Siculus may well teſtifie) and for that diuers of our Engliſh tranſlators haue ſometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong; I pray you in reading this Hiſtory, whereas any of theſe words occurre, ſuppoſe them for one and the ſame meaſure of ground, and according to the Greeks account, (which I ſuppoſe Ioſephus moſt reſpected in this Hiſtory) conclude it to be either of 600. foote as the Olympique, that is of 120. paſes, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foote, that is 200. paſes. As for the Furlong, either multiply him 8. times to make him a Stade, or as an ouerſight in the printing, let it paſſe with the Errata.

Franciſ. Patritius de Regno, lib. 2. cap. 10.

Hiſtoriarum cognitio Regibus, Ducibus, Imperatoribus & omnibus Principibus perquam neceſſaria habenda eſt: quam Cicero appellat Teſtem temporum, vitæ Magiſtram, veram memoriæ & veritatis Nunciam.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE MOST ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE IEWES: WRITTEN BY IOSEPH THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS.

A moſt excellent Preface, containing the cauſes which induced the Author to write this Hiſtorie, together with the contents and intents of the ſame.

CHAP. I.

THEY that indeauour themſelues to write Hiſtories, ſeeme not (in my opinion) to haue one and the ſame intent and motiue, but diuers and very different cauſes of their labours: for ſome of them are addicted to this ſtudy, vnder pretence to exemplifie their eloquence, and vnder hope to purchaſe glory thereby; otherſome to the end to giue them content, whoſe worthy actions they couch and commend in their writings, haue intermitted no time, nor (to their power) ſpared to labour. Some there are that hauing beene preſent in perſon, and eye-witneſſes in the execution of great affaires, haue neceſſarily beene inforced to reduce and digeſt the ſame in writing: neither wanted there ſome, who ſeeing occurrences of high and neceſſary conſequence (which otherwiſe had beene buried in ignorance) haue beene incited (in reſpect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publiſhing thereof: now of theſe forenamed cauſes, the two laſt are they that incited me to the like. For the warre which wee had with the Romanes, and the accidents and iſſues on both parts, (all which in perſon I beheld, and to my perill I haue learned) doe compell mee to declare the ſame; and the rather, for that there are ſome, who in their writings, haue depraued, and peruerted the truth. I haue therefore taken this worke in hand, for that in my opinion, the knowledge thereof will be both pleaſing and profitable to the Græcians: for it ſhall containe the antiquity of our whole Nation, their forme of Common-weale, both tranſlated and gathered out of the Antiquities and Chronicles of the Hebrews. Truth it is, that heretofore and at ſuch time alſo as I compoſed the Hiſtory of the foreſaid warre, I had proiected and purpoſed with my ſelfe, to lay open to the world, how and whence the Iewes had their firſt originall, what alterations in fortune they had falne into, by what Law-maker they had beene inſtructed in pietie, and incited to the exerciſe of vertue: how many warres haue they ſuſtained by long and diuers times, and finally how againſt their will they haue beene intangled in this laſt warre, which they waged againſt the Romanes. But for that the content of this matter, was too ample and copious, I haue ſeparated it apart, aſſigning thereunto this treatiſe accompliſhed from the beginning euen to the end: afterwards in proceſſe of time (as it vſually hapneth to thoſe that attempt matters of mighty conſequence) I was ſurprized with a certaine delay and ſlothfulneſſe, that withdrew me from the tranſlation of ſo waighty a matter, in an vnfamiliar and forraine language. Yet ſome there were, who inflamed with a deſire of knowledge, animated me in this action; and eſpecially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured red of all learning, and who in eſpeciall, tooke it for a pleaſure, to take knowledge of the di- G uers occurrences of Common-weales: as he that had beene agent, in diuers affaires of importance, and ſundry accidents, in all which he hath ſhewed a maruellous magnanimitie of courage, with an vnmooueable reſolution to follow vertue. Being thus perſwaded by him, who is accuſtomed to incourage thoſe vnto good actions, whom hee perceiueth to be apt and prepared to performe things profitable and honeſt: and (that which is more) being aſhamed in my ſelfe, that I ſhould rather take delight to follow idleneſſe, than addict my ſelfe to any laudable exerciſe; I inforced my ſelfe more couragiouſly then beforetime; and (beſides all that which hath bin ſpoken) I haue effectually conſidered with my ſelfe, that our anceſtors haue thought good to communicate and publiſh the knowledge of our Hiſtories to the Grecians, H if ſo be that any of them were curious to vnderſtand the ſame. I haue found therefore that Pto- lomey King of Ægypt the ſecond of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and deſirous to ſtore and gather bookes) was earneſtly deſirous, that our law and the rules thereof, and the preſcript forme of our liuing ſhould bee tranſlated into the Greeke tongue. And as touching the high Prieſt Eleazar (who hath not beene ſecond in vertue to any other whatſoeuer) he re-fuſed not to make the ſaid King partaker of the effect of his deſire: to which hee had wholly contradicted, had it not beene the ordinary courſe of our anceſtors, not to conceale from other men, what thing ſoeuer was honeſt. For which cauſe I haue held it a matter no waies vndecent for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that ſame great ſacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (onely in as much as concerned learning) I ſuppoſed many alſo to bee no leſſe I affected to good letters then the King: for he vndertooke not to haue all the writings which we had, but thoſe tranſlators who were ſent vnto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that vnto him which was in our law. But thoſe things that are found written in the ſacred bookes of holy Scripture are infinite, being ſuch as containe in them, the Hiſtorie of fiue thouſand yeeres: in which diuers vnexpected chances, ſundry fortunes of warre, and many changes of politike eſtates are diſcouered. In ſumme, if any one haue a deſire to read this Hiſtory, hee ſhall principally learne and apprehend, that all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation to thoſe men, who obſerue the will of God, and are afraide to tranſgreſſe the lawes of his Commandements; and that God hath prepared for ſuch the Crown & reward of felicitie.

Contrariwiſe, if they ſhall depart from the diligent obſeruance thereof, that which is eaſie K ſhall be made impoſſible, and their endeuours in their opinion good, ſhall end in incurable calamities. For which cauſe I exhort all thoſe that ſhall reade theſe bookes, to fixe their mind vpon God, and that they approoue our Law-maker, if (as it worthily deſerued) he hath conſi-dered the diuine Nature; and attributed to the ſame ſuch actions as are alwaies agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanity of fables, wherewith others are poiſoned: although in reſpect of the length of time, and the antiquity of things, he might without controle faine and imagine whatſoeuer vanities: for he was borne more then two thouſand yeeres agoe, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durſt re-ferre the originall of their gods; neither the deeds or lawes of men, whereof they make mention. But in purſuit of our Hiſtory, the ſequel of our diſcourſe, ſhall declare all things exactly, L and in conuenient order. For in compiling this worke, I haue promiſed to adde nothing, neither to pretermit any thing: and for that all whatſoeuer we ſhall declare, doth almoſt wholly depend on the wiſedome of our Law-maker Moſes; it is neceſſary before all other things, that I ſpeake ſomewhat of himſelfe, leſt perhaps any man ſhould wonder how this labour hauing beene enterpriſed, to diſcouer the words and workes of certaine perſons, is alſo imployed for the greateſt part in deſcribing and diſcouering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moſes thought it moſt eſpecially neceſſary, either for him that will rightly diſpoſe his life, or impoſe lawes to other men, that firſt and in eſpeciall he haue the knowledge of the nature of God; to the end that conceiuing in his minde the greatneſſe of his workes; hee might as much as in him lyeth, imitate his moſt vnequall example; and follow him with M all diligence. For it is impoſſible, that a law-maker being voide of this contemplation, ſhould haue good ſenſe; or that his writings ſhould be of any moment to induce them vnto vertue, who ſhould receiue thoſe lawes, except before all things they ſhould learne, that God who is the Father and Lord of all, and that ſeeth all, giueth happy life vnto thoſe that follow him; and contrariwiſe inuironeth them with great calamities, who forſake the way of vertue and righte-ouſneſſe. Moſes therefore intending to inſtruct his Citizens in this doctrine, began not his ordinances with the treatiſe of contracts, and couenants, which we practiſe one with another, as

A other law-makers were accuſtomed to do:but he hath lifted their ſpirits on high,to the end they might think on God,and on the ornament of this world made by him,perſwading that the moſt accompliſhed worke among all thoſe things which God had made in the world,was the creation of vs men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety;then might he more eaſily perſwade them in the reſt: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themſelues vnto fables,haue in their diſcourſe impoſed on their gods the infamy of ſins committed by men,and by that meanes haue brought to paſſe,that the wicked ſort are yet more wicked and addicted to euill doing. But as touching our Law-maker,after he had declared that God had in himſelfe all vertue pure and vnſpotted,he hath thought good that men alſo ſhould endeuour themſelues to be partakers of the ſame,and on thoſe that neither conceiue nor beleeue thoſe things,he inflicteth
B a grieuous and inexorable puniſhment: I exhort the Reader therefore to examine our writings according to this Maxime: for to thoſe that conſider after this manner, nothing ſhall ſeeme either abſurd,or vnworthy the magnificence of God;by reaſon that all things haue their diſpoſition conformable to the vniuerſall nature, which our law-maker hath declared ſometimes obſcurely,ſometimes in conuenient allegories grauely; and otherwiſe expreſſing that manifeſtly, and publiſhing that in plaine words,which he ought openly to make knowne. The cauſes whereof if any man would ſearch, he might find a moſt deepe and very Philoſophicall contemplation; which I ouerſlip at this preſent,without longer ſtaying thereon: but if God ſhall giue me time, I will inforce my ſelfe to compoſe it in a volume, as ſoone as I ſhall haue finiſhed this worke. For this preſent then I will apply my ſelfe, to expoſe thoſe things which haue beene
C done,beginning at the creation of the world,according as Moſes hath ſpoken, and I haue found it written in the holy Scriptures,which teſtifie and intreat to this effect as followeth.

CHAP. II.

The Creation of the World.

IN the beginning God created heauen and earth. Now the earth, not being ſubiect to ſight, but couered with thicke darkeneſſe, and trauerſed with an aire comming from high: God commanded that there ſhould be light;and after the light was made,hauing conſidered the vniuerſall matter, he ſeparated the light from the darkeneſſe, and na-
D med the darkneſſe Night,and the light Day;calling the Morning the beginning of the day, and the Euening the time wherein we ceaſe from trauell,and this was the firſt day which Moſes in his language called a day, whereof at this preſent I could giue a ſufficient reaſon: but for that in a particular diſcourſe I haue promiſed to write the generall cauſes of all;I will referre the declaration therof,to his conuenient time and place. After this, the ſecond day,he placed the heauen aboue all the world, and hauing ſeparated it from other things, he thought good to giue it a place apart; and making it firme by the meanes of a Chryſtalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moiſt and rainy,and did harmoniouſly accord the earth with it,to the end the increaſe thereof ſhould be watered by deawes. The third day, he firmely eſtabliſhed the earth,ſpreading the Sea round about the ſame; and the ſame day, he with a word cauſed all plants and ſeeds to E ſpring vpon the face of the earth. The fourth day, he embelliſhed the heauens with the Sunne, the Moone and the Starres,ordaining them their motions and courſes by which the ſeaſons orderly enſuing,might be diſtinguiſht. In the fift day,he made all kinde of liuing creatures which dwell vpon the face of the earth, as well they that ſwim in the deepeſt waters, as thoſe that flie in the aire; vniting them together by couples and paires, to the end that each in their kinde, might increaſe and multiply. The ſixt day, he made all foure-footed beaſts, and diſtinguiſht them into male and female: and in the ſame day, he formed man. So that Moſes ſaith, that the world and all that is therein was made in ſixe whole dayes, and that on the ſeuenth day, God tooke reſt and ceaſed from his labours. By reaſon whereof we likewiſe deſiſt from trauell on F that day,which we call Sabbath, which is to ſay, Repoſe.

After the ſeuenth day, Moſes began to deſcribe the originall of man, and the manner of his Creation in theſe tearmes: God framed man of the duſt of the earth, and powred into him a ſpirit and ſoule, which man was called Adam, an Hebrew word ſignifying ruddy, becauſe hee was made of earth, tempered with red or yellow: for the earth which is rightly called a virgin, that is to ſay,earth not remoued but elementary, is of that colour. Then brought God all kinde of liuing creatures before Adam, ſhewing him as well the male as the female: on whom Adam beſtowed thoſe names, which to this preſent time they retaine. And ſeeing that Adam had no

female to accompany and liue with him(for as yet there was no woman) & for that he thought G it ſtrange that all other liuing creatures had their companions: God tooke one of his ribs from him at ſuch time as he ſlept, and of the ſame he formed a woman; who being brought before Adam,he did acknowledge that ſhe was made for him.Now in Hebrew a woman is called Iſha, but this was called Eua,which is as much to ſay,as the mother of all liuing creatures.He declareth alſo,that God planted in the Eaſt a garden,flouriſhing and adorned with all ſorts of plants, amongſt which was the tree of life, and another the tree of intelligence,by which was knowne both good and euill. And after he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to keepe and cheriſh the plants.Now this garden is watred by a riuer that inuironeth the whole earth,wch diuideth it ſelfe into 4.chanels or riuers. That which is called Phiſon H (which name ſignifieth abundance or multitude)floweth by the land of India, and entreth into the great ſea,and is by the Greekes called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tigris, they flow into the red ſea. Euphrates is called Phora (that is to ſay,diſperſion or flower.) Tigris is called Diglat(which ſignifieth ſtreight and ſwift.) Gehon runneth by the country of Ægypt, and ſignifieth as much as comming from the Eaſt:the Greekes call it Nilus. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eate of the fruites of all other plants, and that they ſhould abſtaine from that of ſcience; telling them,that at what time ſoeuer they ſhould taſte of the ſame, they ſhould die the death. Whereas then at that time,all liuing creatures were at accord one with another; the Serpent conuerſing with Adam and his wife,was inflamed with enuy, for that he ſaw they ſhould be happy, if they continued in the obſeruation of Gods commandements: and that con- I trariwiſe,they ſhould caſt themſelues headlong into ruine & deſtruction,if they ſhould diſobey the ſame. He therefore malicioufly perſwaded the woman,to taſte the fruit of the tree of intelligence,giuing her to vnderſtand,that the knowledge of good and euil was in the ſame;and that as ſoone as they had taſted therof,they ſhould lead a life no leſſe happy then Gods: and by this meanes he cauſed the woman to fall,which tooke no regard of the ordinance of God. For hauing her ſelfe taſted of this fruit,and finding it pleaſant and delicious in taſte,ſhe perſwaded her husband alſo to taſte the ſame:at which time they vnderſtood that they were naked,and ſought meanes to couer themſelues: (for this fruit had in it ſelfe, the vertue to giue vnderſtanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then couered they themſelues with fig leaues; which they put before their priuities, eſteeming themſelues more happy then they were before, in that they had K found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who beforetime was accuſtomed familiarly to talke with him) finding himſelfe guiltie of ſinne, hid himſelfe from his preſence: but God wondring hereat, asked him for what cauſe hee fled and ſhunned him at that time, whereas beforetime he had taken pleaſure to talke familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had tranſgreſſed the ordinances and commandements of God, anſwered him not a word, but God ſpake vnto him after this manner: I had prouided for you the meanes whereby you might haue led your life without ſufferance of any euill, or ſenſe of any miſery: ſo that all whatſoeuer was requiſite for neceſſitie or pleaſure, might happen of it ſelfe vnto you, by my onely prouidence, without any trauell or care on your parts; which if you had well vſed, age had not ſo ſoone ouertaken you, but that you might haue liued many L yeeres: but thou haſt ſcorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandements. For in that thou art ſilent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of euill; of which thou findeſt thy ſelfe culpable: wherefore both old age ſhall quicklier come vpon thee,and the daies of thy life ſhall be ſhortned. Adam excuſed his ſinne, and required at Gods hands, that hee would not bee incenſed againſt him, laying the fault of that which had hapned, on his wife,alleadging that he had offended by reaſon he was ſuborned by her: and the woman accuſed the Serpent. But at that time God puniſhed him, becauſe he had ſuffered himſelfe to be ouercome by the counſell of a woman; that the earth thence-forward neuer more of her owne accord ſhould bring foorth fruite: but that when they had trauailed and almoſt deuoured themſelues in labour, it ſhould ſometimes giue them foode, and at other times refuſe to ſuſtaine them. M And as touching Eue, hee chaſtiſed her with child-bearing, and throes in trauell; for that being her ſelfe deceiued by the Serpent, ſhee had drawne her husband by the ſame meanes into extreme miſerie. Hee tooke alſo from the Serpent his voice, and was diſpleaſed againſt him, * by reaſon of the malice hee had conceiued againſt Adam, and he put venome on his tongue, declaring him an enemie both to man and woman; whom hee commanded to bruiſe the head of the Serpent,as well for that the euill which chanced vnto men, conſiſted in the head, as alſo in that being aſſaulted in that part,he is moſt eaſily done to death. CHAP. III.

BVt Adam and Eue had two male children, the firſt wherof was called Cain (which ſignifieth acquiſition, and the ſecond was called Abel (which is as much to ſay as mourning) they had alſo daughters. Theſe brothers addicted themſelues each one of them
B to their particular exerciſes. Abel the younger honored iuſtice, & (ſuppoſing that God was preſent in all his actions) hee alwayes and wholly fixed his thoughts on vertue: and his exerciſe was keeping of ſheepe. But Cain (being the wickedeſt man amongſt men, and addicted to vnſatiable deſire of profit) was he that firſt found out the vſe of the Plough, and who killed his brother for the cauſe which inſueth. Hauing concluded among themſelues to ſacrifice vnto God, Cain offered the fruites of his labour, and planting; Abel preſented milke, and the firſtlings of his fold: which ſacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather conſiſted of things produced of themſelues by the order of Nature, then that which a couetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from Nature. Hereupon Cain (being wroth becauſe his brother Abel was more honoured by God then himſelfe) ſlew his brother; and hauing hidden his body
C out of ſight, he thought that ſuch a murther ſhould be concealed. But God knowing well this fact) appeared to Cain, and queſtioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many daies ſince he had not ſeene him; when as heretofore he had alwaies ſeene him conuerſant before him. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what anſwer he ſhould make vnto God) ſaid firſt that he wondred what was the cauſe his brother was ſo long time abſent: and finally, agrieued in that God continued the queſt, and did more exactly ſeeke after him; he ſaid he was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affaires. Then God reproued and conuicted Cain of murthering his brother, and ſpake vnto him after this manner, ſaying, that he wondred he ſhould deny the knowledge of his brothers death, whereas he himſelfe had ſlaine him: notwithſtanding he acquitted him of the puniſhment deſerued for this mur-
D ther, by reaſon that Cain had done ſacrifice, and made requeſt vnto God, that it might pleaſe him to remit ſomewhat of the ſeuerity of his iuſtice againſt him: yet did God curſe him, and threaten to puniſh his ſucceſſors to the ſeuenth generation. Then did he driue him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for feare he ſhould bee encountred and taken by ſome ſauage beaſts, and that he ſhould periſh after that ſort) God commanded him to ſuſpect no dangerous euent for that cauſe, aſſuring him that he might ſafely trauaile thorow all regions, without being either aſſaulted or ſeazed by ſauage beaſts: and hauing ſet his marke vpon him, by which he might be knowne; he commanded him to depart the countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had trauelled thorow diuers Regions, hee builded Nais (it was a place ſo named) and made his abode therein, and in that place had children. But he receiued not E this chaſtiſement for his better amendment; but rather became worſe and worſe: for he abandoned himſelfe to all pleaſures of the body, making it his ſport to outrage thoſe with whom he conuerſed, filling his houſe with riches gotten by rapine and violence; and inciting other men to follow his pleaſures and thefts, he became their Lord and Maſter of all miſchieuous exerciſes: hee ouerthrew that ſimplicitie which men before that time had vſed in their mutuall ſocieties, by the inuentions of meaſures and waights; the ignorance thereof was the cauſe that the life of man was eſtranged from deceit: but in ſteade and place of free and ancient courage, he introduced fraude and deceit. He it was that firſt bounded the fieldes, and builded the firſt Citie, and made a wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell therein. This Citie was named Enoſa, by the name of Enos his firſt begotten ſonne. But Iared was the ſonne of Enos, of F Iared iſſued Malehel, whoſe ſonne was Mathuſala, who begot Lamech, who had 77. children by his two wiues, Sella and Ada: amongſt whom, Iobel the ſonne of Ada was the firſt that made Tents, and tooke delight to leade a paſtorall life; contenting himſelfe with the ſame. Iubal his brother germane exerciſed muſicke, and inuented the Pſalterie, and the Harpe. And as touching Thobel one of his ſonnes, by his other wife, he ſurpaſſed all other his brethren in force, & braue-ly managed the affaires of warre, by which wayes he got more ample riches, and meanes to maintaine his life with more pleaſure. He it was that firſt inuented the Art of forging, and the ſhop alſo: and was father to a daughter named Naama. But Lamech being well exerciſed in Gods

So it was that during the life of Adam himselfe, the successors of Cain were most wicked, teaching and imitating one anothers wickednes, the last of them prouing alwaies the worst: so that they were strangely inflamed to follow warre and theft: and if perhaps some of them were more remisse then the other in murthers, and committing outrages; yet notwithstanding were they bold enough to spoile and possesse the goods and heritage of other men.

Cain the father of hypocrites and euill men.

But Adam the first man made of earth (for the Historie requireth that I should returne to speake of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, betooke himselfe to beget children, highly affecting succession and posterity, being about the age of two hundreth and thirty yeers: besides which, after hee had liued some seuen hundreth more, at last hee died: amongst whose children (which were many) he hath Seth. And for that it were too long to speake of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nourished and trained vp by his father H to the yeeres of discretion; studied vertue, and left his succession heires, and followers of his sanctitie: who being all of them well borne, remained in the world free from all contention, and liued happily: so that it neuer happened that any of them in any sort did iniurie to any man. These inuented the science of the celestiall bodies, and all that which concerneth the beauty and order of the same. And to the end that their inuentions should not be defaced out of the memories of men, neither should perish before they were perfectly knowne: (insomuch as Adam had foretold them of the generall destruction of all things after two sorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of waters) they made two pillars; the one of bricke, and the other of stone; and ingraued in each of them such things as they had inuen- I ted, to the end if that of bricke should be abolished by the ouerflowes and rage of waters, that other of stone should remaine, and expresse vnto men that which was imprinted therin for their instructions. That of bricke then was consecrated by them, and is in the countrey of Lycia euen at this present day.

CHAP. IIII.

The Deluge from which NOE and his family escaped, and dwelt in the field of Senaar.

IN this manner perseuered they during the course of seuen ages, honoring one God the Lord of al things, hauing alwaies a respect of vertue. But afterwards in processe of time, K they degenerated from the ancient institutions of their forefathers, neither obseruing humane lawes, neither continuing their accustomed seruice of God; and they that beforetime industriously exercised themselues in vertue, afterward with twice as zealous studie followed wickednesse; and grew at last to that height of impietie, that they prouoked Gods heauie displeasure against them. For diuers Angels of God accompanying themselues with women, ingendred outragious infants, and contemners of all good, by reason of that trust they had in their forces, whose hainous actions were not much vnlike those which the Greekes haue in their fables fained of the Giants. But Noah perplexed and extremely displeased with such their misdemeanors, exhorted them to change their thoughts, and amend their misdeeds: and (seeing them mollified by no admonitions; but that they were wholly possessed with the plea- L sure which they tooke in vices) he fearing lest they should kill him and his family, left them to their loosenes, and with his wife, children, and all his familie departed into another countrey. Then God (delighting in the iustice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreme malice, but also concluded to destroy all whatsoeuer creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, deuoid, and repurged from all impietie: he abridged also the life of them, so that they liued not any more so long time as they were wont, but onely attained the terme of sixescore yeeres: and he couered the Land with waters, and by this meanes all of them were destroyed. Onely Noah escaped by the meanes and way which God had taught him in such manner as followeth: Hee builded an Arke of foure stages; in length three hundreth cubites: in breadth fiftie: and in the height thirtie: into this he entred with his mother, his wife and M his children and their wiues, purueying himselfe of all things requisite both for their sustenance and vse: hee clozed also therein all sorts of liuing creatures, two and two, Male and Female, for the conseruation of euery kinde, and of some of them seuen couples. The sides of this Arke were strong, and the couer also; so that no water could pearce the same, and whatsoeuer storme might come, it was able to resist it. Thus was Noe (by succession of nature, the tenth from Adam) saued with all his household; for he was the son of Lamech, whose father was Methu-

A ſala the ſonne of Enos, the ſonne of Iared, the ſonne of Maleel, who with diuers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the ſon of Seth, the ſonne of Adam. This deſtruction hapned, the ſixe hundreth yeere of Noahs age (and the ſecond moneth, which was called Dius by the Macedons, and by the Hebrewes Marſomane) for ſo haue the Ægyptians diſtinguiſht the yeere (but Moſes ſet downe Niſan for the firſt moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Iſraelites out of the thraldome of the Ægyptians.) He made this law therefore, that all things which appertaine to diuine ſeruice, ſhould take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in reſpect of the times and termes of buying and ſelling, and all other traffike, he obſerued the firſt policy of the yeere, beginning in December: Moſes wrote that the Deluge began the ſeuen and twentieth day of the a-
B bouenamed moneth, which was the yeere two thouſand ſixe hundreth fifty and ſixe, after the creation of the firſt man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth and death of great perſonages of that time are moſt exactly ſet downe.) At ſuch time then as Adam was 230. yeeres old, his ſonne SETH was borne vnto him, and the ſame ADAM liued 930. yeeres; SETH about the age of 250. yeeres, begat ENOS, who after he had liued 905. yeeres, left the gouernment of his affaires to his ſonne Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190. yeere of his age. After that Cainan had liued 910. yeeres, he had his ſonne Maleel, begotten by him the 170. yeere of his age. The ſaid Maleel hauing liued 195. yeeres, dyed, leauing his ſon Iared: who about the age of 162. yeeres, engendered Enoch, who liued 962. yeeres. After Enoch, ſucceeded his ſonne Mathuſala, begotten about the age of 162. yeeres, at ſuch time as the ſaid
C Enochs father was yet aliue: and after that Enoch had liued 365. yeers, he was taken vp vnto God (whence it commeth to paſſe that his deceaſe hath not beene exemplified in writing.) Mathuſala the ſonne of Enoch, in the yeere of his age 187. yeeres, had Lamech for his ſon, who liued 782. yeeres, to whom he left the ſoueraignty, hauing held the ſame 969. yeeres. And Lamech after he had gouerned 707. yeeres, declared his ſon Noe for Gouernour, at ſuch time as the ſaid Lamech had liued 182. yeeres, which Noe gouerned for the ſpace of 900. yeeres.

All theſe yeeres calculated into one ſumme, accompliſh the time aboue written. Yet to perfect this accompt, we ought not to ſeeke out the deceaſe of theſe Perſonages (for they liued in the ſame time that their children and ſucceſſours did:) but the onely thing we are to obſerue, is their births. As ſoone then as God had giuen the ſigne, and that it began to raine for the ſpace
D of whole forty dayes, the water fell and ouerflowed the whole earth fourteene cubites high (which was the cauſe that diuers could not eſcape, becauſe there was no means of flight, or place of refuge.) But as ſoone as the raine was ceaſed, the water began to decreaſe by little and little for the ſpace of one hundreth and fifty dayes, about the 27. day of the ſeuenth moneth. Noe perceiuing then that the Arke was on ground vpon the top of a certaine mountaine of the countrey of Armenia; he opened the ſame, and ſeeing the earth did a little diſcouer it ſelfe round about the ſame, he conceiued ſome better hope, and held himſelfe ſatisfied: Some few dayes after, when the water was ebbed ſomewhat more; he ſent out a Crow (deſiring to know if the reſt of the earth were deliuered from the waters, and whether without danger he might iſſue out of the Arke:) but the Crow finding the earth bebayned in water, returned vnto Noe: who the E ſeuenth day after ſent out a Pigeon to find out the eſtate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in his nebbe an Oliue branch: whereby Noe perceiued that the earth was deliuered from the Deluge; and hauing as yet expected ſeuen daies more, he ſet at liberty all liuing creatures that were in the Arke. But as ſoone as himſelfe, his wife, and his family forſooke it, he offered ſacrifice vnto God, and feaſted and reioyced both he and all his houſhold. The Armenians in their language haue called the place where Noe deſcended, by a name Aprobaerion (which ſignifieth as much as deſcent) and in that place euen at this preſent the inhabitants of that countrey ſhew ſome remnants and memories of the ſame. All thoſe that haue written ſtrange Hiſtories, haue made mention of this Deluge, and of the Arke: among the number of whom is Beroſus the Chaldean, who ſetting downe occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after F this manner: Some ſay likewiſe that a certaine part of this Arke is in Armenia, neere to the mountaine of the Cordæans, and that ſome men haue brought from thence ſome part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of that place are wont to vſe in ſtead of a preſeruatiue againſt inchantment. Hierome the Ægyptian alſo (who hath written the Antiquitie of the Phænicians) hath made mention of this matter: as alſo Mnaſeus with diuers other: Nicholas of Damas likewiſe in his ninetie ſixt Booke ſpeaketh heereof after this manner: Aboue the Region of Mineans there is a great mountaine in Armenia called Baris, in which it

Noe ſendeth a Crow out of the Arke.

Nicholas Damaſcene, of Noes Arke.

it is reported that diuers retyred themſelues for ſafety during the time of the Deluge, & there G eſcaped they: and that a certaine man borne on an Arke, arriued vpon the higheſt top of that mountaine, and that certaine timbers of that bottome had beene kept a long while: and it may be that this is that wherof Moſes the law-maker of the Iewes maketh mention. But Noe fearing leſt God (hauing condemned all men to a generall perdition) ſhould euery yeere ouerflow the earth after this manner; offered burnt ſacrifice vnto God: beſeeching him, that hereafter he would entertaine the ancient order, and that no ſo great calamity might ſucceed, by which all liuing creatures ſhould come in danger to be vtterly extinct and exterminated: but that inflicting deſerued puniſhment on the reprobate, hee would ſpare the innocent, whom in his mercy hee had preſerued from danger; otherwiſe they ſhould be more miſerable and condemned by H a harder cenſure, if they were not wholly warranted, but ſhould be reſerued to be ſwallowed vp by another Deluge; and hauing ſuffered the feare and ſight of the firſt, to periſh by the ſecond. He praied him therefore that he would be pleaſed to accept of his ſacrifice, and in his mercy vouchſafe that he would hereafter conceiue no more any ſo hainous hate & diſpleaſure againſt the earth, to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities, might poſſeſſe the ſame in peace, wanting none of thoſe commodities which they enioyed before the Deluge: but that they might equall their forefathers in old yeeres, and length of life.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 6. Noe prayeth God that he will drowne the earth no more.

God heareth Noes prayer. Nota. Hedio and Ruffinus. chap. 7. Man is the author of his death, not God. Gods couenant with Noe.

Noe hauing in this ſort finiſhed his requeſts, God (who loued him for the vprightneſſe of his heart) granted him his requeſt, denying himſelfe to be the author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themſelues by their owne malice had procured thoſe puniſhments due I vnto them. For had he deſired that they ſhould be extinguiſhed, he would not haue brought them into the world. For better it is, not to grant life; then to deſtroy thoſe to whom thou haſt giuen it. But (ſaith God) through their contempt of my ſeruice and graces, they haue inforced me to humble them vnder the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not ſo exactly purſue & examine their iniquities, to the end to chaſtiſe them in my diſpleaſure; eſpecially for thy ſake: And if hereafter at any time I ſhall ſend any tempeſt, feare not (how huge and hideous ſoeuer the ſtormes be) for there ſhall be no more Deluge of water vpon the earth. In the meane time I command you to keepe your hands innocent from murthers, and all manſlaughter, and to puniſh thoſe that commit wickedneſſe. I leaue the vſe of all other liuing creatures to your ſuſtenance or ſeruice; in as much as I haue made you Lord ouer all, as well thoſe that breathe vpon K the face of the earth, as thoſe that ſwim in the waters, and ſuch as inhabit & flie amidſt the aire: but you ſhall not eate any blood, in as much as therin conſiſteth the ſoule and life of liuing creatures. And I declare vnto you, that I will deſiſt to draw the ſhafts of my diſpleaſure againſt men. And I will giue you the Rainbow for a ſigne: for this bow in their opinion is the bow of God. And after that God had pronounced theſe words and made theſe promiſes, he departed.

The Rainebow the ſigne of atonement betweene God and Noe. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Noes age, 950. yeeres.

Noe liued after the Deluge three hundreth and fifty yeeres, and hauing ſpent all this time of his life in happineſſe, he died after he had liued in the world nine hundreth and fifty yeers. Neither is there cauſe why any man (comparing this our preſent age, and the ſhortnes of the yeeres thereof, with the long life of the ancients) ſhould thinke that falſe which I haue ſaid: neither followeth it conſequently, that becauſe our preſent life extendeth not to ſuch a terme and continu- L ance of yeeres, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age and long life which we publiſh of them. For they being beloued of God, and newly created by him, vſing alſo a kinde of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their yeeres, it is no abſurd thing to ſuppoſe that their yeeres were of that continuance: Conſidering that God gaue them long life, to the end they ſhould teach vertue, and ſhould conueniently practiſe thoſe things which they had inuented in Aſtronomie, and by Geometry: the demonſtrations whereof they neuer had attained, except they had liued at the leaſt ſixe hundreth yeeres. For the great yeere is accompliſhed by that number of yeeres: whereof all they beare me witneſſe, who (either Greekes or Babarians) haue written ancient hiſtories. For both Manethon (who hath written the hiſtory of Ægypt) and Beroſus (who hath regiſtred the actes and affaires of the Chaldeans) M together with Mochus Heſtiæus, Hierome of Ægypt) who hiſtorified the ſtate of the Phænicians with others, accord with me in that which I haue ſaid. Heſiodus alſo, Heccataeus, Hellanicus, and Acuſilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus doe declare, that they of the firſt world liued one thouſand yeeres. Notwithſtanding let euery man iudge of theſe things, as beſt liketh him.

Why they in times paſt liued longer then wee doe.

Chap. V.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

NOe had three ſonnes, Sem, Iaphet, and Cham, borne one hundreth yeeres before the Deluge. Theſe firſt deſcended from the mountaines into the plaines, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceiued (who for feare of the Deluge had fled the plaines, and for that cauſe were loth to forſake the mountaines) they gathered courage and perſwaded themſelues to doe the like: and the plaine where they all dwelt was called Senaar. The yeere of the world, 1790. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 2174.

B And whereas they were commanded by God, that (by reaſon of the increaſe and multitude of men) they ſhould ſend certaine diſtinct Colonies to inhabite diuers countries of the world (to the end that no ſeditions might grow betwixt the one and the other; but contrariwiſe in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great ſtore of fruite) they were ſo ignorant that they diſobeyed God, and falling into great calamities ſuffered the puniſhment of their offences. For, whereas they flouriſhed in increaſe (by reaſon of the great number of their youth) God counſelled them again that they ſhould diuide thẽſelues into colonies. But they (thinking that the goods which they poſſeſſed, proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but preſuming that their force was the only cauſe of their aboundance) did not obey him, but rather ſuſpected that God ſought to betray thẽ, to the end that being thus diuided, he might the better C ſubdue them: Nemrod incited them in this ſort to mocke and contemne God. He was the nephew of Cham, the ſonne of Noe: a man valiant and apt for armes: he put them in the head that they ſhould not beleeue that their good hap proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their owne vertue, which furniſhed them with ſo much riches: ſo that in a little ſpace he reduced the eſtate to a tyranny; ſuppoſing by this only means that he might make men reuolt againſt God, if he might perſwade them to ſubmit themſelues to his gouernment; giuing them to vnderſtand, that if God ſhould once more ſend a Deluge, hee would take reuenge on him in mens behalfe, and that he would build a tower, to whoſe top the water ſhould not attempt, and reuenge the death of his predeceſſors. The common ſort was ready to follow theſe ordinances of Nemrod, ſuppoſing it to be puſillanimity in themſelues, if they ſhould obey God. For which Genes. 11.

D cauſe they began to build the tower with their vttermoſt induſtry, neither was there any one idle in all that worke: yea ſo great a number of labourers were there, that the worke was raiſed to a height beyond all expectation. The thickneſſe thereof was ſo great, that it obſcured the height thereof: and it was built of burnt bricke, and cimented and ioyned with a bituminous morter, to the end it ſhould not receiue any cleft in the ſame.

But God ſeeing their madneſſe, condemned them not to a generall extermination (by reaſon that they had made no profit by their example, who periſhed in the firſt Deluge) but made them mutine the one againſt the other by changing of their tongue; ſo that by reaſon of their diuerſities of language, they could not vnderſtand one another. The place where this tower was builded, is at this preſent called Babylon (by reaſon of the confuſion of tongues that firſt began E in that place) for Babel in Hebrewe ſignifieth confuſion. Of this tower and the diuerſitie of languages Sibylla hath made mention in theſe words: At ſuch time as men vſed one kinde of language, they builded a moſt high tower, as if they meant by the ſame to mount vp into heauen: but the gods ſent down winds and ouerthrew the tower, and gaue euery one his diſtinct and ſeuerall language, whence ſprung the cauſe that their Citie was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Senaar in Babylon, Heſtiæus teſtifieth after this manner: It is ſaid of thoſe ſacrificers, that being eſcaped, they tooke the ſacred reliques of Iupiter Enyelius, and came into Senaar in Babylon.

FROM that time forward (by reaſon of the diuerſitie of tongues) they diſperſed themſelues into diuers countries, and planted Colonies in all places; and occupied thoſe places whither either God or their good fortune had conducted them: ſo that both the ſea coaſts, and the middle-land were repleniſhed with inhabitants. Some there were alſo, who paſſing the ſea in ſhips and veſſels, firſt peopled the Ilands. And there are ſome nations likewiſe, who at this day retaine the names which in times paſt were impoſed on them: ſome other haue haue changed them. Others are altered into a more familiar and knowne name, to neighbours, G deriuing them from the Greekes the authors of ſuch Titles. For they in theſe latter times hauing growne to great name and power, haue appropriated the ancient glory to themſelues, in giuing names vnto Nations deriued from the Greeks, and policying them, as if they had taken their originall from them.

The Names of Regions and Nations.

CHAP. VII.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Gen. 10.

NOvv they in honour of whom the Nations receiued their firſt names, were the children of the ſonnes of Noe. Iaphet the ſon of Noe had ſeuen children, who began to make their H abode from the mountaines of Taurus and Amanus, and entred Aſia, euen vnto Tana; and Europa, vnto Gades, occupying the countrey which they firſt met with, and was not beforetime by man inhabited, each one calling his ſeuerall Nation by his owne name: for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians. Magog dwelt amongſt thoſe, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greeks Scithes. Of Madus (the firſt begotten ſonne of Iaphet) iſſued the Madians, whom the Greeks haue named Medes: and of Iauan his other ſon, the Ionians and Greeks took their originall: Thobelus gaue name likewiſe to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meſchus was the author of them that were called Meſchates, who are lately named Cappadocians: for they ſhew euen at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City I of Maſaca, which teſtifieth to thoſe that conceiue the ſame, that this Nation hath been ſo called. Theres named them Therians, who were vnder his gouernment, whom the Greeks called Thracians: and thus many Nations tooke their originall from the ſonnes of Iaphet: but of the three ſonnes which Gomar had, Aſchanaxes gaue originall to the Aſchanaxians (at this day termed Rhegians by the Greeks) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhiphatæans, called at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. As touching Iauan the ſonne of Iaphet, he had three ſonnes, of whom Abiſus gaue name to the Abiſians, who at this preſent are the Ætolians, ouer whom he commanded: Tharſus ingendred the Tharſians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane City Tharſis; whoſe firſt letter is O in ſtead of Th. Chetinus obtained the Ile of K Chetine, called at this day Cypris, (whence it hapneth, that not onely all the Ilands, but alſo diuers other places on the Sea-coaſt are by the Hebrewes called by this word Cethim) witneſſe one of the City of Cypris, which hath had the reputation to conſerue her ancient name. For it is called Citium, by thoſe that wreſt the ſame to the Greeke ſenſe, a word not very much varying from Cethim. Theſe nations were occupied by the ſonnes and yong children of Iaphet. But I will firſt publiſh that which perhaps is vnknowne to the Greekes, and then proſecute my purpoſed narration which I haue omitted, that is, that theſe names are formed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end they ſhould be more ſweet and pleaſant to them that ſhould ouer-read them. For this termination is not proper to our nation, which hath but one forme, and no variation of termination: for whereas the Greekes pronounce Ἀδαμος, we ſay Adam: and where they L ſay Noches, the Hebrewes ſay Noe, and keepe this termination in all things.

But the ſonnes of Cham poſſeſſed Syria and all the region that abutteth on the mountaines of Amanus and Libanus; extruding their Empire towards the ſea, and ſignioriſing all whatſoeuer euen vnto the ſea. Whoſe names are partly wholly aboliſhed, and partly changed, and applied to others; ſo as they are very hard to bee vnderſtood: for of the foure Sonnes of Cham, the name of Chus hath not beene changed by time: for the Ægyptians, (ouer whom they extend their Dominion) haue beene named Chuſeans by them, and by all, the Aſians: the name of Miſraim hath continued alſo in the memory of men: for we that bound vpon Ægypt, call that Countrey the Countrey of Miſraim, and the Æthiopians Miſramites. Phut likewiſe firmed the Colonies of Libya, and called the inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; M and there is a riuer in the country of Mauritania, which hath the ſame name, of which it is moſt manifeſt that diuers Greeke hiſtories make mention, as alſo of the countrey neere adioyning, which they call the Countrey of Phut, but it hath changed his preſent name by the means of one Licis one of the ſonnes of Miſraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter ſignifie vnto you.) As touching Canaan the fourth ſonne of Cham, he dwelled in the countrey at this day called Iudæa, and called it the Countrey of Canaan according to his name. They alſo had chil-

All the eight ſonnes of Miſraim, occupied all the country from Gaza vnto Egypt: Onely the countrey where Philiſtims gouerned, hath conſerued his name: for the Greekes call Paleſtine a B part thereof. As touching the reſt, Lom, Enam, and Labim (who only inhabited Libya and called the countrey by his name) likewiſe as touching Nethom, Phetroſim, Chreſeen and Chepthom, wee know neither of their countries, nor of their names. For, the Æthiopian war (whereof hereafter we will make mention) hath ouerthrowne their Cities. Chanaan alſo had ſons, amongſt whom Sidonius builded and named Sidon (a city in Phœnicia) and Amathus builded Amate, which at this day the inhabitants call Amatha: but the Macedonians haue named it Epiphania (which is as much to ſay as famous) by reaſon of ſome that deſcended from Epiphanes. Arudeus poſſeſſed the Iles of Aradus, and Araceus builded the City of Arce, ſituate in Libanus. And as touching the other ſeuen, the Eueans, Chetteans, Iebuſæans, Eudæans, Semæans, Samarians, and Gergeſæans; there is no memory remaining in ſacred Scriptures but onely their names: for the C Hebrewes razed their Cities vpon theſe occaſions.

After the Deluge, when the earth was eſtabliſhed in his former eſtate, Noe gaue himſelfe to tillage, and planted vineyards, and when the fruit thereof was ripe (and he had preſſed and made wine therof) he dranke and banquetted after he had done ſacrifice: Being thereby made drunke, and ouerpreſſed with ſleepe, hee lay diſcouered in a moſt vnſeemely and ſhamefull faſhion; which when his younger ſonne beheld, he ſcornefully diſcouered it to his brothers: who being aſhamed, couered their Fathers ſhame with reuerence. Which fact of his, comming at laſt to light, and the knowledge of Noe, he wiſhed all felicity to the two other, and as touching Cham (by reaſon he was his ally in blood) he curſed him not, but his poſterity after him. But although the others eſcaped this malediction, yet God inflicted it on the ſucceſſours of Chanaan, D whereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. But Sem the third ſonne of Noe had fiue ſonnes, who inhabited the countrey of Aſia, beginning at Euphrates, and extending to the Indian Ocean ſea. For Elymis left the Elemians or Elamites for his ſucceſſors, whence proceeded the Perſians. Aſſur made his abode in Niniue, and impoſed on his ſubiects the name of Aſſyrians (who were rich amongſt all the reſt.) Arphaxad named thoſe of his command Arphaxadians; who at this day are called Chaldeans. Aram had the Arameans (whom the Greekes called Syrians) and that they are now called Lidi, and in times paſt Ludi, tooke their deſcent from Ludas. Of thoſe foure ſonnes which Aram had, Vſes dwelt in Trachonite; and in the country of Damaſco (ſituate betweene Paleſtine and Syria, ſurnamed Cælen or hallow) Otrus obtained Armenia: Gether, Bactria. Miſas was father to the Miſureans (who dwelt in a fort which is called at this day E Praſine.) Sale, Arphaxads ſonne was Hebers father, by whoſe name in times paſt the Hebrews were called: Heber begat Loctan and Phaleg, who was ſo called, for that he was borne at ſuch time as the land was parted: for Phaleg in Hebrew ſignifieth partage. They that follow were ſonnes of Loctan: Elmodad, Saleph, Azermoth, Erais, Edoram, Vzalis, Dallis, Ebal, Ebimarl, Saphas, Ophir, Euilus, and Iobel: who occupied ſome parcell of that which was about Cophen a riuer of India, and the hither Syria. Hitherto haue we ſpoken of the progenie of Sem, hereafter will I ſpeake of the Hebrewes; of Phaleg the ſonne of Heber Ragaus, by whom was begot Seruch, whence Nachor is deſcended, and of Nachor, Thares, who was Abrahams father, the tenth in accompt from Noe, and borne in the yeere 292. after the Deluge. For Thares being ſeuenty yeeres old, begat Abraham. Nachor at ſixe ſcore yeeres of his age, begat Thares. Nachor was F borne to Seruch, when he was about the yeeres of 132. of his life. And Ragaus begat Seruch when he was thirty two yeeres old, and about thoſe yeeres Phaleg begat Ragaus. But Heber in the 34. yeere of his age, begat Phaleg: (himſelfe begotten by Sela, when he was one hundreth thirty and fiue yeeres old:) which Sela was begotten by Arphaxad, when he was 135. yeeres of age. And Arphaxad was the ſonne of Sem, whom he begat ſome two yeeres after the Deluge. Abraham had two brothers, Nachor and Aram, of whom Aram left Lot for his ſonne, and Sara and Melcha for his daughters, and afterwards died in the land of Canaan in a City called Vr of the Chaldies, where his ſepulchre is to be ſeene euen at this day. His daughters were married,

CHAP. VIII.

How ABRAHAM the Author of our Nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certaine countrey of the Chanaanites, which is now called IVDEA.

ABRAHAM hauing no issue, adopted Lot the son of Aram his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: he departed out of the country of Chaldeis, when he was 75. yeers old (hauing had commandement from God to depart thence into Canaan) in which country he remained, and left the same to his posterity after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of vnderstanding, and apt to perswade those that gaue eare vnto him, without any default in his foresight & prouidence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, & was he that first vndertook to conuince the receiued and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deitie. He therfore first of all did most manifestly preach, and proue, that there was but one God, Gouernour and Maker of all things, and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicity, it happened vnto vs not by our owne workings, but his holy will. And this obserued and approued he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea, as also those things, which he saw daily occurre by the influences of the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres: namely, that there was a certaine power that disposed them, and decently administred all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable vnto vs; whereas nothing of himselfe hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiuing should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and counsels of his (seeing the Chaldeans & Mesapotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that country, and following the wil and fauour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an Altar, & sacrificed vnto God. Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our father Abraham, although he named him not, when he speaketh after this maner: After the Deluge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most iust, excellent, and vpright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestiall bodies. But Hecatæus made more then a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath writtē of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, heare what he saith of the fourth booke of his Histories: Abraham raigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arriued with his army from a countrey situate aboue Babylon called Chaldæa, who a little while after (departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a country at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Iudæa, and his posteritie multiplyed therein. In another treatise I will recite that which is reported of him: The name of Abraham euen at this day, is honourable in the country of Damasco, and there is a village to be seene which beareth his name, and is called Abrahams house.

ABRAHAM oppressed by famine, departeth into Egypt, where staying a while, at last he returned backe againe.

AFTER this (when famine had inuaded the land of Chanaan, Abraham had intelligence that the Ægyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himselfe to retire himselfe towards them: as well to conferre with their Priests (and discourse with them of diuine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in vnderstanding, or reconcile them, if his iudgement were more assured then theirs. He led with him his wife Sara: and vnderstanding that the Ægyptians were much addicted vnto women,

A men (to the end the King ſhould not put him to death, of purpoſe that he might enioy his Wife Sara, who was very beautifull) he deuiſed this excuſe, to ſay that ſhe was his ſiſter; charging her, that if the matter came in queſtion, ſhee ſhould not faile, but confirme the like. But no ſooner came he into Ægypt, but the like fortune encountred them, as Abraham had beforetime ſuſpected: for the beautie of his Wife was ſodainly publiſhed in euery place. For which cauſe, Pharao, the King of that Nation (deſirous to ſee that with his eyes, the which he had heard with his eares) he ſought for, ſent, and luſted after her: but God withſtood this his vnbridled luſt, by afflicting the Kings ſubjects with a Plague, and his affaires by ſedition. Whereupon taking counſell of the Prieſts, what remedie might be vſed, and meanes might be ſought to appeaſe the Diuine Majeſty, they anſwered him, That this was the cauſe of their afflictions, for that he thought to haue done
B violence to the ſtrangers Wife: whereat being much affrighted, the King firſt queſtioneth with the woman, what ſhe was, and who her companion ſhould be? and at laſt reſolued of the truth, he ſatisfied Abraham, ſaying, he ſuppoſed her to be his ſiſter, not his Wife; and that his purpoſe was not to offer injurie, but ſeeke alliance: ſo giuing him a great ſumme of money, he gaue him leaue to conferre with the moſt excellenteſt and learnedeſt Prieſts among the Egyptians. Whence it came to paſſe, that he grew into great eſtimation, in regard of his vertues: for whereas that Nation was diuided into different Sects and opinions, and through mutuall contempt and diuiſion were incenſed the one againſt the other; hee declared, that their opinions (different, and confuted by themſelues) in reſpect of Religion, were moſt vaine, and deuoid of all truth. For theſe his diſputations he was held in great regard among them, and eſteemed for a man moſt wiſe, and a per-
C ſonage moſt excellent; not onely in well-conceiuing, but alſo in expreſſing and perſwading that which he vndertooke to teach. To theſe moſt graciouſly imparted he the Science of Arithmetick, and the obſeruation of the celeſtiall Bodies: for before that Abraham came into Ægypt, the Ægyptians were altogether ignorant of thoſe Sciences. But hee tranſported them from Chaldæa into Ægypt, and from thence are they deriued to the Greekes. As ſoone as he returned into Chanaan, he diuided the countrey with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their ſhepheards (as touching the bounding of thoſe paſtures where they fed their cattell) he gaue Lot the choice and election of that countrey which beſt pleaſed him, retaining vnto himſelfe that which was left. Thus pitching his tents neere the mountaine, in a Citie called Hebron (which is by ſeuen yeeres more ancient then Tanis in Ægypt) he dwelled there. But Lot choſe the Plaine neere to D the flood of Iordan, not farre from Sodom; which in thoſe dayes was a goodly Citie: but at this preſent, by the diuine juſtice and wrath of God, is vtterly defaced; ſo that no memorie remaineth thereof. The cauſes of which judgement ſhall be expreſſed hereafter.

The ouerthrow of the Sodomites by the Syrians.

E AT that time when the Aſſyrians were Lords ouer all Aſia, the eſtate of Sodom flouriſhed in all affluence, encreaſed in great riches, and multitude of gallant youths, and the countrey was gouerned by fiue Kings; theſe were, Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus, and Balin, (each one particularly ſeized of his Prouince and Kingdome.) Againſt theſe, the Aſſyrians encamped themſelues; and hauing diuided their armie into foure parts (vnder the conduct of foure Gouernours) they waged battell with them; in which the Aſſyrians attaining the day, they impoſed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom: who (after they had for twelue yeeres ſpace performed their dutie, and payd their tribute) in the thirteenth yeere reuolted from them. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Aſſyrians leuied a new armie againſt them, vnder the conduct and command of Marphad, Arioch, Chodollogomar, and Thargal, who ſacked all Syria, and extinguiſhed the poſteritie of the Gyants. And drawing neere to Sodom, they incamped neere to the bituminous Pits (for at that time there were Pits in that place:) but as ſoone as Sodom was deſtroyed, there aroſe a
F Lake in that place, which (by reaſon of the bituminous matter that flowed in the ſame) was called Aſphaltites, that is to ſay, bituminous. Of this Lake, hereafter we will ſpeake ſomewhat. But the Sodomites encountring with the Aſſyrians, there was a dangerous skirmiſh fought, wherein many periſhed on both ſides, and the reſt were eyther ſlaine or taken; amongſt whom, was Lot led away captiue, who came thither to aſſiſt the Sodomites.

The yeere of the world, 2031. before Chriſts Natiuity, 1933.

ABRAHAM hearing of theſe things, and mooued (both with the ſurpriſall of his couſin Lot, as alſo with the ſlaughter of his friends and neighbours) preſently addreſſed himſelfe with all his followers, to giue them ſuccours: and ſuch diligence ſhewed he in purſuit of them, that the fift night after hee encountred the Aſſyrians neere to Dan, which is one of the ſources of Iordan.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 18. Gen. 14. 15.

Where ſurpriſing them on the ſodaine (vnſuſpicious, and diſarmed) he killed thoſe that were aſleepe, without ſuſpition of his comming; and they that were not yet aſleepe, and lay wallowing in their drunkenneſſe, he eaſily defeated and put to flight; purſuing them in ſuch ſort, that the ſecond day after he draue them all into Soba, a Citie of Damaſco. Declaring hereby, that Victorie conſiſteth not in the multitude of thoſe that manage their Armes, but rather in the courage of thoſe that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth alwayes, then a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him aboue three hundred and eighteene of his houſehold ſeruants, and three of his friends, to defeat this huge Armie. So that whatſoeuer they were that eſcaped out of this ſlaughter by flight, returned vnto their houſes with ignominie.

On what, Victorie dependeth.

Abraham bringeth back both Lot and the Sodomites that were priſoners. The Kings field. Solyma was afterward called Ieruſalem. Melchiſedech the iuſt King.

As ſoone as Abraham had reſcued thoſe priſoners of Sodom which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot, he returned into his countrey, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in a place called the Kings field) where alſo he was entertained by the King of Solyma, called Melchiſedech (which is as much to ſay as the juſt King:) for in truth he was no leſſe; but was held worthy, by reaſon of his juſtice, in all mens opinion, to ſacrifice, as the High Prieſt of Almightie God. This Solyma in proceſſe of time was called Ieruſalem. This Melchiſedech did friendly entertaine all the followers of Abraham, not ſuffering them to want any thing that was fit for their ſuſtenance; but entertaining him alſo at his owne Table, he highly prayſed him, and ſung due Hymnes of prayſe to the great God, for that by his fauour he had vouchſafed to grant him victorie. Abraham on the other ſide preſented him with the tenths of his ſpoyles: but the King of Sodom remitted all the prey that was taken, and onely required to be poſſeſſed of thoſe Captiues which were of the countrey: which condition hee accepted not, anſwering, That hee would receiue no profit of that prey, but that which he muſt needly haue for the entertainment of his ſeruants. Yet gaue he a portion vnto his friends who had ſuccoured him; the firſt whereof was called Eſchol; and the two other, Ennerus and Mambres. For this cauſe God prayſed Abraham, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not want the reward which is due vnto thee for thy valiant acts. To which he replyed, And what good ſhall I reape of this recompence, if I haue not an heire to poſſeſſe it after my deceaſe? for as yet he had no iſſue. Then did God promiſe him a ſonne, whoſe poſteritie ſhould be ſo multiplied, that they might in number equall the ſtarres of Heauen: which when he vnderſtood, he offered ſacrifice vnto God, following that Commandement which he had receiued: hee tooke therefore a Heifer of three yeeres old, a Goat of three yeeres, and a Ramme of three yeeres, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon; all which he diuided in twaine, as he was commanded, the birds onely excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at ſuch time as the fowles houered about, to haue part of the blood of thoſe beaſts which were ſacrificed) he receiued an Oracle, that told him, That his progenie ſhould haue euill neighbours in Ægypt for the ſpace of foure hundred yeeres; and that after they had ſuffered an inſupportable ſeruitude, they ſhould at laſt obtaine the victorie ouer their enemies: and after that they had by ſtrong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they ſhould be Lords and poſſeſſors of their Countries and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt neere to the Oake that was called Ogis, in the country of Chanaan, neere to the Citie of Hebron. There, being much grieued that his Wife conceiued not, he beſought God to giue him an iſſue male: God commanded him to be of good cheere in all things, and that being come from Meſopotamia vpon good occaſions, he alſo ſhould haue children. At that time Sara, by the cõmandement of God, cauſed one of her handmaids, which was an Ægyptian borne, to enter in vnto her husband, to the end he might haue iſſue by her: now Agar, as ſoone as ſhe perceiued that ſhe had conceiued, began to contemne Sara, aſpiring to principalitie, and ſuppoſing that her iſſue ſhould ſucceed in the kingdome. For which cauſe, Abraham deliuered her vnto his Wife, to the end ſhe ſhould puniſh her: which ſhe perceiuing, ſhe decreed to flye, in that ſhe was afraid of puniſhment, beſeeching God to haue mercy on her: and as ſhe trauailed on her way thorow the deſart, the Angel of God appeared vnto her, commanding her, that ſhe ſhould returne

To this commandement of God Agar ſubmitted her ſelfe with all obedience, and returning backe againe to her Maſter and Miſtris, ſhee obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Iſmael, which is as much to ſay as, Heard of God, becauſe God had heard the mothers prayers. Iſmael was borne to Abraham when he was foureſcore and ſixe yeeres old: but in
B the foureſcore and nineteenth yeere of his age God appeared vnto him, and told him that hee ſhould haue a ſonne by Sara, charging him to call him Iſaac; giuing him to vnderſtand, that great Nations and Kings ſhould iſſue from his loines, who by force of armes ſhould conquer all the countrey of Chanaan, from Sidon euen vnto Ægypt. Commanding him, that his poſteritie ſhould be circumciſed in their priuities, and that this circumciſion ſhould bee done the viii. day after their birth, by reaſon that he would not that Abrahams poſteritie ſhould be intermedled with other nations. But hereafter will I declare the cauſe of our circumciſion. Abraham alſo asked counſell of God as touching Iſmael, whether he ſhould liue or no: who told him that he ſhould flouriſh many yeeres, and that he ſhould become a father of many worthy nations. Then gaue Abraham thankes vnto God, and preſently circumciſed himſelfe, his ſonne Iſmael, with all
C his family: and Iſmael at that time was thirteene yeeres old, but Abraham about foureſcore and nineteeene yeeres of age.

CHAP. XII.

The puniſhment of Sodom.

ABOVT that time the inhabitants of Sodom became immeaſurably proud, by reaſon of their affluence, proſperitie, and great riches; and committed outrages againſt men, and impieties againſt God: in ſuch manner as they had forgotten the benefites which they had receiued at his hands, hating ſtrangers, and diſdaining to conuerſe the one
D with the other, but in diſordinate and abominable inceſts. Whereat God beeing diſpleaſed, hee decreed to puniſh their intolerable pride, to ruinate their Citie from the top to the bottome, and in ſuch ſort to make deſolate their countrey, that from thence-forward it ſhould neither nouriſh plant, nor bring forth fruit. After that God had pronounced this ſentence againſt the Sodomites; Abraham (as he ſat vnder the Oake at Mambres before the doore of his tent) beheld three Angels, and ſuppoſing them to bee men and ſtrangers, he aroſe and ſaluted them; and approching neere vnto them, hee deſired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condiſcended, hee commanded his ſeruants to bake them bread of the fineſt flower, and hauing killed and roſted a calfe, hee ſet it before them (as they ſate vnder the Oake) ſuppoſing they would eate: but they inquired of him
E where Sara his wife was: to whom he anſwered that ſhe was within in the tent. They told him then that they would returne againe;and that they ſhould find her a Mother. But when his wife ſmiled thereat, and ſaid that it was impoſſible for her to beare children; eſpecially in that her ſelfe was at that time 90. yeeres old, and her husband 100. they diſcouered themſelues, and ſaid they were Angels of God, and that they were ſent one of them to aſſure him that he ſhould haue a ſonne; the other two to deſtroy the Sodomites. Which when Abraham heard, hee was ſorry for the Sodomites, and ariſing beſought God that he would not deſtroy both the iuſt and the vniuſt together. To whom God gaue this anſwer, that there was not one iuſt man among the Sodomites, and that if he might but find tenne, he would ſpare the city from puniſhment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entred into Sodom: where no ſooner
F were they arriued, but Lot inuited them to take their lodging in his houſe (for hee was a man much giuen to hoſpitality, and ſuch a one as for bounty had beene Abrahams ſcholler.) But the Sodomites perceiuing that thoſe young men which were entred Lots houſe, were of excellent beauty; began to offer outrage and villany to their perſons: notwithſtanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themſelues, and not to offer villany to his gueſts, but in ſome ſort to haue a reſpect to his houſe: telling them, that rather then they ſhould continue in that intemperance, hee would giue them his daughters to vſe at their pleaſure. But hee preuailed nothing with them: whereupon God was in ſuch wiſe prouoked by their iniquity, that he blinded their eyes G in ſuch ſort, as they could not find the gate to enter into Lots houſe, and condemned the Sodomites to a generall perdition. But Lot foremoniſhed by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and tooke with him his wife and his two daughters as yet vnmarried (for their betrothed husbands, although they were forwarned by him, contemned and held him for a dotard.) Then did God ſhoot his arrow vpon the City, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and deſolating by the ſame fire all the countries round about; in ſuch ſort as it hath already bin declared by me in the Hiſtory I wrote of the warres of the Iewes. But Lots wife, as they retired thence, looking backe towards the City, and more curiouſly beholding the deſtruction thereof, contrary to the commandement of God, was transformed into a pillar of ſalt, which I haue ſeen: H for it remaineth euen vntill this day. As touching Lot, hee and his daughters fled and dwelt in a little country farre from the fire, which was called Zoar (which in Hebrew ſignifieth little:) In this place) which was void of men, and ſcant of victuals) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a ſolitary and poore life: and his daughters ſuppoſing that all mankind was extinguiſhed vpon the earth, ſubtilly circumuenting their father, they lay with him when he leaſt ſuſpected it: and the reaſon that drew them thereunto was, for that they feared leſt mankind ſhould be vtterly exterminated. By this their approachment, they bare him two ſons: the elder Moab (which is as much to ſay as, of my father) and this is he that was the father of the Moabites, which euen at this day are yet a great nation: and of the yonger ſiſter, came Ammon (which ſignifieth the ſonne of Race or kind) and both theſe two nations inhabite the country of Cœloſyria. In this ſort de- I parted Lot from the Sodomites.

As touching Abraham, hee went and dwelt in Gerar, in the countrey of Paleſtine; leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his ſiſter; (vſing the ſame ſubtilty which beforetime hee had practiſed for feare of the Ægyptians:) for he feared Abimelech the King of that countrey, who ſurprized with the loue of Sara, would haue rauiſhed her, had he not bin hindred by a moſt grieuous ſickneſſe, which God inflicted vpon him: ſo that being out of all hope of recouery, at ſuch time as he ſlept, there appeared vnto him a viſion, which told him that he ſhould take heed leſt he offered any outrage to the ſtrangers wife, who was come into his countrey: and after he was ſomewhat recouered, hee told his friends how God had ſent him that ſickneſſe to warrantize the right of the ſtranger, and to preſerue his wife from violence; for that ſhe was not his ſi- K ſter, but his lawfull wife; willing Abraham thenceforward to be of good cheere, promiſing him, that the honour of his wife was inuiolate. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abraham by the counſell of his friends; and told him that he needed not to ſuſpect his wife, by reaſon ſhee had ſuffered no villany: Aſſuring him that God had care of her, and that he deliuered her in ſafety to him (being to that end protected by his mighty power) and in confirmation thereof he called God to record, and the womans conſcience, vowing that he would not haue required her, if hee had knowne ſhee had beene married: moreouer he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appeaſe Gods wrath, which was kindled againſt him. And that if thenceforward he would ſtay with him, he ſhould want nothing: or if he liſted to depart, he promiſed him guides and all other things, for which he came vnto him. Abraham anſwered him, that he had in no ſort L diſſembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife; but that ſhe was his brothers daughter, and that he thought he might not ſafely trauell thorow his country, except he had vſed that ſubtilty; auowing moreouer that he had not beene the cauſe of that ſickneſſe which had befalne him: but that he ſingularly affected his good, and was ready to abide with him.

Whereupon Abimelech imparted vnto him both lands and money, and accorded to conuerſe with him in all vprightneſſe, and without offer of offence, and made a couenant and ſware vnto him by a certaine pit which was called Berſabe (that is to ſay, the pit of ſwearing or couenant) which name that place retaineth vntill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a ſonne by Sara his wife according as God had promiſed him, and he called his name Iſaac (which in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth laughter) becauſe Sara laughed at ſuch time as God ſaid vnto her ſhe M ſhould beare a ſonne, hauing in her ſelfe no likelihood of conceiuing, by reaſon ſhee was ſtriken in yeeres. For at that time ſhe was ninety yeeres old, and Abraham one hundreth when the child was borne, and incontinently the eighth day after was he circumciſed; which cuſtome is yet continued amongſt the Iewes, who circumciſe on the eighth day.

BVT the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth yeere. For Iſmael the author thereof, and Abrahams ſonne by the concubine, was circumciſed in the thirteenth yeere after hee was borne. Of which Iſmael it behooueth we ſpeake more exactly in this place. Sara loued Iſmael(begotten on her ſeruant Agar) from the beginning, with no leſſe affection then as if he had beene her owne ſonne,for he was brought vp as Abrahams heire.But after ſhe had brought forth Iſaac, ſhe thought it no more requiſite that Iſmael ſhould be brought vp with her ſonne,in that he was elder, and for feare leſt after his fathers deceaſe, he ſhould offer his younger brother iniurie. Shee incited Abraham therefore to ſend both him and his mother to ſome other place: but at the firſt he gaue no eare to Saraes requeſt, thinking it to be more then barbarous cruelty, to driue away a tender childe and his mother, deſtitute of all neceſſaries. At length by the commandement of God he liſtened to his wiues counſell,and committed the child vnto his mother (being of himſelfe as yet vnapt to trauell)and giuing them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to goe thither, whither their neceſſitie ſhould driue them. And when their victuals failed them, and their water was conſumed, ſhee laid the childe being faint and weak vnder an Oake; and to the end that in her preſence he ſhould not breathe his laſt,ſhe went far away from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared vnto her, ſhewing her a fountaine hard by that place, and charging her to looke to the carefull education of her childe: becauſe that by the conſeruation of Iſmael, ſhe was to expect great happineſſe. Vpon theſe promiſes ſhe tooke comfort, and falling into the company of ſheepheards, ſhee by their bounty eſcaped from miſerie.

of ISAAC ABRAHAMS legitimate ſonne.

AS touching Iſaac, Abraham loued him with an intire and fatherly affection;as his onely begotten ſonne engendered in his age by the bounty of God. The child alſo addicting himſelfe vnto all vertue, carefull to honour his father and mother,and ſtudious of the ſeruice of God,inuited both his parents the rather to affect and loue him. So that Abraham was very deſirous to forſake this preſent life: prouided, that he might leaue behind him all the goods which he had, vnto his ſonne;which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (vnder triall and conformitie of his faith)God appeared vnto him, & reckned vp all the benefits which he had beſtowed on him, how he had granted him victory ouer his enemies (and how he had eſtabliſht and bleſt him with preſent felicity by his fauour) for which cauſe he required him to ſacrifice and make an oblation vnto him of his ſonne Iſaac, commanding him that he ſhould conduct him to the mountaine of Morea, and there to ſacrifice him. In doing whereof, he ſhould manifeſt the deſire he had to ſerue him (in preferring that which was agreeable to God before the life of his ſonne.) Abraham ſuppoſing that it was no waies lawfull to diſobey God, but that he ought to ſubmit himſelfe to his will, (as to him by whoſe prouidence all things had their being) ſaid nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his ſonne.

taine (vpon which afterward King Dauid appointed that the Temple ſhould be builded.) They G carried with them alſo the reſt of thoſe things which were requiſite for ſacrifice (ſaue onely the beaſt that was to be offered:)now about this time, Iſaac was fiue and twenty yeeres old,and did himſelfe prepare the Altar, and inquired of his father what he ſhould offer, conſidering that as yet they had no ſheep for ſacrifice. Abraham anſwered him,that God would furniſh them, who was of power ſufficient to giue men that in abundance, whereof they had need, and to depriue them of that they had, and whereof they held themſelues throughly poſſeſſed: and that it was he would giue them wherewith to ſacrifice,(if it ſhould pleaſe him to ſhew himſelfe fauourable, and propitious to that ſacrifice of his:)now as ſoon as the Altar was made ready,and the wood prepared and laid vpon the ſame,and all things were in readineſſe, he addreſſed his ſpeech vnto his ſonne, and ſaid thus:

Abrahams oration at ſuch time as his ſonne ſhould haue beene ſacrificed.

My ſonne, I haue oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that he ſhould giue thee life, by my H infinite interceſſions and prayers, and euer ſince thou wert borne into this world, I haue intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither haue I thought that in any thing I might be made more happy, then that departing out of this world, I might ſee thee at mans eſtate, and leaue thee the heire and Lord of all my ſubſtance: but ſince it hath pleaſed God, that I ſhould be thy father, and that the ſame God likewiſe now thinketh good that I ſhould forſake thee, put vpon thee a conſtant minde, and take in good part that thus thou muſt be ſacrificed: " for in ſo doing I fulfill the Commandements of God: who requireth at our hands that we doe " him this honour, for the fauours which he hath beſtowed vpon me, in aſſiſting me, and in familiar manner conuerſing, and aſſociating me both in warre and peace. Since therefore that be- I " ing borne, thou art to die, (not after the accuſtomed manner of the liuing) but being offered in " ſacrifice by thine owne father, to the generall Father, God: I deeme it reaſonable, that ſince it " ſeemeth good vnto him that thou depart out of this life (not by ſickneſſe, nor by warre, nor by " any other inconuenience, that naturally hapneth vnto men) that it is behoofefull alſo that thou " render thy ſoule vnto him in the midſt of prayers,and the celebration of this ſacrifice,to the end " he may receiue and ſeate thee neere himſelfe: Thou ſhalt be my purueyor and ſtay of mine age " (which is the cauſe for which I haue nouriſhed thee) if thou leaue me God for my purueyor " and comfort in thy place. Then Iſaac with a noble heart (like the gracious ſonne of ſo godly a father) heard all that which his father ſaid with great contentment, and aſſured that he would " rather neuer haue beene borne, then he ſhould once neglect the ordinance of God and of his K " father: or ſhew himſelfe negligent to ſubmit his will to both their pleaſures, conſidering that " if his father onely ſhould command the ſame, he ſhould doe very euill if he diſobeyed him: " which ſaid, he marched towards the Altar, and offered himſelfe to the ſlaughter: which had " ſurely hapned at that inſtant, if God had not regarded him: for with a loud voice he called Abraham by his name, commanding him that he ſhould not kill his ſonne,auerring that hee had not giuen him that commandement, becauſe he tooke pleaſure in humane blood, neither for that by ſuch impietie hee would depriue them of that ſonne, of whom it was his pleaſure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to prooue his affection,to ſee whether being commanded ſuch a thing,he would be obedient; and for that he had made triall of his faith and readineſſe, and his vnſpeakeable pietie, hee did not repent him of that good he had done L vnto him: that the time ſhould neuer be wherein he would forget to haue care of him, and his race, whenſoeuer he ſhould pray vnto him, and that when the courſe of his yeers were happily ouerpaſt, he ſhould leaue a great ſigniory to thoſe of his children, which ſhould be good and legitimate. He told him moreouer,that he would multiply the race in diuers Nations,and that he would beſtow great benefits vpon them,and that the memorie of the chiefe of his of-ſpring ſhould be enuied by all men for their greatneſſe. After that God had ſpoken after this manner, it pleaſed him on the ſudden (no man knoweth how) to cauſe a Ramme to be ſeene, and found thereabouts for the ſacrifice. And thus (being deliuered from all euils and inconueniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard ſo many promiſes of ſo many bleſſings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the ſacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in M ſafety, and paſt the remnant of their liues in happineſſe, God giuing them his bleſſing in whatſoeuer they vndertooke.

CHAP. XVI.

How the Nation of the Troglodytes came of CHETVRA the Wife of ABRAHAM.

Hedio & Ruf. finus, chap. 23. Gen. 23. The age of Sarah. 127. Geneſ. 7. 25, 1.

AFTER this, Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had ſixe children, ſtrong in trauell, and excellent in wiſedome: namely Zembranes, Iazar, Madar, Madian, Louſobac, Suus, who likewiſe had ſonnes; Suus had Sabacan and Dadanes. Of Dadanes iſſued Latuſimus, Aſſurus, Luures. The children of Madian were Epha, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldas. Of all theſe children and their ſucceſſors, Abraham gathered and eſtabliſhed the Colonies which poſſeſſed the country of the Troglodytes, and al the country of Arabia the happy, whoſe confines extend euen vnto the red ſea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libya and poſſeſſed the ſame: and that his ſucceſſors (making their abode in that country) called it by the name of Africa. And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhiſtor who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the Prophet who is alſo called Malchus, & hath writtē the acts of the Iews (according as Moſes their law-maker hath compiled the ſame in writing) ſaith, that of Chetura there were diuers children borne vnto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit, Apher, Surim and Iapher; and that of Surem the Aſſyrians tooke their name: of the two others Apher and Iapher, the Citie of Affricke and the countrey of Africa take their names. That they warred with Hercules againſt Libya and Antæus, and how Hercules hauing taken Ophra his daughter to his wife, had begotten of her Dedor, who was father to Sophon, from whom thoſe Babarians that are called Sophaces haue taken their name.

But Abraham knowing that he ſhould prouide a wife for Iſaac his ſonne, being almoſt forty yeeres old, ſent the oldeſt ſeruant of his family to betroth and intreate for Rebecca the daughter of the ſonne of Nachor his brother for Iſaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with great oathes (celebrated according to theſe Ceremonies, which were, that laying their two hands one ore anothers thighes, they ſhould call God to witneſſe of their intent) he ſent alſo ſtrange preſents vnto them, ſuch as were ſeldome ſeene in thoſe parts: hee then departing from him, was long time vpon the way (becauſe that in winter time it is troubleſome to trauell thorow Meſopotamia, by reaſon of the deep bogs, and in ſummer for want of water) beſides the robberies of the country, wch ſtrāgers & trauellers could not poſſibly eſcape, except they ſtood vpon their guard, and had conuoy. Hereupon at length he arriued and entred a City called Carras, & being in the ſuburbes of the ſame, he encountred with diuers damſels that went to fetch water, whereupō he inwardly beſought God, that if the marriage were pleaſing in his ſight, he might find Rebecca amongſt them, for whoſe cauſe Abraham had ſent him thither to require her in marriage for his ſon: and that he might know her by this ſigne, that asking all the reſt for water, they ſhould refuſe him, and ſhe only ſhould ſatisfie him. Tormented & toſſed with theſe thoughts, he approched the Well, & required thoſe Virgins that they would giue him drink, wch they denied him, ſaying, that they could not get water but with great labour, wch they muſt beare into their houſes, and not lauiſhly beſtow on others: whereupon one amongſt them reproued the reſt for that diſcourtiſie, which they vſed towards the ſtranger; ſaying that they had neuer beene conuerſant amongſt men, that refuſed to giue him water that requeſted it, wherupō ſhe gaue him drink with an amiable countenance: and he conceiuing good hope of all his buſineſſe, yet being further deſirous to know the euent of the matter, he praiſed the honeſty and courtiſie of Rebecca, who had not refuſed to trauell in her owne perſon to ſatisfie his neceſſitie, asking her of what parents ſhe was, tearming them happy that had ſuch a daughter, praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant them the good hap to marry her to their contentment, and match her with a man of honeſt reputation, by whom ſhe might be plentifull in good and lawfull children: Rebecca made no difficulty to tell him the names of her Parents, (the better to gratifie him) neither concealed ſhee her owne name, but anſwered in this ſort, I am called, ſaid ſhe, Rebecca, my father was named Bathuel, thuel, who is long ſince dead. Laban is our brother, who together with my mother hath care of G all our family, and hath the charge and protection of my virginity. Which when he vnderſtood, he reioyced at al that which had hapned vnto him, and was comforted with thoſe things which he had heard, perceiuing manifeſtly how God had proſpered his iourney. Wherupon drawing out a Iewell (with certaine other ornaments, ſuch as Virgins take delight to weare) he offred them vnto the maide, telling her that he gaue her theſe preſents, in requitall of that kindnes ſhe had offred him in ſatisfying his thirſt, for that ſhe amongſt ſo many other Virgins had onely ſhewed her ſelfe affable and gracious; requiring her that he might be entertained in her brothers houſe (by reaſon that night had depriued him of the meanes from trauelling any further) and that he was charged with certaine Iewels of an eſpouſed of great price, which in no place (as H he ſaid) might be in more ſafety then in their cuſtody, whō in effect he had found ſo courteous and honeſt: aſſuring her that the vertue which appeared in her, gaue him ſufficient teſtimony both of the courteſie of her mother and brother, who would not (as he ſuppoſed) take it in ill part if he were entertained: to conclude, that he would in no wayes be chargeable vnto them, but would pay for his lodging and expences.

The talke which Abrahams ſeruant had with Rebecca.

To this Rebecca anſwered, that he had reaſon to conceiue a good opinion of her Parents humanity, but yet did in ſome ſort preiudice them in ſuſpecting their liberality, aſſuring him that his entertainment ſhould in no ſort be mercenary, but voluntary, and free and acccording to their affection. Yet firſt (ſaid ſhe) I will certifie my brother Laban hereof, and afterwards guide and entertaine you in our houſe: which done, ſhe conducted him into their tent, commanding her I brother Labans ſeruants to take care of his Camels, as for himſelfe, ſhe entertained and feaſted him at her brother Labans table.

The yeere of the world, 2124. before Christs Natiuity, 1840.

When ſupper was paſt, he ſpake both to the brother and mother of the Virgin after this manner: Abraham the ſonne of Thares is your couſin. For, Nachor (good miſtris) the grand-father of your children, was Abrahams brother of one & the ſame father and mother. He now ſendeth me vnto you, requiring you to giue this Damſell for wife to his legitimate and only ſon, educated and brought vp to be heire of all his ſubſtance: whom although he might haue matcht with the richeſt maidens of his countrey, yet hath he refuſed all of them, deſiring rather to impart this honour to one of his kindred and nation: ſet not light therefore his good affection and deſire. For, beſides all other bleſſings and good fortunes, which haue happily befallen me in this K my iourney, I haue by Gods eſpeciall prouidence, found out both the maid, & your houſe. For, at ſuch time as I drew neere the City, and beholding many Virgins that went a watering, I beſought God that I might light vpon this maiden, and he vouchſafed me my deſire: Ratifie therfore on your part this marriage contracted by Gods prouidence, and honour Abraham in granting your conſent by this your daughters marriage, whom I am ſent to requeſt at your hands, with moſt intire affection. Now they, in that they both allowed a thing ſo behoofefull, and perceiued alſo that it was conformable to the will of God, they ſent their ſiſter vnto him vnder the conditions demanded: and Iſaac then married her at ſuch time as he had the managing of Abrahams affaires, by reaſon that the other ſonnes of Abraham were already departed to take poſſeſſion of their Colonies. A Few daies after this, Abraham deceaſed (a man full of vertue vntill his laſt end) and honoured by God (according to that intire loue he had to vertue) with great affection. AFTER the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Iſaacs wife) waxed bigge with childe, and the time of her reckoning being neere at hand, Iſaac was ſore troubled, and ſought counſell at Gods hands: who anſwered him, that Rebecca ſhould bring forth two twins, and that of thoſe two ſons, two nations ſhould be deriued, both which ſhould be called by their names, and that he who ſeemed to be the leaſt of them, ſhould grow to be the greateſt: not long time after

A after(according as God had foretold him) ſhe was brought to bed of two twinnes,the eldeſt of whom was very hairy from the top of the head vnto the ſoale of the foote: and at ſuch time as he iſſued out of his mothers wombe, his younger brother held him by the heele,the Father loued the elder,who was called Eſau, and Seir by reaſon of his haire, (which the Hebrewes call Seir in their language) but the younger who was called Iacob, was dearely beloued by his mother.

Now for that a great famine raigned in that country, Iſaac (hauing reſolued to retyre himſelfe to Egypt, by reaſon of the abundance and plenty of that countrey) hee went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place King Abimelech receiued and entertained him(according to the law of hoſpitality,and the league of friendſhip which was betwixt Abraham his father and him.) In the beginning therefore, hee ſhewed vnto him great ſignes of friendſhip,but afterwards,the enuy he had conceiued, hindered him from perſiſting in the ſame: for perceiuing that God was fauourable vnto Iſaac,and had an eſpeciall care ouer him,he draue him out of his countrey: but he perceiuing well that enuy had altered him, and that Abimelech began to be changed;he retyred himſelfe not farre from Gerar into a place called the ſtraights: and as hee there digged to finde out a watering, Abimelechs ſhepheards came and ſet vpon him, and hindred him in ſuch ſort as he could not finiſh his purpoſe: and for that he purpoſely retyred from them, they verily ſuppoſed they had gotten the victory: Anon after, when he began to dig in another place, other ſhepheards of Abimelech, outraged him anew, as at the firſt: for which cauſe hee left this fountaine imperfect alſo, expecting with ripe iudgement a more conuenient opportunity,which was afterwards offered him,by reaſon that the King gaue him leaue to dig, whereupon hee laboured out a fountaine, and called it by the name of Rooboth, which ſignifieth large. And as touching the other two, he called the firſt of them Eſcon, which is as much to ſay as ſtrife: and the other Sienna, which ſignifieth hoſtility.

Thus increaſed he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech ſuppoſing that his affluence would be many wayes hurtfull vnto him, and remembring himſelfe that hee had not faithfully entertained friendſhip with him,but in ſome ſort giuen occaſion of ſuſpition, by means of ſome hard meaſure:fearing leſt hereafter the iniuries freſh in memory,ſhould more diſtract him then their old and ancient plighted friendſhip, and miſdoubting his reuenge, hee repaired vnto him,and contracted a new league of amity with him, leading with him one of his chiefeſt Captaines, as an arbiter betweene them, by whoſe meanes he obtained whatſoeuer hee required: ſo courteous was Iſaac, and ſo ready in memory of his fathers old couenant to forgiue new iniuries. And ſo Abimelech hauing obtained his purpoſe, returned to his houſe. Eſau one of the two ſonnes of Iſaac (whom the father eſpecially loued aboue all the reſt) hauing attained the age of forty yeeres, tooke two wiues Ada, the daughter of Edom, and Alibama the daughter of Eſebeon,two Princes of the Chanaanites (and that of his owne authority, without his fathers aduice or priuity,who would not haue conſented, had the matter been remitted vnto him,becauſe he held it inconuenient to mixe and ioyne him,or his, in affinity with any dwellers or inhabitants of the countrey.) This notwithſtanding, he would not diſpleaſe his ſonne by commanding him to giue ouer his wiues: but determined with himſelfe to conceale and keepe the matter ſilent.

E Eſau his wiues.

When Iſaac was waxen old and wholly depriued of his ſight,he called for Eſau his ſonne and ſaid vnto him: that although he had not any default or blindneſſe in him,yet his age would hinder him to doe that ſeruice, which he both ought and wiſhed to doe: and therefore he willed him to goe on hunting, and that he ſhould make ready ſome meate for him that he might eate, and after his repaſt,he might pray vnto God that it would pleaſe him to be aſſiſtant vnto him all his life time,and bee a comforter and aide vnto him: proteſting moreouer, that ſince he was vncertaine of the houre of his death,he thought good to bleſſe him,and by his prayers to procure Gods mercy towards him,before he ſlept with the dead. Hereupon Eſau went on hunting: but Rebecca in the meane time(deſirous that Iſaacs bleſſing ſhould light vpon her ſonne Iacob) contrarie to her husbands intent and minde, commanded him to goe, and kill two kids, and prepare a repaſt for his father. Iacob beeing obſequious and obedient to his mother in all things, fulfilled her command, and as ſoone as the meate was ready, hee wrapped his armes and couered his hands with the Goats skins,hoping by the hairineſſe thereof,to make his father beleeue,that hee was Eſau. For being his brother at one and the ſame birth, he reſembled him in all things, except in the thing onely: but fearing leſt hee ſhould be ſurprized in his ſubtilty before his father Iſaac had finiſhed his prayers,and in ſtead of his bleſſings he might be loaden with his curſes,he prepreſented the meat vnto his father. But Iſaac perceiuing ſome alteration in his voice, called his ſonne, who ſtretching out his hands vnto him couered with the kids skinnes, Thou art (ſaith he) more like vnto Iacob in thy voice; but by thy hairineſſe, thou ſeemeſt vnto me to be Eſau. Thus ſuſpecting no deceit, and hauing already eaten, hee addreſſed himſelfe to pray, and called vpon God, ſaying, O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou haſt promiſed great bleſſings vnto my father, and haſt giuen me many and preſent felicities, and haſt vowed that thou wouldſt be mercifull vnto my poſterity, and plentifully powre vpon them more and more ample benefits: let this thy fauour, I beſeech thee, be continued towards me, neither deſpiſe thou me by reaſon of this my preſent weakneſſe, which is the cauſe that I haue more need of thy helpe. Saue and keepe this my ſon by thy clemency, warrantize him from all euill, giue him a happy life, and poſſeſſion of all bleſſings and benefits which are in thy power to beſtow vpon him: make him fearefull to his enemies, and gracious to his friends. Thus prayed he vnto God, thinking he had bleſſed Eſau. Scarce had he finiſhed his prayers, but Eſau returned from hunting, which though Iſaac perceiued, he was no waies moued with diſpleaſure, but held himſelfe ſilent. Eſau beſought him that he might obtaine as much as he had vouchſafed his brother: but Iſaac denied him, in that he had beſtowed all his bleſſings vpon Iacob: for which cauſe Eſau lamented and wept. His father (amated and moued by his teares) foretold him that he ſhould excell in hunting, in force of body, in armes, and other ſuch exerciſes, whereby he ſhould purchaſe immortal glory both to himſelfe and his poſterity, yet notwithſtanding that he ſhould be his brothers vaſſall. But for that Iacob feared leſt his brother ſhould ſeeke to bee reuenged of him for robbing him of his fathers bleſſing, he was by his mothers means deliuered from this perill. For ſhe perſwaded her husband to take Iacob a wife neere allied vnto her, out of Meſopotamia. Eſau at that time had married another wife called Baſſemath the daughter of Iſmael: for neither Iſaac nor his were well-affectioned towards the Chanaanites: but were offended by reaſon of his former eſpouſals. For which cauſe Eſau to giue them contentment married Baſſemath, whom afterward hee loued more entirely then all the reſt.

Eſau required a bleſſing.

CHAP. XIX.

Gen. 28.

BVt Iacob being ſent into Meſopotamia by his mother, vnder hope to marry the daughter of Laban her brother, (whereunto Iſaac conſented through the counſell of his wife) paſſed thorow the country of Chanaan. And for that there was a conceiued and open hatred betwixt Iſaacs people and the inhabitants of Chanaan, he would not take vp his lodging amongſt any of them, but lay abroad in the fields, reſting his head vpon ſtones, which he had heaped together in ſtead of a pillow: and during the time of his reſt, this viſion following was preſented vnto him. It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a ladder, that extending it ſelfe from the earth, reached vp vnto heauen, along the ſteps whereof there deſcended certaine reſemblances more excellent to looke on, then the ordinary port of humane nature could impart, and on the top thereof God manifeſtly appeared, and calling him by his name, ſpake vnto him after this manner: Iacob, ſure thou art the ſon of a good father, and deſcended from a grandfather renowned and famous for his great vertue: thou muſt not be daunted, or appauled by thy preſent trauels, but rather be confirmed in hope of future good hap. For by mine aſſiſtance thou ſhalt be bleſſed, and endowed with many benefits. For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the countrey of Meſopotamia, at ſuch time as he was purſued by his parents: I haue alſo made thy father happy, and will be no leſſe gracious and fauourable vnto thy ſelfe.

God ſpeaketh vnto Iacob.

Be confident therefore, and proſecute thy iourney vnder mine aſſiſtance. The marriage which thou purſueſt ſhall haue a happy iſſue, and thou ſhalt haue good children, who in number ſhall grow infinite, and ſhall likewiſe leaue after them a plentifull and famous poſterity, and I wil giue them the ſoueraignty ouer this country, both to them and their ſucceſſors, and they ſhall people and repleniſh both the earth and the Sea, as farre as the Sunne enlightneth the world. Let not therefore any danger diſmay thee, nor trauaile diſcomfort thee: for beſides all this, whatſoeuer thou ſhalt vndertake, I will not ceaſe to aſſiſt thee. Theſe things did God foretell vnto Iacob, who very highly reioycing at that which he had ſeene, and that which had beene denounced vnto him, anointed the ſtones on which the promiſes of ſo many bleſſings had beene made, and vowed to offer ſacrifice vnto God on the ſame, if at ſuch time as hee had attained the good hee ſought, he ſhould grant him the grace to returne in health and ſafety into his countrey: which

A as ſoone as he returned backe, he performed, offering vnto God the tenth of all that which he had giuen him. And as touching the place where the Viſion appeared vnto him, he hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greeke Tongue ſignifieth the Houſe of God. Continuing thus his journey into Meſopotamia, he trauelled ſo long, till at laſt he arriued at Charran: and hauing met in the ſuburbs of the Citie with certaine ſhepheards and yong men, accompanied with yong maidens, ſitting neere to a certaine fountaine, he drew neere vnto them, deſiring them to giue him drinke; and falling in diſcourſe with them, he asked them, Whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet aliue? All of them anſwered, That they knew him well; and that he was a man of that reputation, that his name could not be concealed; that his daughter was accuſtomed to feede her flocke with them, and that they wondred that ſhe was
B not yet arriued; of whom (ſaid they) thou mayſt perfectly vnderſtand all that which thou deſireſt to know. Whileſt thus they paſt the time in talke, the Damſell drew neere, accompanied with her ſhepheards; whom one of the companie informed, that Iacob was inquiſitiue after her father: who, rejoycing after the manner of yong maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what neceſſitie had driuen him thither? wiſhing ſhee had the meanes to ſupply whatſoeuer his neceſſities required. Iacob being ouercome, not by the force of affinitie, or by her good behauiour and courteſie, but with the loue of the maiden, was inflamed, ſeeing her ſo faire and matchleſſe in beautie, and ſaid vnto her: If thou art the daughter of Laban, there is a greater and more ancient conjunction betwixt both thy father, thy ſelfe, and me, then either thy yeeres or my birth can attaine vnto: for, Abraham, Aran, and Nachor, were Thares ſonnes; Bathuel, thy grand-father,
C was Nachors ſonne; Iſaac, my father, was the ſonne of Abraham; and Sara, daughter of Aran. There is yet a neerer and dearer bond of friendſhip, wherewith we are linked one vnto another: for, Rebecca, my mother, is ſiſter vnto Laban thy father, borne of one father & mother; ſo that you and I are couſins: and therefore now am I come at this preſent to ſalute you, and renew that ancient loue which our alliance requireth at our hands. But ſhe remembring her of all thoſe things which her father was wont to report and diſcourſe of Rebecca, and knowing, that her Parents were deſirous to heare ſome newes from her, ſhe wept for joy, remembring her of the loue of her father, and hung about his necke, and embraced the yong man; and after ſhe had ſaluted him, ſhe ſaid vnto him: Thou bringeſt a moſt deſired and great pleaſure to my father and all his family, who neuer forgetteth thy mother, but oftentimes maketh mention of her; and would eſteeme it
D a great felicitie, to heare tidings from her. Then deſired ſhe him preſently to follow her to her father, leſt any longer he might be depriued of ſo deſired a pleaſure. This ſaid, ſhe brought him vnto Laban; where, being acknowledged by his Vncle, he both by that meanes liued ſecurely amongſt his friends, as alſo brought him great contentment, by his vnexpected acceſſe vnto them. Some few dayes after, this Laban told him, that he tooke ſo much contentment in his preſence, that he could not expreſſe it in words; yet required he him to manifeſt the cauſe that had induced him to leaue his father and mother in that extreme age, at ſuch time as they had moſt need of him, to find him out: moreouer, he promiſed him all aſſiſtance and fauour in whatſoeuer caſe he had to make vſe of him. Whereupon Iacob diſcourſed vnto him the whole matter: that Iſaac had two ſonnes; himſelfe, and Eſau: that his brother (in that, by his mothers deuice and coun-
E ſell, he had defrauded him of his fathers bleſſing) ſought and deſired to kill him, as he that was the rauiſher of that principalitie from him that was deſtinated vnto him by God, and the ſurpriſer of all his fathers other intended Vowes: that this, as alſo his mothers command, was the cauſe why he came thither; by reaſon they are all brothers, and by reaſon that in eſpeciall his mother was their neereſt akinne: telling him, that next after God, he hoped to find his greateſt aſſiſtance and helpe by the meanes of his Vncle. Whereupon Laban promiſing vnto him whatſoeuer humanitie he could imagine (as well in reſpect of their common anceſtors, as for the loue he bare vnto his mother; towards whom, although ſhe were abſent, he would expreſſe his good affection, in ſhewing himſelfe well affected towards him that was there preſent:) he told him then, that he would giue him the charge of his flocke, and make him maſter ouer all his ſhep-F heards; and that when he ſhould thinke good to returne backe againe to his friends, he ſhould depart with ſuch rewards and honours as might well beſeeme a friend ſo neerely allyed vnto him as he was. Which when Iacob vnderſtood, he anſwered, That he would willingly endure any ſort of labour in Labans ſeruice, and that his deuoire towards him would be a delight to himſelfe: but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to Wife; who deſerued to be honoured by him with no leſſe Title, for many cauſes; but in eſpeciall, for that ſhe had brought him thither: auowing, that the loue which he bare vnto her, was the cauſe why he vſed thoſe ſpeeches. Laban (being

(being highly delighted and contented with this his discourse) granted him his consent in the marriage, telling him, that he could not haue wisht for a better sonne in law: and that if he would sojourne a while with him, he would make him Lord of all that his heart desired, especially for that he was no wayes minded to send his daughter among the Chanaanites; and that it repented him, that (by reason of marriage) his sister had beene drawne thither. Iacob condescended vpon these conditions, and couenanted to abide with him for the space of seuen yeeres (for he determined to serue his father in law during that terme of yeeres, to the end, that hauing made proofe of his vertue, it might the better appeare what he was.) Now the time which was couenanted betweene them being expired, and Iacob expecting the contented possession of his loue which was promised him, Laban prepared a nuptiall feast: and when the night drew on, and Iacob least suspected, he bringeth his daughter, lesse faire in face, and more elder in yeeres, and layeth her by him; who deceiued with the darkenesse, and for that he had drunke liberally, lay with her: but the day after discouering the deceit, he questioned with Laban, and accused him; who asked him pardon, alledging the necessitie which inforced him to doe that which he did. For, he had not brought in Lea vnder intent to deceiue him, but that the custome of the countrey compelled him thereunto: yet that the same should no wayes hinder him, but that he should enioy Rachel, and receiue, see, and haue vse of her, after seuen yeeres more were fully expired. Herewith Iacob grew pacified, and suffered himselfe to be perswaded (in that the loue which he bare vnto Rachel, suffered him to doe no otherwayes) and when the other seuen yeeres were expired, he married Rachel. Now, both of these had two chamber-maids, which their father had giuen them: Leas maide was called Zelpha, and Rachels, Bala; who were no slaues, but onely subjects. Lea was touched with great griefe, in that Iacob bare greater affection to her sister then to her selfe, bethinking her oftentimes, that if she might haue children, she should be better esteemed and beloued by her husband: for which cause she continually besought Almightie God, that it might please him to giue her issue: whereupon it happened that God gaue her a sonne, and Iacobs affection was turned towards her; for which cause shee called him Ruben, that is to say, the sonne of Vision, because she had obtained him through the mercie of God.

After him she bare three children; Simeon, (whose name signifieth, that God had heard her) Leui, (which is as much to say, as the firmenesse of societie) and last of all Iuda, (which signifieth thanksgiuing.) At that time Rachel fearing lest she should lose the better part of her husbands loue, by reason of the fertilitie and fruitfulnesse of her sister, caused her chamber-maid Bala to lye with him; by whom he had a sonne called Dan, that is to say, the judgement of God; and after him Nepthalim, (which signifieth ingenious; by reason, that she vsed subtiltie to requite her sisters subtilitie.) In like sort, of Zelpha he begat Gad, (which signifieth aduenturous) and after him Asar, (that is to say, good hap bringer) because that Lea was more honoured by the multitude of her progenie.

Ruben, the eldest of all the sonnes of Lea, brought his mother Apples of Mandragora; which when Rachel had perceiued, she desired her to giue her a part thereof, in that she longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yeeld no consent, replying, That she ought to content her selfe, in that she had the prerogatiue in loue, in respect of both their beloued, which was Iacob. Rachel mollifying the heart of her sister with kind words, said vnto her, That she would be content that Iacob should lye with her for that night; which Iacob performed for the loue of Rachel: and Lea once more had children, namely, Isachar, (which signifieth, Come by hire) and Zabulon, which importeth a pledge of good will; besides whom, she had a daughter also, called Dina. Not long after this, Rachel lay with Iacob, & brought forth a sonne, who was called Ioseph; which name signifieth an addition. During all this time (which was for the space of twentie yeeres) Iacob had the gouernment of his father in lawes flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanied with his wiues) to returne to his owne inheritance: which when his father in law perceiued, he would in no sort giue his consent thereunto; for which cause, he couertly determined to forsake him. To this intent he made triall of his wiues, to see how they were affected towards his flight; who hartned him by their consents: insomuch, as Rachel hauing surprized the Images of those gods which were honored in that country, fled away with her sister; who both of them led with them all their children on both sides, their handmaids, with the rest of all their substance. Iacob also draue away the moitie of the cattell, without the witting or will of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the Images of the gods, althogh she had bin taught by Iacob to contemne them, and yeeld them no honor: but she supposed, that if Laban pursued & ouertook them, in hauing recourse to them, she might obtaine pardon. But Laban, a day after the departure of Iacob and his wiues, had

A had notice thereof;and being therewith ſore agrieued,he purſued after them,intending to aſſaile them by force, and on the ſeuenth day hee ouertooke them, vpon a certaine hill where they ſat them downe to take their reſt,in that it was euening:butGod appearing to him in a dreame,gaue him counſell to vſe no violence, neither towards his ſonne in law, nor his daughters;but rather to pacifie his yre towards them,and to liſten to a peaceable accord betwixt himſelfe and Iacob: aſſuring him that if in contempt of Iacobs weakneſſe he ſhould lift vp his arme to aſſaile him, that he himſelfe would ioyne with Iacob to yeeld him ſuccours. The yeere of the world, 2200. before the Natiuitie of Chriſt.1758.

The next day, after that Laban had receiued this Oracle from the mouth of God,as ſoone as it was day he called Iacob vnto him, to the end they might conferre together (hiding nothing from him which the night before he had beheld in his dreame.)As ſoone as Iacob was come vn-
B to him vnder ſafe conduct, he began to accuſe him; alledging that he had receiued him into his houſe, at ſuch time as he came vnto him being poore and naked of all meanes: and how he had giuen him great aboundance of goods. I haue (ſaith hee) giuen thee my daughters in marriage, hoping by that meanes to increaſe thy loue towards me more and more; but thou haſt had neither reſpect of thy mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and mee, neither of the wiues which thou haſt eſpouſed,neither of thy children whoſe grandfather I am; but haſt dealt with me after an iniurious and hoſtile manner, driuing away that which appertained vnto me,ſeducing my daughters to abandon him that begat them,and carry away my houſhold gods with them,which both I and my predeceſſours haue ſerued and honoured; and euen as much,as men of warre would not haue done vnto their enemies,that haſt thou done vnto me:
C yea thou that art my kinſman, my ſiſters ſonne, the husband of my daughters, my pledge and my familiar ſeruant,haſt dealt thus with me: On the other ſide Iacob alleadged for himſelfe,that God had not onely made impreſſion in his heart,but thar all men alſo are wholly addicted to the loue of their countrey;and that after ſo long ſpace of time, it ſeemed good vnto him to viſit his natiue ſoyle. And as concerning that crime (ſaith he) which thou obiecteſt againſt me,as touching the prey,if any other but thy ſelfbe Iudge,thou ſhalt be conuicted to haue dealt vniuſtly with me: for whereas thou oughteſt to haue rewarded me, for the maintenance and increaſe I haue made of thy goods,haſt thou not done vs great wrong to enuie vs a little part and portion thereof? And as concerning thy daughters,know this,that they haue not followed me by reaſon they haue been conueyed away by ſubtiltie,but vnder that loue and duty which married wiues beare
D vnto their husbands: they doe not therefore onely follow me, but they come after their children. Theſe things alleadged he for himſelfe. Further he replyed and accuſed Laban, becauſe that being his mothers brother,and hauing giuen his daughters to wife,he had notwithſtanding bitterly vexed him by his ſeuere commandements, vnder which he had beene obedient during the ſpace of twenty yeeres, that the troubles he had endured vnder colour of marriage with Rachel had beene cumberſome vnto him; yet notwithſtanding that it was but a trifle in reſpect of that which he ſuffered afterwards; which, had he borne him an enuious affection or hoſtile hatred, he could very well haue eſcaped. In effect Laban had dealt moſt maliciouſly with Iacob. For ſeeing that God aſſiſted him in all that he enterprized, Laban promiſed to giue him all the cattell that were borne white,and ſometime that which was brought forth blacke:and when as E that which Iacob had named and choſen did increaſe, then did not Laban performe his promiſe vnto him, but deferred him ouer to the next yeeres increaſe, by reaſon he had alwaies a reſpect of the greater flocke, and promiſed that which he hoped would not come to paſſe, and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe.And as touching the gods,he told him that he might make ſearch for them.

This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel vnderſtanding thereof, thruſt the ſaid gods into a ſacke, and made them to be carried on a Camels backe, and ſhee ſat vpon them, ſaying, that ſhe was indiſpoſed, by reaſon at that time ſhee had her naturall purgations. And for this cauſe Laban deſiſted from ſearching any further,ſuppoſing his daughter being ſo affected would not conceale or ſet her ſelfe ſo neere things that were ſo ſacred: and he made a couenant with F Iacob, that none of them ſhould call to remembrance the interchangeable vnkindneſſes that had paſt betwixt them,but that he ſhould cheriſh his daughters, all which they bound with an oath. This couenant was made vpon a certaine mountaine, where they reared a pillar in the forme of an Altar: whence it came to paſſe that this pillar was called Galaad, that is to ſay, the hill of witneſſe, from whence the countrey of Galaad had taken his name euen vntill this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banquetted together, Laban returned backe againe into his owne countrey.

Iacob ſendeth meſſengers to his brother Eſau.

But as Iacob trauelled towards the countrey of Chanaan, he encountred many viſions, which preſaged vnto him good hope and fortunes to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, The Field of God. And being deſirous to know how his brother Eſau was affected towards him, he ſent meſſengers before him to ſound and gather the exact truth thereof, by reaſon he ſtood in feare leſt the memory of his old diſcontent ſhould be renewed: charging his meſſengers to ſignifie vnto Eſau, that Iacob (deeming it to be a thing inconuenient to liue with his brother, who was diſpleaſed with him) had of his owne free will forſaken the countrey, and that at this preſent he was vpon his returne, thinking that the length of time were ſufficient to procure a reconciliation betweene them. He therefore led with him his wiues and children, with all thoſe riches which God had giuen him; offering himſelfe vnto Eſau with all that of moſt eſteeme which he had, by reaſon that he thought it the greateſt benefit that might happen to him, to impart vnto his brother a part of thoſe commodities, which he had receiued at Gods hands. All which they ſignified vnto Eſau, who reioyced very much thereat, and went foorth to meete his brother, accompanied with foure hundred armed men. But Iacob hearing that he marched forward to meete him, attended by ſo many men at armes, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he prouided for the time, leſt any detriment ſhould happen vnto him, ſtudying euery way to defend both him, and his, from inuaſion. Whereupon diuiding his troupes, he cauſed ſome to march before, and the reſt to follow ſpeedily after: ſo that if any did aſſault the firſt, they might retire themſelues to the troupe that followed.

Iacob reconcileth his brother with rewards.

After this manner hauing ordered all things about him, he ſent certaine with preſents to his brother, namely, with beaſts of charge, and a great number of diuers kinds of foure-footed beaſts, (which for their rareneſſe might worke more content and admiration in thoſe to whom they were preſented.) All theſe marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountred thus in rankes, they might ſeeme to be of greater number then they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any diſcontent in the heart of Eſau, theſe preſents might ſerue to mitigate the ſame. He commanded them alſo that marched formoſt, that they ſhould vſe courteous ſalutation towards Eſau. Hauing thus all the day diſpoſed his troupes, as ſoone as the night was come, he cauſed all his companies to march, who paſſed the riuer of Iaboch: but Iacob, who was left hindmoſt, was encountred with a viſion, in which hee wraſtled with an apparition, and hee became victor.

Iacob wraſtleth with an Angel, and is called Iſrael.

Now this viſion ſpake vnto him, exhorting him to reioyce at that which had hapned vnto him, aſſuring him that he had not atchieued an eaſie matter, but that he had ſurmounted an Angell of God, which was a ſigne of great good which would befortune him, and that his poſterity ſhould be inuincible, and that neuer man whatſoeuer hee were, ſhould ouercome him: commanding him to call his name Iſrael, that is to ſay, according to the Hebrewes, a reſiſter of an Angell. Theſe things were foretold vnto Iacob vpon his requeſt, who perceiuing alſo that he was an Angel of God, prayed him to informe him of that which ſhould happen vnto him: which the viſion did, and afterwards vaniſhed. Iacob tooke great pleaſure thereat, and called the place Phanuel, that is to ſay, the face of God: and for that in wraſtling he had hurt his broad nerue, he afterwards abſtained from eating of the ſame, and by reaſon thereof our nation doe neuer feede thereon.

Now when he had intelligence that his brother neerely approached him, he commanded his wiues that they ſhould march forward euery one with their handmaidens, to the end that they might from afarre behold the fight of the men, if ſo be that his brother ſhould aſſaile them. But himſelfe he humbled in reuerencing his brother, who drew neere vnto him, without intent of circumuention; and Eſau ſaluted him, and enquired of him as touching the companies of women and children; and after he vnderſtood how all went, he was deſirous to lead them to his father.

Gen. 34.

Iacob cõmeth to Scenas.

But Iacob excuſed himſelfe, by reaſon of the wearineſſe of his cattell, and Eſau retired to Sair where he made his abode, and had impoſed that name on that countrey, by reaſon of his thicke haire. Iacob alſo retired himſelfe to a place, which at this day is alſo called the Tents, and from thence into Sichem, a city of the Chanaanites.

The Hiſtory of Dina, Iacobs daughter.

Now at ſuch time as the Sichemites celebrated their feaſt, Dina which was Iacobs only daughter, went into the city to ſee the brauery of the women of that countrey. But Sichem the ſonne of King Emmor rauiſhed her, and deflowred her: and being ſurpriſed with her loue, hee beſought his father that he might take her to wife: who liſtening therunto, went vnto Iacob, praying him to ioyne Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his ſonne Sichem. Iacob not daring to contradict him by reaſon of his authority and qualitie; and on the other ſide, not thinking it to be

A be eyther a thing lawfull, or conuenient, to match his daughter with a ſtranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to conſult thereupon. Hereon the King departed, hoping that Iacob would liſten to the marriage. But Iacob hauing diſcouered vnto his ſonnes the rauiſhment of their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, deſired them to deliberate amongſt themſelues, what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon ſome held their peace, not knowing what to ſay; but Simeon and Leui (the brothers of the ſame Wombe, with their ſiſter) complotted together this practice: In as much as it was a feſtiuall, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleaſure, and banquetting, they iſſued by night vpon their firſt guards, and killed them that were a bed; and from thence entring into the Citie, they killed all the males (and with them, the King and his ſonne) but to the women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the know-
B ledge of their father, they brought their ſiſter backe againe. Iacob was very much aſtoniſhed at this accident, ſo ſtrangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared vnto him, and comforted him, and commanded him, that he ſhould purifie his Tents, and accompliſh thoſe ſacrifices which he had vowed to performe, at ſuch time when firſt he went into Meſopotamia, and the Viſion appeared vnto him. Whileſt then he cleanſed thoſe which followed him, he found the gods of Laban, which (beſide his knowledge) Rachel had ſtolne, and hid them in Sichem, in the earth, vnder an Oake.

Afterwards departing from thence, he ſacrificed in Bethel, where he had ſeene the Viſion, at ſuch time as he firſt of all tooke his journey into Meſopotamia: and as he trauailed in the Land of Ephrata, Rachel died in child-bed, and was buried there: (and ſhe onely hath not enjoyed the C honour, which is done in Hebron to thoſe of her parentage.) After he had made great lamentation, he named the child which ſhe bare at that time, Beniamin, (by reaſon of the dolours which happened vnto his mother.) Theſe are all the children of Iacob, twelue males, and one daughter; of whom, eight were begotten on his lawfull Wiues; ſixe of Lea, and two of Rachel; and on their chamber-maids, foure; two, of each of them; whoſe names I haue heretofore recorded. From thence went Iacob to Hebron, a Citie of Chanaan, where Iſaac made his abode; and they liued but a ſmall time together, becauſe Rachel was dead, and departed from him.

How ESAV and IACOB, ISAACS ſonnes, diuided their inhabitance: and how Idumæa fell to ESAVS lot, and Chanaan to IACOBS.

The yeere of the world, 2230. before Chriſts Natiuity, 1734.

BVT when Iſaac was dead, the ſonnes diuided their habitations among themſelues, and were neither of them content with that which they inherited by their father: but Eſau leauing the Citie of Hebron to his brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was Lord of the countrey of Idumæa; which he named by his name (for it was ſurnamed Edom) for the occaſion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day ſore wearied, trauailed, and hungry, from hunting: and finding his brother dreſſing for himſelfe a Meſſe of Lentill Pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreaſed and incenſed his appetite; he required them at his hands, that he might eate them. But he taking the opportunitie and occaſion of his brother Eſau's hunger, conſtrained him to forſake his birth-right, and to ſell him the ſame, on condition, he ſhould giue him what to eate. Eſau then tranſported with famine, ſurrendred vnto him his birth-right, and confirmed it with a ſolemne oath. And thereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockerie, called him Edom, by reaſon of his red meat; for Edom in Hebrew, ſignifieth Red. His countrey likewiſe was called Edom. But the Greekes, to the end they might make the name more currant, called it Idumæa. He became the father of fiue children: of whom, he had three by his Wife Alibamma, whoſe names were Iaus, Iolamus, and Choræus: as touching the other two, Aliphaces was the ſonne of Aza; and Raguel, of Moſametha: theſe children had Eſau. Aliphaces had fiue legitimate children, Theman, Omar, Ophus, Iotham, Ocauaxes, (for Amelech was illegitimate, borne by one of his Concubines, whoſe name was Themana.) Theſe dwelled in that part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitus; and in that part, which by reaſon of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For, Idumæa being in times paſt a Land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorow the whole countrey: and the particular Prouinces of the ſame, kept the names of thoſe that firſt inhabited the ſame.

The yeere of the world, 2106. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1658.

BVT Iacob attained to that felicitie, that ſcarcely any other had beene ſo happy; for he ſurpaſſed all the inhabitants of that countrey in riches: and by reaſon of the vertues of his children, he was both enuied and regarded. For, they were accompliſhed in all perfections, animated and endowed with ſtout hearts, prepared to execute any worke of the hand, and to endure all ſorts of trauaile: finally, all of them were furniſhed with knowledge and prouidence. But God had ſuch care of him, and ſo diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which ſeemed vnto him to be griefefull and contrary, he brought to an iſſue proſperous for him, and encreaſefull for his riches; and brought to paſſe, that both he and his children were the firſt motiue to our anceſtors to forſake the Land of Ægypt, for that cauſe which here enſueth. Iacob hauing begotten Ioſeph of Rachel, loued him entirely, both in reſpect of the beautie of his body, as alſo of the ornaments and vertues of his ſpirit: and beſides both theſe, his prudence, wherein he out-ſtripped all his other brothers. This cordiall affection of his father, moued enuie and hatred amongſt his brothers towards him. And beſides theſe, the Dreames which he had ſeene, and told both to his father and brethren; which fore-prophecied vnto him a ſingular felicitie. For, it is the common cuſtome of men to be jealous of their proſperitie, with whom they are familiar.

Gen. 37. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2.

Iacobs ſonnes hated their brother Ioſeph.

Now the Viſions which Ioſeph ſaw in his Dreame, were theſe. Being ſent by his father, in the companie of his brothers, to reape Corne in the time of Harueſt, he ſaw a Viſion (farre different from thoſe which accuſtomably happen in ſleepe) which (as ſoone as he awoke) he told vnto his brethren, to the end they ſhould interpret it. He told them therefore, that he thought in his Dreame the night paſt, that his ſheafe of Corne was ſettled in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs ranne towards his, and worſhipped the ſame. Which Viſion of his, ſeemed to foretell him of his ample fortune; and how he ſhould obtaine the Lordſhip ouer all of them. But they concealed all theſe things from Ioſeph; making ſhew, that they could in no ſort interpret the Dreame: but being by themſelues apart, they breathed forth contrarie imprecations; wiſhing, that Ioſephs Dreame.

A that nothing of that which they interpreted, as touching his Dreame, might take effect, but perſeuering more and more in enuie and hatred towards him. But God (oppoſing his power againſt their enuie) ſent Ioſeph a ſecond and more ſtrange Viſion: for he dreamed, that the Sunne, the Moone, and eleuen of the ſtarres deſcended downe to the earth, and humbled themſelues before him. Which Viſion he reuealed to his father, in the preſence of his brethren, (without ſuſpition of any hatred in them towards him) and beſought him to interpret vnto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Iacob, he greatly rejoyced at this Dreame, by reaſon he conceiued in his mind the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his conjectures not raſhly, but with prudence) he rejoyced at thoſe great matters which were ſignified by that Dreame: which fore-told, that his ſonne Ioſeph ſhould be highly fortunate, and happy; and that the time ſhould
B come, in which his father, mother, and brethren ſhould honour him, and worſhip before him. For, he compared the Moone (which ripeneth and encreaſeth all things that grow) to his mother; and the Sunne (which giueth forme and force) to his father. And as touching his brothers, who were eleuen in number, he compared them to the eleuen ſtarres, (which receiued their force both from the Sunne and the Moone.) Neither did Iacob, without judgement and conſideration, ſo interpret this Viſion. But Ioſephs brothers were highly aggrieued at this preſage, conceiuing as hainouſly and hatefully thereof, as if this felicitie had beene portended to a ſtranger, and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatſoeuer, being as well allyed in felicitie vnto him, as in conſanguinitie. Whereupon they reſolued on his death and deſtruction: and hauing complotted theſe counſailes amongſt themſelues, and gathered in C their Harueſt, they retyred themſelues with their flockes, towards Sichem, (which was a part of that countrey) very fit to nouriſh and feede their cattell; where they kept their flockes, without giuing any notice of their departure to their father. But he perceiuing that no man came from the Heard, that might tell him any tydings, being ſorrowfull and carefull of his ſonnes, he ſent Ioſeph to the flockes, to vnderſtand how they did, and how their affaires proſpered.

CHAP. III.

How IOSEPH was ſold into Egypt by his brethren, and grew in great credit in that countrey: and how his brethren at length were vnder his ſubiection.

BVT ſo ſoone as they ſaw their brother comming towards them, they rejoyced, not as at the arriuall of one of their houſehold friends, ſent vnto them by their father, but as if their enemie had encountred them; who by the will of God was deliuered into their hands. They therfore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let ſlip the preſent opportunitie. But Ruben, the eldeſt amongſt them, ſeeing their diſpoſition and conſpiracie to kill him, endeuored to diſſwade them; ſetting before their eyes, how haynous and wicked the enterpriſe was, and what hatred they might incurre thereby. For (ſaid he) if before God and before men it be a wicked and deteſtable thing, to lay hands on, and to murther a ſtranger; how much more haynous a crime will it be held for vs, to be conuicted to be the murtherers of our brother? whoſe
E death will heape ſorrow on our fathers head, and draw our mother into great griefe and deſolation, through the loſſe of her ſonne, robbed and bereft from her, beyond the ordinarie courſe of men. For which cauſe, he prayed them to be aduiſed in theſe things; and that they would conſider in their mindes, what thing might happen, if this child, who was faire, vertuous, and yong, ſhould be done to death: praying them to giue ouer this vnnaturall reſolution, and to feare God, who was both the Iudge and Witneſſe of their deliberation intended againſt their brother: and that if they would deſiſt from this haynous act, God would take pleaſure in their repentance and reconcilement: but if they proceeded in their enterpriſe, he aſſured them, that he would puniſh them like fratricides; ſince nothing is hidden from his prouidence, whether it be committed in the Deſart, or attempted in the Citie. For, whereſoeuer men are, there is it alwayes
F to be thought, that God likewiſe is. Further, that when they ſhould haue perpetrated this fact, they ſhould alwayes haue their Conſciences as an armed Aduerſarie againſt them, which neuer would forſake them, whether they were good, or whether ſuch as theirs would be, if they ſhould fortune to murther their brother. Furthermore he alledged, that it was an impious fact to kill a mans owne brother, although he had done him injurie; and much more meritorious, to forgiue a mans friend, that had offended againſt him. Moreouer he ſaid, that Ioſeph had done them no wrong, whoſe tender yeeres rather required care and compaſſion at their hands, then hate and tyrannie. Besides that, the cause of his slaughter would aggrauate their offence, G if it should be knowne, that for enuie of his future felicitie they should take away his life; all which good hap they likewise might participate, by reason of consanguinitie: and that it was their dutie to thinke, that whatsoeuer blessing God imparted to Ioseph, was theirs; and that for that cause they were to imagine, that God would be more displeased against them, if they should endeuour to depriue him of his life, whom he had esteemed and adjudged worthy of prosperitie to come. Ruben alledging these and many other things, besought them and laboured to diuert them from shedding their brothers bloud. But seeing that all these his motiues could in no sort mollifie them, but that they hastened the rather to commit and perpetrate the murther; he counselled them, that at least-wise they should allot him some milder kinde of death: telling them, that he endeuoured all what in him lay, at the first to dissuade them. But since it was throughly H resolued among them, that he should not liue; that lesse mischiefe should follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counsaile: for by that meanes their will should haue effect, yet a more milde, and lesse hurtfull, in comparison of murther; that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keepe them immaculate, by casting him into the next Pit, and there leauing him in the hands of death. To this counsaile, all of them agreed. So Ruben tooke Ioseph, and bound him with cords, and let him downe easily into a Pit, which was dric: which done, he departed, to seeke out a more conuenient place for pasture.

Ioſeph commeth vnto his brothers, who reſolue to murther him.

Ruben perswadeth them to cast Ioseph into a Pit. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 3.

Gen. 37. 39.

But when Ruben was gone, Iuda, one of Iacobs sonnes, (espying certaine merchants of Arabia, of the countrey of the Ismaelites, who from the countrey of Galadena carried Spicerie and Syrian merchandise into Ægypt) counselled his brothers to draw vp Ioseph out of the Well, and to I sell him to those Arabians: assuring them, by that meanes it would come to passe, that Ioseph should die the farther off from them, amongst strangers; and as touching themselues, they should be exempt from that pollution. Which counsell of his being commended by them all, they drew Ioseph out of the Pit, and sold him to the Arabians for the summe of twentie siluerlings, at such time as he was seuenteene yeeres of age. Now had Ruben resolued in himselfe to saue Ioseph, without his brothers priuitie: for which cause comming by night vnto the Pit, he called him with a loud voice; and seeing that he gaue him no answer, he began to conjecture with himselfe, that his brethren had done him to death; he reproued them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gaue ouer his mourning. After these things were thus brought to passe, the brethren consulted among themselues, in what sort they might cleere K themselues from their fathers suspition; and concluded among themselues, to teare the Coat wherewith Ioseph was attired at such time as he came vnto them, and which they had taken from him when they cast him into the Well; to the end, that hauing defiled it in the bloud of a Goat, they might afterwards beare it vnto their father, and shew it him, to the end he might suppose, that Ioseph was slaine by wilde beasts. Which done, they came vnto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his sonnes misfortunes) and told him, that they had not seene their brother Ioseph, neyther could they assure him what mishap had befallen him: but that notwithstanding, they had found his Ierkin, altogether bebloudied and torne; which made them suspect, that he was slaine by some wilde beasts, if so be he were sent vnto them attired in that Coat.

Ioseph is sold by the Arabian merchants.

Ruben by night cõmeth to the Pit.

Iosephs brothers perswade his father, that he is deuoured by wilde beasts.

But Iacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more successefull tidings, in that he supposed L and hoped that Ioseph had onely beene captiue) gaue ouer this opinion, and tooke the Coat for a most assured testimonie of his sonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at such time as he sent him to his brothers: for which cause he lamented Ioseph, from that time forward, as being dead, and as if he had not any more sonnes. And such was the griefe of his heart, that he conceiued no consolation in the rest, but suffered himselfe to be perswaded by the brothers, that Ioseph had beene slaine by sauage beasts. He therefore sat him downe, being clothed in sack-cloth, and charged with sorrow; and neyther could his sonnes, by their counsailes, mitigate his moanes, nor he himselfe remit the rigor of his lamentation.

Iacob bewayleth Ioseph, for dead.

Now Ioseph was sold by the merchants, and bought by Putiphar, (an Ægyptian Lord, and a Steward of King Pharaohs household) who held him in high estimation, and trayned him vp in M all liberall Sciences, suffering him to liue, not after a seruile, but liberall manner, and committing vnto his charge the care of his household; all which fauours he made vse of. Yet was he no wayes diuerted, by these his priuiledges and promotions, from his innated vertue; testifying hereby, that prudence doth not submit to aduerse fortune, if a man vse the same orderly, and not at that time onely when fortune fawneth and flattereth.

It fortuned not long after, that his masters Wife was enamoured with him, both in respect of his his beautie,as alſo of his dexteritie and diligence; ſuppoſing, that if ſhe opened her minde vnto him, ſhe might the more eaſily enjoy him; and that he might eſteeme it a part of his felicitie,to be beloued by his Miſtris. All which ſhe ſuppoſed and imagined, hauing onely regard of that ſeruile condition wherein at that preſent hee was, and not of his manners, which continued alwayes entire,notwithſtanding any change that could happen vnto him. For which cauſe ſhe diſcouered vnto him her deſire,and deſired him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refuſed her demand, alledging, that it were a moſt wicked requitall of him towards his Maſter, if it ſhould come to paſſe, that he who had bought him,and ſo greatly honoured him,ſhould receiue ſo great an injurie and outrage. For which cauſe, he exhorted her to conquer her appetite, depriuing her of all hope of euer compaſſing her concupiſcence; alledging vnto her,That deſire is then leſſe actiue,when hope is extinguiſhed: auowing,that he had rather ſuffer all the miſchiefes that might be imagined, then to conſent or condiſcend vnto her in that wickedneſſe. And although (ſaid he) it be vndecent for a ſeruant to contradict the will of his Miſtris,yet that the filthineſſe of the fact did diſſwade him from attempting the ſame. But this his repulſe did more and more inflame her,for that ſhe ſuppoſed that Ioſeph ſhould not denie her: and her diſordinate affections encreaſing dayly, ſhe deuiſed and complotted a new meanes,in hope to bring her loue to her deſired iſſue.

The yeere of the world, 2217. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1747.

Whereas therefore a ſolemne and publike feaſt was at hand,wherein (according to cuſtome) the Ladies were wont to dignifie the ſolemnitie,by their aſſiſtance; ſhe fained a ſickneſſe,perſwading her husband thereunto, hoping by that meanes ſhe might haue the better opportunitie (in being ſolitary,and alone)to ſollicite Ioſeph: which falling out accordingly(as ſhe had her ſelfe deſired) ſhe began to court and compaſſe him by theſe flattering and fawning allurements and perſwaſions: telling him, That he had done well,if(vpon her firſt requeſt)he had obeyed her,without any contradiction,in reſpect of her dignitie who required the ſame,& her incredible paſſion, which had ſo farre commanded her, that notwithſtanding ſhe were his Miſtris,ſhe ſhould indignifie and forget her ſelfe ſo much as to ſollicite him: that now hee ſhould behaue himſelfe more wiſely and better; if in amends of his forepaſſed obſtinacy he now at laſt would conſent. For if he reſpected this her ſecond ſummons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former,for (ſaith ſhee) I haue fained ſickneſſe to this end, to ſollicite and prefer thy company before a publike triumph. Or if at firſt thou didſt miſtruſt mee,thou maiſt hereby conceiue that I doe not maliciouſly tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the ſame affection. For which cauſe either make choice of this preſent pleaſure,and be obſequious to her that loueth thee, vnder hope of further preferments, or be aſſured of my hate and reuenge, if thou preferreſt thy opinion of chaſtitie before my fauour. For be aſſured,that thy chaſtitie ſhall profit thee nothing, if I ſhall accuſe thee to my husband, and auow,that thou haſt ſought to violate me: for although thy allegations be more true, yet ſhall my words be of more force,and my accuſations more acceptable in Putiphars eares then thine. But neither by theſe words, nor her teares the witneſſes of her vowes, could Ioſeph bee peruerted, neither could remorſe ouer-worke him, nor terrour compell him to forſake his purpoſed chaſtitie, but that hee conſtantly reſiſted againſt thoſe iniuſt afflictions, wherewith ſhee threatned him: chooſing rather to ſuffer any miſery whatſoeuer, then to be priſoned with the poſſeſſion of her offered adulteries, being well aſſured that he was worthy of extreme puniſhment, if on a womans intreaty hee ſhould condiſcend to any ſuch treachery.Hee likewiſe admoniſhed her of her duty, alledging the lawes, rights, and cuſtomes of Matrimony, willing her rather to reſpect them, then her monentany luſt: for that the one was ſpeedily followed with repentance, proceeding ſuddenly of griefe, not amendment of ſinne, with a continuall and great feare likewiſe, leſt the fact ſhould be diſcouered: whereas the company ſhee might haue with her husband,was voide of danger, and attended by a conſcience, as well before God as men. Moreouer, that it was more conuenient for her to gouerne and command him as his Lady and Miſtris, rather then to be ſhamed, in making him the Secretarie of their common ſinne: for that it is more conuenient to be aſſured in the confidence of a good life, then in ſecret to commit ſinne. In theſe and ſuch words ſought he to abate the brunt of her furious affection, and to reuoke her from her depraued fancies,to ſubmit to the law of reaſon: but ſhe, the more inſtantly he diſſwaded, the more earneſtly inuaded him; and where by no meanes ſhe could peruert him by words, ſhe layd violent hands vpon him, to conſtraine him perforce. But Ioſeph (vnable to endure any longer the intemperancie of the woman, leauing his Garment behind him,whereby ſhe held him) brake ſuddenly out of the chamber. She,partly impelled by the griefe of repulſe, partly affrighted with feare,leſt her laſciuiouſneſſe ſhould be made knowne to

to her husband, decreed first of all falsely to accuse Ioseph, and by this meanes to take reuenge vpon him; holding it to be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all to accuse her accuser. She therefore sat her downe sad and perplexed, colouring the griefe of her defrauded lust, vnder the cloake of indignation, for her attempted honor and violated chastitie. Now, when her husband came home, and (being troubled in minde to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof: Liue thou no longer (said she) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slaue, who attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great beneuolence thou hast entertained him; yea, who was to be esteemed more ingrate then ingratitude, except euery way he approoued himselfe faithfull vnto thee: yet hath he not forborne to offer injurie, no, not to thine owne Wife; and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence: whereby it manifestly appeareth, that the moderation which hitherto he pretended, rather proceeded of seruile feare, then natiue modestie. And that which hath the more emboldened him, is, in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast fauoured him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiuing that he was preferred before all thine ancient seruants, he thought it lawfull likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy Wife. And to procure more credit to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behind him, at such time as he sought to violate her. But Putiphar intangled by the words and teares of a woman, and attributing too much to his Wiues dissembling loue, omitting the further and faithfull inquisition of the truth, after he had first of all praysed his Wiues faith and loyaltie, he cast Ioseph, thus condemned of haynous wickednesse, into the prison of malefactors; esteeming his Wiues chastitie, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witnesse of her approoued honestie.

Ioseph is cast into prison.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4. Gen. 39.

Iosephs patience in bonds.

The keeper of the prison dealeth friendly with Ioseph.

But Ioseph committing his innocencie vnto God, neyther tooke care how to excuse himselfe, neyther to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessitie of his bonds, he was onely comforted with this one hope, namely, that God was more powerfull then they that had imprisoned him; whose prouidence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that wherein he imployed him, as also the dignitie of his forme, loosed him out of bonds, and by that meanes in some sort lessened his miserie; giuing him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of the prisoners had. Now, when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labour) conferred together (as men in miserie are wont to doe) and questioned among themselues, of the cause of their damnation; a certaine Butler neere about the King (condemned by him, in displeasure, to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Ioseph: and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and prouident man, he told him his Dreame, praying him, that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that he would expound it vnto him; lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the Kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from Heauen by Dreames. For he said, that in his sleepe he beheld three great clusters of Grapes hanging on three seuerall branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and readie to be gathered; and that him thought he pressed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, hauing strained the Must, he offered it to the King, and that he willingly drank thereof. Now, when he had shewed him his Dreame, he desired him, that if he had any knowledge giuen him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his Vision vnto him. Ioseph answered him, that he should be of good courage; willing him to expect, that within three dayes he should be deliuered from his bonds, and be admitted againe to the Kings seruice, and restored to his former credit. For he interpreted, that the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for mans vse; for that by the mediation thereof, faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolued: furthermore, that troubles and sorrowes were asswaged by the vse thereof; in stead of which, pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest me that the King receiued, being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore, that thou hast a good Dreame offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliuerance from miserie within three dayes, according to the number of those Clusters which thou gatheredst in thy Dreame. Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as soone as the euent hath approoued this my prediction to be faithfull and vnfained; and when thou art at libertie, forget vs not, that are left here to lye in miserie, who departest to enjoy thy fore-told felicitie: for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednesse, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modestie; in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I liued, and his credit who committed me to prison, then mine owne pleasure. And thus the Butler, as it became him, rejoyced at the interpretation of his Dreame, and expected the euent. Now a certaine other seruant, who had the command command of the Kings Bakers, and liuing in the ſame priſon with the Butler, conceiuing ſome hope through Ioſephs ſo happy interpretation (for that he likewiſe had ſeene a viſion)deſired him to expound vnto him what interpretation was to bee had of a dreame, which hee had the night paſt, which he expreſſed in theſe words. Me thought (ſaid hee) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which, two were repleniſhed with bread,and the other with fleſh (and diuers other kinds of cates, ſuch as are prepared for Kings.) But the birds of the ayre houering round about me, deuoured all the victuals, being nothing appauled by me, although I droue them from thence. Which ſaid, he expected a preſage no leſſe fortunate then the former.

The Bakers dreame.

But Ioſeph (after he had coniectured vpon the circumſtances of the dreame, and foretold him that he would rather haue informed him of more ſucceſſefull fortunes, then his dreame did intend:)told him that he had onely two dayes left him, wherein he was to liue. For theſe were deſignated by the two baskets: but by the third, that hee ſhould be hanged and deuoured by the fowles,which he could not driue from him.Neither did it otherwiſe fall out with both of them, then Ioſeph had foretold: For vpon the prefixed day, the King (celebrating the feaſt of his natiuitie) commanded that the Baker ſhould be hanged: but as touching the Butler, hee deliuered him from his bonds,and reſtored him to his former office. But God deliuered Ioſeph(after he had for the ſpace of two yeeres ſpent his time in the miſerie of the priſon: and was in the meane ſpace no wayes aſſiſted by the vngratefull Butler) by preordinating this meanes and maner of his libertie. Whereas King Pharaoh had that night in his ſleepe ſeene two viſions, and had alſo receiued the interpretation thereof, forgetting the one, he onely remembred him of the dreames, which in his opinion had no fortunate ſignification. Whereupon early in the morning (calling before him the learneſt among the Egyptians) hee required the interpretation thereof. Now when hee could in no ſort be ſatisfied by them,the King was the more and more moued: which when the Butler apperceiued, hee remembred him of Ioſeph, and of his wiſedome and prudence in theſe ſorts of coniectures; and repairing vnto the King, told him of Ioſeph and of his viſion, and the euent thereof, which he had whileſt hee was in priſon, together with Ioſephs interpretation; and how the ſame day, the maſter of the Bakers condemned to the gallowes, gaue greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept priſoner as a ſlaue by Putifar the maſter of his houſhold, and that he ſaid how amongſt the Hebrewes he was deſcended of good and honorable parents. Command him therefore (ſaid he) to be ſent for, neither deſpiſe the man for his preſent miſerie, for thou maieſt manifeſtly vnderſtand by him, the ſignification of thy dreames. Whereupon the King ſent for him preſently, and friendly taking him by the hand, hee ſpake vnto him after this manner: Good young man, in that I vnderſtand by the report of my ſeruant, that thou art prudent; ſhew me the interpretation of my dreames in ſuch manner as thou diſcoueredſt his vnto him, and thou ſhalt doe me a high pleaſure: but beware thou neither conceale any thing for feare, or ſpeake ought for flatterie, or to feede me with falſhoods, but tell me all things truely, although they ſhall in a ſort breed my diſcontent to heare them. Me ſeemed that I walked by a riuer ſide,and that I ſaw ſeuen well fed & very fat kine,which retyred themſelues from the floud into the paſture: and againe, me thought that ſeuen others came from the paſture to encounter them, who were very leane and vgly to behold, who when they had deuoured the ſeuen others that were fat and great,yet neuer the more increaſed, but were all of them miſerably vexed with hunger. But after this viſion being awaked out of my ſleepe, and troubled in my minde, thinking with my ſelfe, what that viſion might ſignifie, beeing ſeized by little and little by a pleaſant ſlumber, I fell aſleepe once againe. And againe, I ſaw a viſion more prodigious then the former, which doth likewiſe trouble and terrifie me the more. For I ſaw ſeuen eares ſprung out of one roote,that hung downe and bowed their heads, becauſe they were loaden with graine ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared ſeuen other,weake,and languiſhing for want of deaw, who deuouring thoſe other great and full eares, left me highly aſtoniſhed. Hereunto Ioſeph anſwered: This dreame(O King)although it hath been ſeene in two figures,yet ſo it is that it importeth one and the ſame accident, which is to enſue. For both thoſe Oxen (which are creatures borne and bred vp for the plough and labour) which you ſaw deuoured by the leaner, and thoſe eares of corne conſumed by the weaker,fore-ſignifie a famine and ſcarcity in Egypt for ſo many yeers, as there were Oxen and eares of corne in good plight: ſo that the fertilitie of theſe good yeeres ſhall be conſumed by the ſterilitie of ſo many other yeeres,according to their number; and there ſhall be ſuch ſcarcity of neceſſary prouiſion, that it ſhall be hard to preuent and ſupply their defects: all which is ſignified by thoſe ſeuen leane kine,who, hauing deuoured the good, could not be ſatisfied by the ſame. All theſe things God foretelleth vnto men, not to the end they ſhould be be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might prouide for themſelues, to the end they might more eaſily preuent the eminent danger. If therefore thou ſhalt lay vp and ſtore the aboundance of the plentifull yeeres, Egypt ſhall not feele the penurie that ſhall follow. And when as the King (admiring at Ioſephs prudence and wiſedome) demanded after what maner he might prouide in the time of plenty, how to preuent and redreſſe the future ſterilitie: hee warned and counſelled him, that the Egyptians ſhould vſe parcimony, and that that which remained of thoſe yeers ſuperfluitie, might be reſerued for future neceſſities. He counſelled him alſo to bind the husbandmen, that they ſhould hoard vp their corne in their barnes, and onely to diſtribute to the people as much as was ſufficient, and no more. Hereupon the King (not onely praiſing Ioſephs counſell, but alſo his interpretation of his dreames) made him Lord and Commiſſarie of all the ſtore; and commanded him to prouide whatſoeuer hee thought neceſſarie in that behalfe, either of his owne or of the peoples: aſſuring him that he thought no man more neceſſarie to execute this counſell, then himſelfe who was the author thereof. Hauing therefore this authority giuen him by the King to vſe his owne ſignet, and to be cloathed in purple, he was conducted thorow all the countrey vpon a Chariot: and he aſſembled the labourers of corne, and diſtributed to euery one by meaſure, that which they wanted for ſeede corne, and for their nouriſhment, without letting any man vnderſtand for what cauſe he did it.

About this time had hee already attained to thirty yeeres old, beeing held in great honour by the King, and was for his incredible prudence, ſurnamed by him Pſontom phanechus, which ſignifieth the diſcouerer of hidden things: he was alſo honoured with a Wife of great dignity: for by the procuration of the King, he tooke to wife a Virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan prieſt, whoſe name was Aſaneth, by whom he begat children alſo, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manaſſes, which ſignifieth Obliuion (becauſe attaining better fortune, he grew in obliuion of his former miſery:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which ſignifieth Returne, for that he was reſtored to the liberty of his anceſtors.) Now when as according to Ioſephs interpretation, the ſeuen yeeres of plenty and affluence were ouerpaſſed in Egypt; the eight yeere of famine beganne to infeſt the land, and for that the euill was vnexpected, the headlong multitude grieuouſly trauelled with hunger and miſery, began to flocke about the Kings gates and garners. Hereon the King called for Ioſeph, who preſently diſtributing graine to thoſe that wanted it, became without controuerſie, the father and conſeruer of the comminaltie. Neither did he onely make merchandize with thoſe that inhabited that countrey: but with ſtrangers alſo, deeming that the whole race of mankinde was allied the one with the other; and that it was conuenient, that ſuch as wanted, ſhould be ſuccoured by their meanes who had better fortune. And becauſe the ſame calamitie both oppreſſed Chanaan and other Kingdomes of the world, Iacob alſo ſent all his ſonnes into Egypt to fetch corne; (as ſoone as hee vnderſtood that ſtrangers alſo had liberty to traffique in that place) onely with himſelfe he retained Beniamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german vnto Ioſeph: who as ſoone as they arriued in Egypt, repaired vnto Ioſeph, beſeeching him that they might be permitted to buy corne, (for nothing was done without his expreſſe command) for euen then found each man fit occaſion to honour the King, when they bethought themſelues how to honour Ioſeph. Hee taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing leſſe then of him (by reaſon that in his youth he was ſold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and beſides, no one of them might ſuſpect that hee had attained to ſo great dignitie:) determined to trie and tempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For he both denied them his licence to buy corne, & commanded them alſo to be apprehended for ſpies, telling them that they were gathered of diuers nations, and that they fained kinred: for how can it be (ſaith he) that a priuate man ſhould bring vp ſo many worthy ſons; which felicitie ſcarcely and very ſeldome is granted vnto Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather ſome intelligence of his father, and in what eſtate hee liued, during the time of his abſence; and what was become of Beniamin his brother: for he was ſore afraid, leſt they had offered the ſame hard meaſure to the Lad, which they had inflicted vpon him. But they were ſtrooken with a mighty feare, bethinking them on their imminent perill, ſuppoſing that they had trauelled this long iourney all in vaine: and for that they ſaw their accuſation muſt be anſwered; Reuben the eldeſt of them, began after this manner to plead their common cauſe. Neither are we come hither (ſaid he) as ſpies, neither vnder pretence to indamage the King; but dire famine (whoſe furie we ſeeke to preuent) hath compelled vs to come into this countrey, grounding our ſelues on your humanity; who (as we haue heard) haue not onely made offer of ſale of corne, and meanes of ſuſtenance to your citizens: but alſo

Our father, by name,is Iacob; by Nation,an Hebrew: who begat vs,his twelue ſonnes,on foure women: who, while they all were in ſafetie,our affaires were fortunate and proſperous; but one of them being dead,whoſe name was Ioſeph, our domeſticall fortunes began to grow to ruine. Moreouer,Ruben reprehended their too late & vnprofitable penitencie,ſaying, That thoſe afflictions which God (the juſt reuenger of innocencie) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were conſtantly to be borne. After this manner ſpake they one vnto another, ſuppoſing that no man was preſent who vnderſtood the Hebrew Tongue: and they all lamented, being inwardly touched with the words of Ruben; and condemned their perpetrated wickedneſſe, as if they had not beene the authors of the fact: for which, at that time, they thought that God did moſt juſtly puniſh them. Ioſeph beholding them in this perplexitie,vnable to diſſemble any longer his brotherly loue,in that the teares alreadie began to burſt out of his eyes,which at that time he deſired to conceale,he departed from among them.

Ioſephs brothers repent them of that euill they had done vnto him.

D Not long after returning againe vnto them, he retained Simeon with him, who in the meane time ſhould remaine as pledge with him, vntill their back returne; and giuing them licence to buy their Corne, he commanded them to depart: giuing withall a ſpeciall commandement to one of his ſeruants,that the mony which they had brought to buy Corne,ſhould ſecretly be ſhut vp into their ſackes, and they permitted to depart; all which his ſeruant performed. But Iacobs ſonnes returning into Chanaan,told their father all that which had hapned vnto them in Ægypt, and how they were attached for ſpies,and traitors to that country:and that when they proteſted, that they were brethren,and that the eleuenth was left at home with their father,they would not beleeue them. Moreouer,that Simeon was left pledge with the Gouernour, vntill Beniamin came thither to giue teſtimony of their truth: whereupon they deſired their Father, without con-

But Iacob was diſpleaſed with that which his ſonnes had done; and whereas hee was not a little grieued that Simeon was left behinde,he thought it worſe then death alſo to be depriued of Beniamin; and neither could Ruben with his prayers (offering his ſonnes for pledges, that if any ſiniſter fortune ſhould fall vpon Beniamin by the way,the Grandfather might reuenge him on his children) perſwade Iacob to yeeld conſent: but they vncertain what to do,were more and more terrified,in that they found their money incloſed in their ſackes of corne. Now when corne began already to faile them; Iacob being compelled by force of famine,determined to ſend Beniamin with his other brothers: for it was vnlawfull for them to returne into Ægypt, except they kept their couenant. And whereas neceſſity preſſed them daily more and more, and his ſonnes ceaſed not inſtantly to call him to commit the care of his sonne vnto God, promising to bring him backe againe in safetie, G or else to die together with him. Moreouer he said, that certaine gifts gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the juice of Mirabolans, Stacte, Terebinth, and Honey, should be sent as presents vnto Ioseph, together with the double price of their Corne. Thus shedding teares on both sides, they depart from their father, leauing him miserably tormented for the health of his sonnes; and contrariwise suspecting with themselues, lest through his absence their father should be slaine with sorrow. In this perplexitie spent they a whole day. At last, the old man remained in his house wholly afflicted; and they trauelling into Ægypt, did mitigate their present griefe with the hope of better fortune: where no sooner were they arriued, but they repaired vnto Ioseph; being fore afraid, lest it should be layd to their charge, that vnder colour of fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former Corne: which presently, before Iosephs stew- H ard, they carefully excused, saying, That they found the money among their Wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks; which now, in discharge of their truth, they had brought back againe.

But he denying that he euer missed their money, and they being deliuered from this feare, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was suddenly set at libertie, to conuerse among his brethren.
Now, when Ioseph was returned from the seruice of the King, they offer him presents: and inquiring of them, how their father did? they answered, that he was in health. Then perceiuing that Beniamin was yet aliue, whom he saw among them, he asked, whether that were their yonger brother? and hearing that it was he, he onely vttered these words, That God had the prouidence of all things; and departed from them, being vnwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which he could not any longer containe. Inuiting them afterwards vnto a Banquet, he comman- I ded them to sit downe in order, according as they were wont to doe when they were with their father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honored Beniamin with a double share.

After the Banquet, at such time as they were all layd downe to rest, he commanded the steward to measure out the Wheat which euery one should beare away with him, and to hide the price thereof againe in their sacks: but in Beniamins sacke, he commanded him to put his Cup wherein he most delighted. Which he therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loues towards with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey; rejoycing as well at his restitution, as K Beniamins returne, whom they both promised and protested to bring back againe to their father; when behold, suddenly a troupe of horsemen roundly beset them; amongst whom, was that seruant who had hid the Cup in the sacke. Now they being troubled by this sudden incursion, and asking them, why they set vpon them whom they so lately had both inuited and entertained so honourably? The Ægyptians answered and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits receiued, and Iosephs gentlenesse and humanitie, were so wicked, as to returne him injuries for his courtesies; threatning them, that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceiued the Minister of the Table, yet could they not deceiue God; and againe asking them, whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished? In L these, or such like speeches, the seruant insulted ouer them. But they, who nothing at all suspected this subtiltie, accused him, saying, That they wondred at the mans intemperancie, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keepe backe, no, not the price of their Corne, which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselues knew aught of that money; so farre were they from purposely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought this inquisition would better satisfie them, then denyall, they bid them search their sacks; offering themselues, each of them, to suffer punishment, if any one of them were found guiltie of the theft. This search which they offered, the Ægyptians accepted; yet referred they the punishment, to be inflicted onely on him who had done the injurie. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sack, at length they came to Beniamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his sack, M but that they might seeme to discharge their dutie more cunningly. Now all the rest being secured in themselues, they onely as yet were carefull of their brother Beniamin; they hoped also, that he would not be found guiltie of falsehood: for which cause, they more freely vp-braided their persecutors; objecting vnto them, how through their importunitie they had beene hindered the better part of their journey. Now as they searched Beniamins sacke, they found the Cup: whereupon all the brothers began to mourne & lament, both bewayling their brothers fortune,

Iacobs sonnes are accused of theft.

A fortune, who was like presently to suffer death for the theft; and their owne mishap, who hauing plighted their faiths vnto their father for Beniamins safe returne, were compelled to falsifie the same through this present accident. And thatwhich further increased their griefe, was, that when as they most of all hoped to free from dangers, they were by fortunes enuy thrust into so great calamitie: confessing themselues to be the authors both of their fathers, and this their brothers misfortune; who neuer ceased to importune and compell their father (although he were vnwilling and resisted) to send the child with them. The yeere of the world, 2238. before the Nativitie of Christ, 1726.

Now the horsemen hauing laid hands on Beniamin, led him vnto Ioseph; whom his brothers presently followed. Who beholding his brother thrust into prison, and the rest bemoaning them round about them in mourning habits: Haue you, said he (O most wicked men) either so contemned my humanity, or Gods prouidence, as that you durst attempt and offer such an hainous B iniury against him, who entertained you with hospitality, and dismissed you with benefits? To whom they answered, that they were ready to suffer punishment for Beniamin, calling againe to their remembrance Iosephs iniuries, saying: that he was happy, who deliuered by death from life was exempt from all calamities; and that (if he liued) God inflicted that plague on them for his sake. They said also, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their father, because that (to his former sorrow, which he had conceiued euen vntil that time, of Iosephs death) they had also annexed this new misery: neither did Ruben desist to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickednesse which they had committed. But Ioseph told them that he dismissed them all (saying that their innocency was approoued vnto him) and that hee onely would be contented with the C Lads punishment: For (said he) neither is it reasonable that he should be deliuered for the loue of those who had not offended; neither that they should bee punished for him, who had done the theft. He commanded them therefore to depart, and promised them safe conduct on their way. Beniamin is attached for theft.

Whilest all of them were grieuously wounded with these words (so that scarcely one of them could speak for sorrow) Iuda (who had perswaded his father to send Beniamin with them, & who amongst the rest was a man of confidence) purposed to expose himselfe to all danger, vnder resolution to deliuer his brother from perill: whereupon he addressed himselfe to Ioseph and spake thus: Dread Lord (quoth he) wee confesse that we are all ready to suffer punishment (although we haue not all of vs committed the offence, but only the yongest amongst vs) and although we suppose his life to be almost desperate, yet our only hope as yet resteth in your goodnes and cle- D mency. For which cause we beseech you, that you will not onely haue compassion of vs, but of your owne nature, and that in this case you would be pleased to take counsell, not of your iust indignation, but your natiue goodnesse: gouerning your wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and small occurrences, are wont to submit. Consider, I pray you, whether it stand with your dignity to kill those, who present thēselues to be punished, & desire in no sort to liue, except it be by the benefit of your mercy. Suffer not your selfe to be depriued of this honour: that after you haue deliuered vs from famine, and liberally furnished vs with corne, so of your mercy likewise you haue permitted vs to returne vnto our family, being trauelled by the same perill, and to bring them home sustenance. For one and the same bounty is it to continue them in life, who are trauelled with famine; and to forgiue them death, who haue merited it by E their offences: to whom their wickednesse hath enuied that bounty which you haue heroically extended towards them. It is one and the same grace imparted by you in diuers maners. For thou shalt saue those whom thou hast fed; & that life which thou wouldest not suffer to faile by force of famine, thou shalt redeliuer and giue againe: whereby thy clemency may be more commendable, whilest both thou giuest life, and those things likewise wherby life is maintained. Moreouer, I thinke that God himselfe hath giuen thee this meanes to expresse thy vertue, that it may appeare that thou settest lighter by the iniuries offered vnto thee, then by thy will to doe good; and that thou art not liberall to them onely, who are poore and innocent. For although it be a great praise to yeeld succour in aduersities; yet is a Prince no lesse honoured by his clemency, especially in a cause that concerneth his particular interest. For if they that remit small offences, F are followed by deserued praise; what is it to restraine a mans ire in a capitall crime? doth it not most neerely approximate the diuine clemencie? And had I not good experience by Iosephs death, how grieuously my father digesteth the want of his children, I would not so earnestly intreat for his safety, but so far forth and no otherwise, but as it might redound to the praise of thy clemency; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both griefe & discontent, we were willing all of vs to suffer punishment. But now whereas we haue not so much commiseration of our selues (although as yet we be but young, and haue not much tasted the pleasures, Iudaes Oration vnto Ioseph for Beniamin.

and fruit of this life) as of our wretched Parent, being drowned in yeeres and cares, we offer vp G vnto thee these our prayers in his name also, and beseech thee to grant vs life, though at this day wee are vnder thy justice for our offences. Assuredly hee is a good man, and begat vs, that wee should be like vnto him: worthy is he neuer to taste or be tried by any such calamitie, who now through our absence, is discruciate with care and sorrow. Now, if so be he should receiue any » tidings, either of our death, or the cause thereof, he will not endure any more to liue: the infamie
» of our deaths will shorten his dayes, and make his death by this meanes more vnhappy; who, ra» ther then he should heare the rumours of our shame, would hasten his death, in supposing them.
» All these well considered, (although thou art justly mooued by this offence) remit the reuenge » vnto our father, and rather let thy pitie towards him, then our iniquitie towards thee, preuaile
» with thee. Impart this honour to his old age; which if it be depriued of our presence, neyther H

Iuda had spoken thus, he humbled himselfe at Iosephs feet; endeuouring, as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appease his ire: in like sort also all the other brothers prostrated themselues, offe-

CHAP. IIII.

BVT when hee arriued neere the fountaine of Couenant, hee offered in that place a ſacrifice vnto God; and fearing leſt his children ſhould inhabit Ægypt, by reaſon of the fertility of the place, and that his poſteritie by not returning backe into the land of Chanaan, ſhould leeſe the poſſeſſion of that which God had promiſed them; and furthermore, doubting leſt that his iourney into Ægypt, beeing by him enterprized againſt the will of God, ſhould bee ominous vnto his children; ſuſpecting likewiſe leſt hee ſhould die before hee came D to Ioſephs preſence: he was wonderfully perplexed in minde. Whileſt thus he ruminated and examined theſe things in his thought, hee was ſurprized with a heauy ſleepe,during which time God appeared vnto him and called him twice by his name: who asking who it was that called him, God anſwered: Doeſt thou not acknowledge (O Iacob)That God, who hath both protected thee and thy anceſtors, and ſuccoured you in all your neceſſities? who contrary to thy fathers purpoſe made thee Lord of his family,and when as by thy ſelfe thou diddeſt trauell into Meſopotamia,I brought to paſſe,that being matched in wedlocke very happily,thou returnedſt into thy countrey backe againe,being bleſſed with many children,and ſtored with much riches. I alſo kept thy progeny in ſafety, and when it ſeemed thou hadſt loſt Ioſeph, I raiſed him to that high ſteppe of dignitie wherein now he liueth; and made him the next in perſon to the King of E Ægypt. And now alſo I am come vnto thee vnto this end,that I may guide thee in this thy iourney, and that I may foretell thee that thou ſhalt leaue thy life betwixt the hands of Ioſeph, and that thy poſteritie ſhall bee mighty and famous for many ages, and ſhall poſſeſſe that land, the Empire whereof I haue promiſed them. Aſſured and made confident by this dreame, he more willingly haſtened,both he,his ſonnes,with all their progeny into Egypt,whoſe number amounted to the ſumme of 70. Their names, in that they are ſomewhat hard,I had not written downe, except it were to ſatisfie ſome, who contend that we are Egyptians and not Meſopotamians. The ſons of Iacob therefore were twelue in number, of whom Ioſeph came thither long before them. Now are the reſt to be reckoned vp with euery one of their progenies. Ruben had foure ſonnes, Anoches, Phalles, Eßaron, and Charmiſus. Simeon had ſixe, *Iumilus, Iaminus, Puthodus, Ia*F chenus, Goar, Saar. Leui alſo had three, Gelſemis, Caathus, and Mararis. Iuda had likewiſe three, Sala, Phares, Zara; with two ſonnes of Phares, Eſrom and Amyrus. Iſſachar had foure, Thulas, Phuruas, Iobus, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elon, and Ianel. And theſe were the children he had by Lea,who alſo led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amounteth to 33. But Rachel had two ſonnes, of which the elder who was called Ioſeph, had likewiſe two, Manaſſes and Ephraim. But Beniamin had ten, Boloſſus, Baccharis, Aſabel, Gela, Næmans, Iſes, Aros, Nomphthis, Optatis, and Sarodus. Theſe fourteene added to thoſe aboue named, make vp

the number of fortie seuen. And this was the legitimate issue of Iacob. But on Bala Rachels hand- G maid Dan and Nepthalim, who was attended by foure sonnes, Eleinus, Gunes, Sares and Hellimus. But Dan had onely one son called Vsis. Now if those be added to the aboue named, they make vp the number of 54. But Gad and Asser were borne by Zelpha Leas handmaid: of these, Gad was attended by seuen sonnes: Zophonias, Vgis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Erodes and Ariel. Asser had one daughter and sixe male children, whose names were Iomnes, Essus, Iebus, Baris, Abarus, Melmiel. These fifteene being added to the foresaid fifty foure, make vp the number aboue named, together with Iacob. But Ioseph vnderstanding that his father was at hand (for Iuda posted before to giue him notice thereof) he went out to meete him, and incountred him neere to a towne called Heros, who was seazed with such extreme and vnexpected ioy, that he had almost expired; but Ioseph recomforted him, being himselfe almost endangered through extreme ioy, yet H not in such extasie and extremity as his father: afterwards desiring him to march softly onward, he taking with him his fiue brethren, hasted vnto the King, signifying vnto him that his father with all his family were arriu'd. Who no sooner vnderstood therof, but that he ioyfully asked Ioseph in what studies he took delight: who answered him that his exercise was keeping of cattell, and that he had no other trade. And this answer made he, to the intent they might not be diuided one from another, but that liuing all together, they might take care of their father: another reason was, lest emulation should happen betwixt them & the Egyptians, if so be they should be conuersant in the same studies; for it was not lawfull for that nation to exercise the shepheards trade. Now when Iacob was brought into the kings presence, & after he had done him reuerence, and prayed God for the prosperitie both of him and his Realme; Pharao asked him how long he I had liued; and when he had vnderstood that he was a hundred and thirty yeeres old, he admired at the age of the man; and after he had certified him that his ancestors had liued far longer time, he commanded him and his sonnes to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the Kings shepheards had their pastures. But the famine increased in Egypt, and the euil augmented more and more, by reason that Nilus did not ouerflow the earth, neither extended his armes ouer the same: on the other side God rained not vpon the earth: Moreouer in that the euill was vnsuspected, it was more grieuous especially to the communaltie, who had laid vp nothing, neither did Ioseph giue them corne without ready money; which when they began to want, they exchanged their cattell and slaues for corne; but they that had lands, sold a certaine portion thereof vnto the King for their prouision. And when as by this means all these possessions came into the Kings hands; they went K to inhabit the one heere, the other there, to the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their land: the sacrificers only were excepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained intire. Finally, this necessity reduced both the bodies and minds of the whole nation into seruitude after such a manner, that they esteemed no labour or meanes vnseemely, that might serue them towards the maintenance of their sustenance. But when the famine ceased, & the earth watered by the ouerflow of the flood, began to gather her former fertility; Ioseph visiting euery city of the kingdom, & assembling the multitude in euery one of them, restored them the profits of those lands which they had sold vnto the King, and exhorted them to manure the same in no worse maner then they would do their own, cõmanding them to pay the fift part vnto the king, which was due vnto him by his prerogatiue and kingly right. Who reioycing at this vnexpected L restitution, earnestly intended and prosecuted their tillage: and by this meanes not onely Iosephs authoritie, but also the peoples hearts were not a little tied vnto the King: and the inheritance of the fift part of the profits remained with the Kings that succeeded and all their posteritie.

Iacob almost deceased for ioy.

A great profit redounded to the King by this famine.

Ioseph commanded them to pay the fift part of their profits to the King.

But Iacob, after he had liued seuenteene yeeres in Egypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his sonnes, hauing first besought God to giue them prosperitie and aboundance, and prophecied that euery one of their posteritie should attaine to the possession of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to passe. Besides, praising his sonne Ioseph, for that forgetting the iniuries done vnto him, he had bestowed diuers benefits on his brethren, yea and such as well beseemed his benefactors; he commanded his sonnes, that they should admit Iosephs sons Ephraim and Manasses into their number, at such time as they should diuide the land of Chanaan, M as hereafter it shall be declared. Last of all, he praied them to bury him in Hebron. And he died at such time as he had liued one hundred and fiftie yeeres wanting three, being second to none of his ancestors in pietie, and obtained the reward which he ought iustly to possesse, in that hee was a man adorned with so many vertues. But Ioseph by the Kings permission went and transported his fathers bodie into Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But his brothers fearing to returne with him, and refusing to follow him, in that they suspected their father being dead

But he likewise died, when he had liued one hundreth and ten yeeres; a man endowed with admirable vertue, and prudent in all affaires, and moderate in his gouernment: by which means it came to passe, that neither his forraine birth, neither his calamities wherof we haue spoken, did any waies hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignitie. The rest of his brothers also, hauing spent their liues in happinesse, died in Ægypt, whose bodies their sons and nephewes transported and buried in Hebron: but Iosephs bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrewes

CHAP. V.

Of the affliction which the Hebrewes endured in Egypt, for the space of foure hundreth yeeres.

THe Ægyptians are a Nation addicted vnto delicacie, and impatient of labour, subiect onely to their pleasures, and affecting gaine: whence it came to passe, that bearing hatred toward the Hebrewes, and enuying their happines, they were very euilly disposed
C towards them. For seeing the race of the Israelites flourish and to abound in riches, which they got by their labour and industrie, they conceiued an opinion that their aduancement and increase, would be the ouerthrow and decrease of the Ægyptians; so that at length they forgot the benefits which Ioseph had done vnto them: and after the Royaltie was transported into another familie, they committed diuers outrages against the Israelites, and complotted against them in what manner they might more grieuously afflict them. For they were inioyned by them to cut Nilus into diuers trenches, and to enuiron their Cities with walles, and to build fortifications and banks, wherby the inundations of the flood might be diuerted. They also vexed our nation in building their high and vaine Pyramides, compelling them to learn diuers artes, and to accustome themselues to endure labour; and in such afflictions led they their liues
D for the space of 400. yeeres, the Ægyptians studying nought else but to tire the Israelites with continuall labour, and our country-men endeuouring themselues alwaies to performe far more, then was expected from them. Liuing thus in this estate, there grew afterwards another occasion, which instigated them the more to seeke the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the sacred secretaries (to whose predictions those kind of people doe very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be one bred & borne among the Israelites, that in time to come should grieuously afflict the estate of the Ægyptians, and wonderously enhance the good hap of the Israelites; who should surpasse all other in vertue, and purchase to himselfe immortal glory, if so be he should attaine to mans estate. Wherwith the King being greatly terrified, he published an edict by the aduice of this secretary, that whatsoeuer male-child should be E borne amongst the Israelites, he should be cast into the floud to be drowned: hee commanded likewise the Egyptian Midwiues diligently to obserue the time when the Hebrew womē trauelled with child, carefully to keep and mark their children at such time as they were deliuered. For it was enioyned them that they should be brought to bed by such Midwiues, who by reason of consanguinity with that nation, should not transgresse the Kings commandement. He enacted also a law with a penalty, that if any should be so bold to conceale their children, both they and all their family should be done to death. Great was their calamity, not onely in that respect, because they were depriued of their children, & for that the parents themselues were made the ministers to murther their owne children; but foreseeing also the future time, they were intolerably dismayed, expecting nought else but the certaine and fatall extirpation of their whole nation, by F reason that when the children were slaine, the parents themselues not long after were assured to die: thus conceited they in themselues into what extreme misfortune they were fallen. But no man whosoeuer, although he cōplot neuer so many stratagems, can resist the will of God. For both the child, of whom the sacred secretary had foreprophecied, was secretly brought vp vndiscouered by the Kings spies, and approoued by the euents of his life, that he was no false Prophet. Amarames an Hebrew borne, and a noble man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publike perill, lest the whole nation should be brought to nothing through the want of issue; and his owne priuate misfortune, whose wife at home was big with childe and ready to lye downe; was troubled in his minde, and vncertaine what to doe. For which cause he made his recourse vnto God, beseeching him that at the length he would haue mercy on those men of whom onely he had beene perpetually honoured; and that it would please him to bring to end the present affliction which threatned the whole nation with vtter ruine and destruction. But God being mooued vnto mercy by his most humble prayer, appeared to him in a dreame, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that hee had in memory the piety of his ancestors, and that he would for euer remunerate them, euen as in times past he had beene gracious to their forefathers. For it was he that had increased their posterity, and multiplied them to so mighty a nation, that by his fauour, Abraham departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Chanaan, besides other felicities, had issue by his wife that was beforetime barren, and left ample possessions to his successors: to Ismael, Arabia; to Chæturas children Troglottida, and to Isaac Chanaan. Neither can you euer forget without note of impietie and ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily atchieued in warre by my meanes: but Iacobs name also is renowned amongst forraine nations, both in respect of the felicity wherein he liued, and also for that prosperitie which by hereditarie right hapned vnto his posteritie, who taking their originall from 70. men that accompanied their father into Ægypt, are now increased to the number of sixe hundreth thousand: know therefore now also, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publike securitie, and priuately thy glory. For this childe, for feare of whose natiuity, the Ægyptians haue condemned all your children vnto death, shall be borne vnto thee: hee neither shall be discouered by the constituted spies, and after he hath escaped beyond all expectation, shall he bee brought vp, and in his time shall he deliuer the Hebrews from the thraldome of the Ægyptians, and shall obtaine an eternall memory, for this his famous action, not only amongst his owne nation, but also amongst strangers: for this fauour will I extend vnto thee, and on thy posterity that followeth after thee; he shall also haue such a brother, who shall deserue both in himselfe, and in his posteritie to inherit the Priesthood for euer. After these things were declared in a vision vnto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Iochabel, and by reason of the prediction of this dreame, their suspicion and feare the rather increased more and more: for they were not onely pensiue in respect of their childe; but also by reason of the future great good fortune that was promised them. But anon after the woman being brought a bed, gaue credit to the Oracle; who had so easie and gentle a labour, that she beguiled the ouerseers and spies, in that she felt none of those throes which doe commonly afflict such as are in labour: so that she nourished the infant three moneths secretly in her house, without being in any sort discouered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be surprized, and sore doubting lest he should incurre the Kings displeasure, if the matter were discouered, whereby both he and the childe should be made away, and Gods promises should be frustrate; he had rather wholly commit the safety of his son to his prouidence; supposing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troublesome vnto him to liue in continuall perill both of his owne and his sonnes safety: moreouer, he thought that God would puruey some meanes of assurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be prooued false. Grounding himselfe on this resolution, they prepared and made a cradle of sedge, after the manner of a couch, so great as it was sufficient to lay the child in at ease, and hauing pitched it on euery side lest the water should pierce the same, they put the child into it, and suffered him to float along the streame, in committing him to the mercy of God. Whilest in this manner it was borne downe by the steame; Mariam, the sister of the young infant, by her mothers command went along the banke on the other side of the riuer, obseruing whither at length the basket would be carried, and where it did arriue. At that time God manifestly declared, that nothing is atchieued by mans wisedome, but that all things are brought to passe by his omnipotent bountie, and that they who for their profit and particular securitie seeke the ruine and destruction of others with neuer so much subtiltie, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceiued in their expectations: Againe, that they that submit their wils vnto Gods will, are warranted from all wrongs by such meanes as were neuer thought on; which may most manifestly be perceiued by this childe.

Moses cast into the flood.

Thermuthis the Kings daughter walking along the riuer side, espied this basket carried away by the course of the streame, and presently commanded certain swimmers to draw the cradle on drie land, and bring it before her: who executing her command, she opened the basket and beheld the child; who in that he was faire and well featured did greatly delight her. For God so loued and fauoured Moses, that he caused him both to be nourished and brought vp by them, who for

A feare leſt he ſhould be borne, had decreed to deſtroy all the reſt of the race of the Hebrewes. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her ſome one Nurſe, who might giue the child ſucke: who refuſing the ſame, and all other Nurſes whatſoeuer they were ſent for to ſuckle him; Mariam, as if by good fortune, and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had light into their companie, began to ſpeake thus vnto Thermuthis: In vaine (ſaid ſhe) O Queene, doeſt thou endeuour, whileſt thou ſtriueſt to giue this Babe ſucke by any but an Hebrew Nurſe, for he will not accept it: for if thou call vnto thee a Nurſe of the ſame Nation, and agreeable with his nature, doubtleſſe he will take the Nipple. This ſpeech of hers being both heard, and plauſibly accepted, the Queene commanded her to execute the ſame, and to bring her an Hebrew woman that gaue ſucke: which ſhe diligently performing, returned, and brought her mother with her, whom none of the aſſiſtants B knew; who preſenting her Breſt vnto the child, he willingly tooke the Dugge: ſo, that vpon the Queenes requeſt, the nouriſhment of the child was wholly committed vnto her. And by reaſon of this accident, and for that he was caſt into the riuer, he was called Moſes; for the Ægyptians call water, Mo; and ſaued, Yſes: ſo this name, compoſed of theſe two, was impoſed on this child; who afterwards, without exceptions, became the wiſeſt man among the Hebrewes, according as God had afore prophecied. For he was the ſeuenth after Abraham: for he was Amrams ſonne, and Amram ſonne vnto Cathus, and he to Leui, and Leui to Iacob; who tooke the originall from Iſaac, the ſonne of Abraham. Hee had a judgement riper then became his age: for euen amongſt his childiſh delights, he ſhewed himſelfe more diſcreet then all his equals; and in whatſoeuer he did, it gaue teſtimonie, that at ſuch time as he ſhould attaine to mans eſtate, he would manage C mightie things. When he was but onely three yeeres old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable audacitie. He was ſo faire and amiable, that there was not any one, how auſtere and inhumane ſoeuer he were, which but in beholding him, would not be aſtoniſhed. And it chanced alſo, that diuers, who encountred him as he was borne thorow the ſtreetes, turned themſelues about to behold him, and intermitted their other affaires, onely to looke vpon him: for the admirable and innated beautie which was in this Infant, did rauiſh all thoſe that beheld him. Whence it came to paſſe, that Thermuthis, in that ſhee had no other iſſue, adopted him for her heire; and conducting him vnto her father, ſhee preſented him before him, ſaying, That ſhee was carefull of a ſucceſſor, by reaſon God had not vouchſafed him to haue any iſſue. For (ſayth ſhe) I haue brought vp this Infant, no leſſe excellent in wit, then diuine in beautie, and haue receiued D him miraculouſly, by the bountie and grace of Nilus, whom I haue decreed to adopt my child, and to eſtabliſh him as ſucceſſor to thee in thy Kingdome. This ſaid, ſhe deliuered the Infant into her fathers armes: who, after he had embraced and hugged him at his breſt (to giue his daughter the more content) he put his Diademe vpon the childs head: but Moſes pulling it from his head after a childiſh manner, caſt it on the ground, and ſpurned it with his feete; which act of his was ſuppoſed ominous to the Realme, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the ſacred Secretarie (who had fore-told, that his natiuitie would be the deſtruction of the Ægyptians) willed them to kill the child, and enforced himſelfe to enact it, crying out with a loud voyce, and ſpeaking vnto the King after this manner: O King, this child, by whoſe death God promiſeth vs ſecuritie, hath alreadie confirmed the preſage, inſulting ouer thy Kingdome, & ſpurning at thy Diademe: E Take from the Ægyptians that feare which they haue conceiued through him, by his death; and from the Hebrewes that hope, which they build on his courage and life. But Thermuthis haſtily conueyed and ſnatched him thence, and the King was not ouer-forward to lay hands on him, by reaſon that God diſpenſed all things in that ſort, in that he had a care of Moſes preſeruation. He was therefore very carefully brought vp: and in reſpect of him, the Hebrewes in generall were repleniſhed with good hope; but to the Ægyptians, his education both was ſuſpected and grudged at: but by reaſon that if the Lad ſhould haue beene ſlaine, there was not any one, eyther akinne, or adopted, or otherwiſe whatſoeuer, that had regard of the eſtate of the Ægyptians, they abſtained from his ſlaughter. Being therfore thus borne, and after this manner brought vp; at ſuch time as he encreaſed in yeeres, he euidently, by his vertue, made it knowne vnto the Ægyptians, F that he was borne to abaſe their pride, & to exalt the Hebrewes, by this occaſion which enſueth. The Ethiopians, who confine vpon Ægypt, hauing ſpoyled & deſtroyed the country round about them, ſpoyled and made pillage of all the goods of the Ægyptians; who, incenſed againſt them for the wrongs and injuries which they had offered, leuied an Army, intending to reuenge them of that diſgrace which their enemies had offered them: but in the battaile they were all put to flight, ſo that ſome of them were ſlaine; and the reſt ſhamefully flying, returned with ignominie worſe then death, into their owne country. The Ethiopians made proud with this good fortune, inſtantly instantly pursued them; and supposing it a cowardly part in them, not to take the benefit of their G present good fortune, and conceiuing an assured hope of conquering Ægypt, they generally wasted the same: and hauing tasted of the sweetnesse of pillage, without any temper or moderation in their victorie, they were incensed to attempt greater matters. And whereas they perceiued, that hauing wasted all their neighbour Regions, no man durst sally out, to encounter them in Armes, they marched forward toward Memphis, euen vnto the Sea; arriuing neere no Citie that eyther had the heart, or durst make head against them. By which calamities, the Ægyptians being ouer-sore oppressed, they send one to aske counsell of the Oracle, in what manner they might preuent their miseries; and when as an answer was giuen them, That they should chuse an Hebrew to assist them in the warres, the King commanded his daughter to giue them Moses; who, together with the Empire, might gouerne the whole Armie. Shee taking an Oath of the King, H

That no injurie or violence should be offered him, deliuered him into his hands; esteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moses, that he was called to the succours of her countrey: and contrariwise, shee blamed the Sacrificers, who were not ashamed to demand his aide and assistance, whom they had fore-judged, and adjudged to be slaine as their common enemie. But Moses exhorted by Thermuthis and the King, willingly tooke the charge vpon him. Whereat the Priests of both Nations were very joyfull: for the Ægyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had ouercome their enemies, they afterwards might more easily dispatch and murther him, by some Treason and sinister meanes; and the Hebrewes conceiued a hope, that they might depart out of Ægypt, by reason that Moses was the Generall of the Army. Moses therefore making haste; before such time as the enemies had any notice that he was dislodged, he leuied his I

Army, and conducted them, not along the bankes of the riuer, but thorow the maine Land; wherein he made manifest his most admirable prudence. For the journey by Land being very dangerous, by reason of the multitude of Serpents, for the countrey thereabouts breedeth vp all sorts of them, and some of that kind, as the like thereof are not seene in any place else, all different in proprietie, malignitie, and horrible forme; and amongst these likewise there are some winged, and apt to flye, who not only offend those that they encounter on the earth very priuily, but also towre very high in the ayre, who houer about to hurt those that are not aware of them) hee, for the securitie of his Army, and to the end he might march without any inconuenience, inuented this maruailous and admirable stratagem: For he caused two Panyers of Sedge to be made, in forme of Cofers, and filled them with certaine birds which were called Ibes, who are mortall K enemies to Serpents, and before whom the Serpents flee; and sometimes, in flying from them like Harts, they are layd hold of, and swallowed by them. Otherwise these birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmefull to any but to Serpents: of whom I will now cease to write any further, because the Greekes doe alreadie know what kind of bird it is.

When as therefore he arriued in the countrey of Serpents, he let flye his Ibes against the venemous beasts, and made vse of them to encounter the other. And when he had marched in this sort, he attained and surprized the Æthiopians, before they suspected him; and suddenly charging them, he ouercame them in battell, spoyling them of the hope they had to conquer Ægypt: and entring the towns of Æthiopia, he rased them, and made a great slaughter of the inhabitants.

The victorie which Moses and the Ægyptians had against the Ethiopians.

The Ægyptian Army hauing tasted the happie successe that happened vnto them vnder the L conduct of Moses, intermitted not their occasion; especially, for that they saw that the Ethiopians were well-nigh conquered, or rather wholly destroyed: and in the end hauing driuen them euen vnto Saba, the chiefe Citie of Ethiopia, (which Cambyses called Meroe, for the loue which he bore vnto his sister, who was so called) they besieged them. The Citie was strong, and very hard to be assayled, by reason of the riuer Nilus, which enuironed it round about: on the other side, the riuers of Astapus and Astaborra did flow in so freshly, as they could neyther breake the course of the water, nor wade ouer the streame: for the Citie is builded in an Iland, enuironed with a strong wall round about; hauing great rampiers betwixt the riuers and the walls built, to resist the inundations of the waters: which are the cause that the Citie may be very hardly taken, although the opposite Army had found meanes to passe the water. Now, when Moses was very M sore grieued that his Army profited nothing, by reason that the enemies durst not encounter them in open field; behold what a chance happened: Tharbis, the daughter of the King of Ethiopia, beholding Moses at such time as he approched with his Army neere vnto the walls of the Citie, and seeing how valiantly he fought and behaued himselfe, and wondering at the exploits and enterprises which he made, (which was the cause that the Ægyptians, almost despairing of their estates and liberty, were growne so forward) and how the Ethiopians, not long before esteemed

The which he accepted,vnder that condition, that ſhee ſhould deliuer the Citie into his hands; promiſing her, vnder a ſolemne Oath, That at ſuch time as he were Maſter thereof, he would take her to Wife, without falſifying or breach of his promiſe.The matter was no ſooner motioned,but the effect followed. So,that hauing ſurprized and conquered the Ethiopians, and after he had giuen thankes vnto God,Moſes accompliſhed the marriage,and ſent the Ægyptians backe againe into their countrey.Who conceiued an occaſion of hatred againſt Moſes,becauſe he had beene the cauſe of their ſafetie;and be-

They accuſed him therefore of murther before the King, who alreadie of himſelfe had him in ſuſpition, as well in reſpect of the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, during ſuch time as he was Generall, as alſo for the feare he had conceiued of the deſtruction of Ægypt, fore-told by his Prieſts, who inceſſantly incited him againſt Moſes: ſo that the King was vpon the point to lay hands on him,and murther him.

The Ægyptians ſeeke to betray Moſes.

But he hauing intelligence of thoſe his practices,eſcaped and fled ſecretly,flying from his preſence thorow the Deſart, by which the enemies leaſt ſuſpected that he ſhould haue fled: and al-
C though at no place in his journey he found victuals to ſuſtaine him, yet ouercame he his penurie by his patience. And arriuing neere a Citie of the Madians, ſituate vpon the ſhoare of the Red Sea,(that was named by one of Abraham and Chætura's ſonnes) he ſat him downe neere vnto a fountaine, refreſhing himſelfe, and taking his eaſe, after his laborious journey; for it was about Noone-ſtead,and the Citie alreadie appeared in his ſight. In this place there befell an occaſion vnto him, deriued from the manners and cuſtome of liuing, among the inhabitants of the countrey; by which he both expreſſed his vertue,and found an opportunitie to better his eſtate. For whereas the Region is ſore trauelled with want of water, the ſhepheards had a cuſtome,to ſtriue which of them ſhould firſt poſſeſſe the Pits, for feare leſt the water ſhould be quite conſumed by others,before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirſt. To this fountaine therefore there came ſeuen Virgins,which were ſiſters and daughters of Raguel the Prieſt,whom the inha-
D bitants of that place held in great eſtimation,who had the charge to attend their fathers flockes, for that it is the exerciſe wherein the Troglodites are wont to exerciſe their women. Theſe haſted themſelues to draw ſufficient water for their troupes into the Troughes,expreſſely made to receiue the water; and when in the meane time the ſhepheards came and ſurprized them, and droue away the Virgins,to the end they might be maſters of the water: Moſes ſuppoſing it a matter vnworthy his honour, to ſuffer this outrage, and to endure, that by violence men ſhould depriue Virgins of their right and intereſt;he droue away the ſhepheards,who would haue enjoyed that which appertained not vnto them, and gaue neceſſarie ſuccours to the diſmayed maydens. Who as ſoone as they were returned into their fathers preſence, told him the outrage that was done them by the ſhepheards,and the ſuccours that they found by the hands of a ſtranger;beſee-
E ching him,that the courteſie which he had ſhewen vnto them,ſhould not be forgotten, but that in ſome ſort he might receiue recompence. The father commending his daughters thankefulneſſe towards their benefactor, commanded them to bring Moſes into his preſence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deſerued. As ſoone as he came into his preſence, Raguel told him, how his daughters had giuen him to vnderſtand, how kindly he had aſſiſted them: and hauing his vertue in admiration, he ſaid, that he had not aduentured himſelfe, nor done kindneſſe to thoſe that were without ſenſe of the courteſies that were ſhewed vnto them, but vnto thoſe who were capable to giue him thankes; yea, ſo readie to requite him, that the greatneſſe of their requitall ſhould farre ſurpaſſe the meaſure of his humanitie. He therefore adopted him for his ſonne, and gaue him one of his daughters to Wife, and made him ſuper-
F intendent and maſter of his flockes(in which,in times paſt,the wealth and riches of forraine Nations conſiſted.) Moſes hauing obtained this good fortune at Ietheglæus hands (for ſuch was Raguels ſurname) he abode there with him,and attended his flockes.But not long after he led his cattell to graze neere to the mountaine Sinai, which is the higheſt of all thoſe that are in that quarter,and good for paſturage,by reaſon of the wholſome hearbs that grow therabouts:which notwithſtanding was not fed vpon before that time, becauſe the ſhepheards durſt not frequent thereabouts, by reaſon of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey; who ſaid, that God inhabited bited that mountaine. There happened there vnto him a maruellous prodigie, which was, That a flame of fire seemed round about him in a bush, without offensing eyther the greene herbes, or the flowers, or the boughes charged without fruit, although the flame were both great and vehement. He not a little amazed at this vnexpected spectacle, at last grew more and more amazed, when as he heard a Voyce issuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accusing him of boldnesse, in that he was not afraid to tread vpon that ground, which hitherto was vnaccessible, and religiously reuerenced, and vnhaunted by men; counselling him, that he should depart a farre off from the flame, and content himselfe with that Vision: for, although that hee were a vertuous man, and descended from great personages, yet that he ought not to be curious, to make further search into the same. The same Voyce also told him, That the honour and glorie which he obtained amongst men, was by the assistance of God; charging him to be of a good courage, and to repaire into Ægypt, for that in that place he should be captaine and guide of the Hebrew Nation, and should deliuer that people which were therein, from the outrage and seruitude which they suffered. For (said the Voyce) they shall inhabit this happie countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they shall enjoy all sorts of blessings, vnder the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreouer, it commanded him, That hauing brought the Hebrewes out of Ægypt, hee should offer sacrifice of Thanksgiuing, at such time as hee should arriue againe in that place. And such was the Oracle which he receiued from out of the flame. Moses altogether

» rauished at that which he had both heard and seene, spake thus: O Lord, it were madnesse in me,
» and no prudence, if I should distrust thy power, the which I reuerence, and which as I know hath » beene manifested vnto my predecessors: notwithstanding, I stand in doubt, how I, who am a man » of no eloquence, and of lesse force, should perswade my brethren, by my words, to forsake the » countrey wherein they inhabit, to follow mee into that countrey whither I will conduct them.
» And although they should be perswaded to do the same, how can I force Pharao to permit them » to depart from thence, by whose labours and trauailes the Ægyptians are dayly encreased in » goods and riches? Whereupon God gaue him to vnderstand, that hee should take vpon him a good courage, and promised him, that he himselfe would assist him; and that if he had need of eloquence, he would bestow vpon him the facultie of perswasion; or if he were driuen to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding, that in confirmation of those promises he had made him, he should let fall his staffe vpon the ground: which hauing done, a Dragon began to creepe vpon the ground, and in turning and rowling himselfe, lifted vp his crest on high; making semblance, to defend himselfe against those that should assayle him: and againe, a little whiles after, became a staffe againe. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his bosome; and no sooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, and in colour resembling chalke: and a little while after, it recouered his ordinarie forme. Moreouer, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Wel, and to powre it on the ground, and he saw it turned into a bloudy colour. Amazed at these accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and assured, that he should haue great assistance. Moreouer, that he should vse these signes before all men, to the end (sayth God) that all may beleeue, that being sent by me, thou doest all this according to my commandement. Furthermore I enjoyne thee, That without any further delay, thou haste thee into Ægypt; and that thou trauaile day and night, without leesing time, without delaying any more to succour the poore Hebrewes, grieuously afflicted in Ægypt. Moses hauing no cause to distrust that which God had promised him, and being confirmed by these things, whereof he was both an eye-witnesse, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occasion to expresse the like power in Ægypt, he would vouchsafe to further the effect: beseeching him further, that he would not conceale his Name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voyce, and the sight of his presence; that it might please him therefore to declare vnto him his Name, to the end, that when he should offer sacrifice vnto him, he might call vpon the same. God declared vnto him his Name, which beforetime had beene concealed amongst men, and of which also it is not lawfull for me to speake. Moses wrought these signes not only at that time, but also when or wheresoeuer he thought it requisit: by all which he gaue further credit to the fire which had appeared vnto him, & assured himselfe, that God would be his fauorable defender, that he would deliuer his brethren, and intangle and enwrap the Ægyptians in great calamities. And after that he had vnderstood, that Pharao King of Ægypt was dead, (during whose life, he fled from thence) he requested Raguel, that he would giue him leaue to depart into Ægypt, for the profit of those of his Nation; and taking with him Sephora, (who was Raguels daughter, and his married Wife) and Gerson and Eleazar, his children, which he had by her, he departed, to goe

A goe into Ægypt. Now this name of Gerſon, in the Hebrew Tongue, ſignifieth Forraine: and Eleazar ſignifieth, fauoured by God; in memory, that Moſes had eſcaped from amongſt the Ægyptians by the aſſiſtance of the God of his fathers. And as he approched neere the mountaines, Aaron, his brother, by the commandement of God, came forth to meet him; to whom he declared all that which had happened vnto him in the mountaine, and that which God had giuen him in charge. And as they paſſed onward of their way, the men of greateſt eſtimation amongſt the Hebrewes (hauing intelligence of his comming) came out to meete him; to whom Moſes preſented the aboue-named tokens, by reaſon that he could not perſwade them by words: and they being aſtoniſhed at that which they had ſeene him doe, beyond their expectation, waxed confident, and conceiued a good hope of all things, ſeeing that God had a care of their ſafetie. When he perceiued that the Hebrewes were ready to obey him, and that they proteſted to follow him in all that which he ſhould command them, through the earneſt deſire they had to be at liberty: he preſented himſelfe before the King, who had newly vndertaken the gouernment, and ſhewed him the great benefits he had done vnto the Ægyptians, at ſuch time as they were deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, who had ſpoyled all their country; and how he had ſpared no trauell, but ſuſtained all the charge of the warre, as if it had beene waged for his owne proper Nation. On the other ſide, he opened vnto him the dangers which he had injuſtly ſuffered for his recompence. He afterwards diſcourſed vnto him that which had befallen him neere vnto the fountaine of Sinai, & the talke which God had in that place with him, and the ſignes in particular which had beene ſhewed vnto him, in confirmation of thoſe things whereunto he was enjoyned; exhorting the King, not to C miſtruſt or impeach the Ordinance of God. The King hearing this, began to mocke him: but Moſes made him ſee, in effect, the ſignes which were ſhewed vnto him neere to the mountaine of Sinai. But the King waxed wroth, and grieuouſly reuiled him; accuſing him, for that in times paſt he fled away, for feare to be ſlaine in Ægypt; and at this preſent returned thither, vnder a ſubtill pretext, cloaking his craft with Magick, and Inchantment, the more to affright him. And at the ſame inſtant he called into his preſence the Prieſts of Ægypt, to let them ſee thoſe ſignes, and to make it manifeſt, that the Ægyptians were exerciſed in thoſe Sciences: and that he onely was not Maſter in thoſe things, the which he boaſted to performe by Gods power, but that they were but deceits and ſhadowes of maruailes, to deceiue the multitude. Whereupon the Prieſts caſt downe their Rods, and they became Serpents. Moſes being nothing mooued herewith, ſaid:

D O King, I deſpiſe not the wiſedome of the Ægyptians; but I proteſt, that that which I haue done, " doth ſo farre ſurpaſſe all their Magick and Art, as there is difference betweene diuine & humane " things. I will therefore ſhew you, that that which I doe, is not by Inchantment, nor vnder colour " of apparant veritie, but by the prouidence and power of God. This ſaid, he caſt his Rod vpon the " ground, commanding it to change it ſelfe into a Serpent: whereunto it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it deuoured all the Rods of the Ægyptians, which ſeemed to be Serpents, vntill they were all of them conſumed; and that done, Moſes tooke his ſtaffe into his hand againe, and it reaſſumed his priſtine forme. But the King being neuer the more aſtoniſhed, (but the rather incenſed at that which was done) ſaid, that this wiſdome and ſubtiltie of Moſes ſhould profit him nothing, which he vſed in diſgrace of the Ægyptians. He commanded therefore the Ouerſeer of

E the Workes, who had the gouernment of the Hebrewes, that he ſhould remit nothing of their labour, but that he ſhould oppreſſe them with more tedious and grieuous Tasks then they were wont to be put vnto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them ſtraw, to make their Tyle with) he forbare, after that time, to giue them that allowance; and taxing them in the day time to follow their worke, he appointed them by night to find and bring in their ſtraw; doubling thereby the weight of their former labour. Notwithſtanding all this, Moſes would neyther deſiſt from his purpoſe, in regard of the Kings threatning, nor the continuall cry of his countreymen, neyther was in any ſort appalled thereat; but with a confident and vnappalled mind (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to reſtore his countreymen to their deſired libertie. Hee therefore once againe accoſted the King, perſwading him to diſmiſſe the Hebrewes, to the end

F they might repaire vnto the mount Sinai, and ſacrifice vnto God in that place: for no leſſe (ſayth he) hath he commanded, neyther can any reſiſt his will. For which cauſe, he aduiſed the King to endeuour himſelfe (leſt he ſhould ſeeme to contemne his fauours) to grant the people free paſſage; for feare, leſt if hee ſhould ſecretly forbid them the ſame, hee might accuſe and condemne himſelfe to ſuffer that which they in reaſon ought to endure, who reſiſt the will and workes of God. For to thoſe that ſtir vp the wrath of God againſt themſelues, all kind of miſhaps do flock and flow on euery ſide: The Earth befriendeth them not, neyther ſmileth the Ayre vpon them; their their children are not begotten according to nature;but all things oppoſe themſelues as enemies and contraries againſt them. Moreouer he added, that the Ægyptians ſhould feele the plague, after that the people of the Hebrewes ſhould (in deſpight of their reſiſtance) depart out of their countrey. But in that the King deſpiſed theſe words of Moſes,and would not be conuerted,moſt grieuous plagues fell vpon the Land of Ægypt. (The which I will particularly ſet downe, by reaſon that at that time the Ægyptians ſuffered thoſe things, which neuer before that time happened to any other people; and for that cauſe likewiſe,that I may teſtifie and declare,that Moſes hath not falſified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and beſides,for that it is expedient for men to learne and doe thoſe things which are agreeable to Gods will,for feare leſt he being prouoked and incenſed againſt them,ſhould puniſh them for their vnjuſtice.) For firſt of all,by the commandement of God, the riuers ouerflowed with bloud, neither was it poſſible for them to drinke, (notwithſtanding they had no other fountaine of water) neither was the water onely coloured like bloud,but when as likewiſe any one dranke thereof,it ingendred and procured in him diuers dolors,and grieuous gripings. Such was the water to the Ægyptians,but to the Hebrewes it ſeemed good and ſweet in taſte, without any wayes changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the King (not knowing what to doe,and ſeeing this ſtrange accident, and being afraid,by reaſon of the Ægyptians) permitted the Hebrewes to depart. But no ſooner was this plague ceaſed, but he preſently changed his minde, and would not permit them libertie to depart. For which cauſe,God (ſeeing his ingratitude,and that he would not be warned,notwithſtanding he had deliuered him from the former calamitie) he inflicted another plague vpon the Ægyptians. He therefore ſent an infinite number of Frogs vpon them,that couered and infected the whole countrey; and the riuers were ſo packed and ſtored with them in ſuch manner, that they that drew water to drinke,found it altogether infected with the putrifaction of them,dying and rotting in the waters: ſo that the whole countrey was full of filthy mud, by reaſon of the Frogs that defaced and died on the ſame. They corrupted alſo their meats,mingling themſelues in their houſes amidſt their meat and drinke, and creeping amidſt their chambers; from whence an odious ſtench exhaled, by reaſon of the multitude of Frogs that lay dead. Now, when the Ægyptians ſaw themſelues ſo ſore preſſed with theſe euils, the King commanded Moſes, that he ſhould take the Hebrewes,and that he ſhould depart. And as ſoone as he had ſpoken this, the multitude of Frogs vaniſhed,and appeared no more,neither on the earth,nor in the water, but that they retained their accuſtomed nature. No ſooner was the earth deliuered from this Curſe,but Pharao forgot the cauſe thereof,and retained the Hebrewes anew: and (as if he had a deſire to experiment the manner of diuers miſeries)he denied them that iſſue which beforetime he had granted them; rather inforced thereunto by his feare,then forward good liking.For this cauſe,God once againe rewarded his fraud, by ſending him another plague: for a multitude of Lice ſwarmed from the bodies of the Ægyptians, whence the wretched men periſhed wretchedly; neyther could they exterminate that race,eyther by bathings or inunctions. The King troubled with this calamitie, and fearing the ruine of his people,and bethinking him of the ſhamefull end thereof,he was conſtrained to remit the better part of his malignitie. For as touching the Hebrewes,he permitted them to depart; but (after the plague was appeaſed) he required at their hands,that they would leaue their wiues and children behind them for pledges, till their returne: and by this meanes he prouoked Gods wrath more heauily againſt him, in that he ſuppoſed to delude his prouidence: as if it had not beene God,who (in the Hebrewes behalfe) had puniſhed them,but Moſes, that had plagued the Ægyptians. For God filled their countrey with many and diuers ſorts of beaſts, (the like whereof, before that time, had not beene ſeene in that countrey) which killed them vp, ſo that the earth became deſolate and vnmanured; and if any one amongſt them eſcaped from death,they were afterwards deſtroyed by ſickneſſe. But notwithſtanding all theſe,the King ſtill continued obſtinate in his wickedneſſe,and diſobedient vnto God; permitting onely, that the women and men ſhould depart, and that their children ſhould be left behind them: but God deſiſted not to puniſh his wickedneſſe by diuers and moſt grieuous plagues, farre more tedious then the former, yea,ſuch as were diſperſed ouer all the people.

For their bodies were grieuouſly tormented with Vlcers, and corrupted inwardly; and after this ſort,the greater part of the Ægyptians periſhed.But when as the King was neyther moderated nor mollified by this plague, God rained downe Haile vpon them,(which neuer before that time was engendred in the ayre of Ægypt;and further ſo great,or rather greater then that,which falleth to the Northward,neere to the Pole Artique,in the midſt of the Spring)& ſpoiled all their fruit. After which, an army of Graſhoppers deuoured all thoſe buds and fruits which were vnoffenced

A offenced by the hayle; ſo that all the hope which the Ægyptians had of their harueſt or fruite, was vtterly ouerthrowne. Theſe aforeſaid afflictions had beene ſufficient to perſwade a man of the meaneſt wit (except he had been a reprobate) to grow wiſe, and make vſe of that which was moſt profitable for him. But Pharao knowing the cauſes of the ſame, enforced himſelfe to reſiſt God, not onely through imprudence, but for malice; ſo that voluntarily hee betrayed his commonweale. Hee therefore commanded Moſes, that hee ſhould leade away the Hebrewes with their wiues; but that they ſhould leaue their ſubſtance behind them for a prey, in that they complained, that after all theſe calamities they had nothing left them. To whom Moſes anſwered, that hee demanded an vnlawfull matter, by reaſon that they were to offer ſacrifice vnto God of their prey or bootie. Now while the time was ſpent in theſe conſultations, darkeneſſe altogether deuoyd of light ouerſpred the land of Ægypt, wherethrough they died miſerably in cloſing their eyes, by reaſon of the thickneſſe thereof, ſo that they were afraid leſt the fogge ſhould choake them: which beeing diſperſed, after three dayes, and ſo many nights, Moſes ſeeing that Pharao would not repent, nor let the people of Iſrael depart, hee came vnto him, and ſpake after this manner: As long as you ſhall reſiſt the ordinance of God (who commandeth you to ſuffer the Hebrewes to depart) there is no meanes, whereby you may be exempted from theſe miſchiefes in doing that which you doe. The King enraged at theſe words, threatned him to cut off his head, if once more hee durſt appeare in his preſence, to motion vnto him any ſuch matter. Moſes anſwered him, that hee would no more ſpeake vnto him as touching this matter; but that both himſelfe, and the chiefeſt among the Ægyptians would exhort the He-

C brewes to depart: which ſaide, hee forſooke his preſence. But God intending to expreſſe that he meant yet once more to plague the Ægyptians, and to conſtraine them to deliuer the Hebrewes: he commanded Moſes to declare vnto the people, that they ſhould haue their ſacrifice in a readineſſe, and hauing prepared it the thirteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, to celebrate the ſame the 14. of the ſaid moneth (by the Ægyptians called Pharmuth, and by the Hebrewes Niſan, and Zanthicus by the Macedonians) and that hee ſhould leade foorth all the Hebrewes, bearing with them all their goods. Whereupon hee who had the Hebrewes already in a readineſſe to depart, and had diſtributed them by families, kept them in one place, and in the ſame order: but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (addreſſed to depart) made ſacrifice, and with the blood of the lambe purged their houſes, beſprinkling them with branches

D of Iſope. And after they had ſupped, they burned the fleſh that remained, as beeing on the point to addreſſe themſelues to depart. Whereupon euen at this day wee retaine the ſaid cuſtome to ſacrifice in like ſort; and do call this ſolemnitie Paſcha, wich is as much to ſay, as the paſſage; by reaſon that on that day God leauing and ouerpaſſing the Hebrewes without harme, ſtrooke the Ægyptians with ſicknes: for that plague in the night time cut off all the firſt begotten in Ægypt, ſo that by multitudes they that dwelt round about the palace, aſſembled them in the preſence of the King, and beſought him to let the Hebrewes goe: for which cauſe Pharao calling for Moſes, gaue order that they ſhould depart the countrey, ſuppoſing that as ſoone as they were gone, Ægypt ſhould no more be afflicted with ſuch like plagues. Moreouer, they honored the Hebrewes with preſents, partly to the end they ſhould depart with the more expedition, partly for the

E neighbourhood and acquaintance ſake, which they had one with another. And as they departed, the Ægyptians wept, and repented them of the euill vſage they had ſhewed vnto them: but they tooke their way towards Latopolis at that time deſart, and in which place afterwards Babylon was builded, at ſuch time as Cambyſes deſtroyed Egypt. The third day they came vnto Beelzephon neere vnto the red ſea, and for that they wanted victuals by reaſon of the deſart, they tempered their meale with water, and hardned it with a little heat, and made cakes, with which they ſuſtained themſelues for the ſpace of thirty dayes: for they had not brought any more victuall out of Egypt, but as much as would ſerue them for that time, and that which they had, they diſpenſed very ſparingly, rather feeding for neceſſitie, then eating with ſafety. For which cauſe in memory of that want, wee celebrate a feaſt for the ſpace of eight daies, which we call the feaſt

F of Azymes, that is to ſay, of vnleauened bread. But it is not eaſie to number the multitude of them that diſlodged, if we conſider the women and children; but of thoſe that were of full age, and fit to beare armes, they were in number ſixe hundred thouſand.

The Hebrewes depart out of Ægypt, vnder the conduct of MOSES.

The yeer of the world, 2454. before Christs Natiuitie, 1510.

THEY therefore forsooke Ægypt the foureteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, foure hundreth and thirtie yeeres after Abraham our father came into Chanaan, and in the two hundreth and fifteenth yeere after Iacob was transported into Ægypt, the eighteenth yeere of Moses age; who had Aaron to his brother, three yeeres elder then himselfe. They carried also with them the bones of Ioseph, according as he had commanded his sonnes. But the Ægyptians repented themselues, because they had suffered the Hebrewes to depart: the King also was very sore mooued; supposing, that which was fallen vpon them, had happened by Moses meanes: and they all concluded to pursue and follow after them. They therefore armed themselues, and furnished them with all their abiliments of warre, intending to pursue them, vnder intent to bring them backe, if they might ouertake them: for they said, that God would no more be displeased against them, for that alreadie they had giuen them leaue to depart. They hoped likewise very easily to bring them vnder subjection, because they were all of them disarmed, and wearied with trauaile. They therefore enquired of euery one which way they held, and hasted themselues to follow them, although they knew the Region was very hard to trauell in; not onely for those that were to march in troupe, but also for those that were to journey one by one. And therefore did Moses conduct them this way, to the end, that if the Ægyptians should repent them of their dismission, and should haste them to pursue them, they might receiue the reward of their wickednesse, and the breach of their promise. He chose this way likewise, lest the Palestines should vnderstand of their departure, by reason they were displeased against the Hebrewes, because of an ancient grudge which they bare them. Now doth Palestine confine and border vpon Ægypt; and therefore led he them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Chanaan, by conducting them farre about, and thorow many calamities; to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to the mountaine of Sinai, where they might offer sacrifice, according to Gods commandement. As soone as the Ægyptians ouertooke the Israelites, they prepared themselues to fight, trusting themselues to the number which they had, and shut themselues into a place of securitie: for with them, there serued sixe hundreth Chariots, with fiftie thousand horsemen, and two hundreth thousand armed footmen. They had also stopped the passages, where-through they thought the Hebrewes might escape, enclosing them betwixt vnaccessible Rockes, and the Sea; on which place there abutteth a Mountaine, vnfrequented by reason of the dangerousnesse of the way; and by this meanes they excluded them from all hope of escape, or flight: For, on the one side they were shut in by the Mountaine, that extended it selfe euen vnto the Sea; and on the other side, by their Campe, pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the Champaine, if so be they intended to flye that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no securitie, but were hemmed in by the importunitie of the place, and by reason of their want, could not endure the siege, and for that they could not finde any issue to flye from their enemies; neyther, although they greatly desired to fight, had they meanes to defend themselues, because they were disarmed. Finally, when as they perceiued that there was no hope of safetie left them, but onely by their abiect submission, they began to accuse Moses; forgetting those Prodigies, whereby God had fore-promised them their libertie: and so farre forgot they themselues, that after hauing stoned the Prophet, and through incredulitie contemned Gods promises, they were resolued to yeeld themselues subject to their former thraldome. For they were exasperated by the teares of their wiues and children, who expected nothing but death, seeing themselues begirt with Rockes, Seas, and Souldiers, and left destitute of all hope of flight. But although the multitude were exasperated against Moses, yet ceased he not to take care of them, and to thinke on God; laying before their eyes that which he had said in times past, as touching their deliuerance, and assuring them, that God would not suffer them to be subjected or ouerthrowne by their enemies; and standing vp in the midst of them, he said: If your affaires had hitherto beene managed by men onely, it were not amisse in you to distrust them, lest hereafter they should not bring them to their determined and your desired issue. But in that at this time you distrust the prouidence of God, this sheweth you to be without sense, or vnderstanding; considering it is he that hath made you see all those things which he hath promised you by me, tending to your saluation and deliuerance; yea, euen at that time when you your selues expected it not: you rather ought to hope, that God will

CHAP. VII.

The Hebrewes are pursued by the Egyptians, the sea diuideth it selfe, and giueth passage to the Hebrewes.

THIS said, he conducted the Hebrewes towards the sea, in the sight of the Egyptians. For they were within sight of them, being very much wearied with pursuit and trauell, and made their account that it should be best for them to remit the combate vntill the next day.

But when Moses was arriued vpon the banke of the Sea, hee tooke his rodde and called vpon
C God, and implored his aide and succours in these words: O Lord, thou too well knowest that it is impossible for vs by force or mans policie to escape these extremities: but thou art hee only that canst saue this company, who haue forsaken Ægypt, following thy commandement. And since of our selues we haue not any hope or meanes, we onely recommend our selues vnto thy prouidence, assuring our selues, that by that meanes onely wee may be deliuered from the pursuite and hatred of the Ægyptians: Send vs therefore speedily thine assistance, to the end that thy power may be knowne in our weakenesse. Relieue, encourage, and hearten thy people, assuring them of their safety, who through their distrust haue sinned against thee: we are inuironed with difficulties, which notwithstanding thou canst make easie. For, the sea is thine, and this mountaine that encloseth vs; the which shall open, and the Sea also diuide it selfe into D firme land, if thou commandest them. We may likewise flie thorow the aire, if it please thy power to deliuer vs in that manner. Hauing made his reqneste vnto God after this manner, he strooke the red sea with his rod; which suddenly diuiding it selfe at that stroke, and retyring backwards, left a drie passage thorow the midst thereof, where thorow the Hebrewes might escape. Moses seeing how God had made himselfe knowne, and how the sea had forsaken the land, and left his natiue channell; hee first of all marched thorow the same, and commanded the Hebrewes to follow him, marching thorow that way which God had in his diuine power prouided for them, willing them to reioyce at the danger which attended their enemies, and to giue God thankes for the vnexpected succours he had sent them: who were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At the first the Ægyptians supposed them to be mad, and that they
E did headlong cast themselues into manifest perdition: but when they perceiued that they were forwardly entred without danger, and that they encountred no danger or let, they dislodged, and followed them, as if the sea ought to haue giuen them issue also; and hauing set their horse in the vauntgard, they began to descend, and enter the way of the sea. The Hebrewes perceiuing that they spent the time in arming themselues, hasted them to flie to the opposite shore, where they arriued without any disturbance; which made their enemies more bold, supposing that no euill should happen vnto them. They supposed not that this path was made expressely for the Hebrewes; but entered the same, as if it had beene a common beaten way, forgetting that it was made to saue the Hebrewes from danger, and not themselues, who sought to ruinate them. But as soone as all the Egyptian armie was entred thereinto; the sea returned to his old
F course, and with winds and waues ouerwhelmed the Egyptians. The showres from heauen fell vpon them, vehement thunders rattled from the aire, intermixed with flashings, and the lightenings tempested vpon them. In briefe, there was nothing that through the wrath of God might be inflicted vpon men, which at that time hapned not vnto them. For, besides all that which hath beene spoken, an obscure and darke night surprized them, in such sort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to beare backe the tydings of their misfortune: That the Hebrewes could not containe themselues, such ioy they had conceiued through this their vnexpected deliuerance, and the totall ruine of their enemies: so that they assuredly perswaded themselues that they were deliuered, by reason, that they who had made them slaues vnto them perforce, were exterminated; and for that they had God so visibly assistant vnto them. When they had escaped this danger, and perceiuing likewise that their enemies were in this sort punished, yea, and after such a manner, as the like punishment hath neuer beene heard of amongst men; they all of them, during the whole Night, sung Hymnes and Songs of Rejoyce. Moses likewise composed an Ode in Hexameter Verse, containing the prayses of God, and a thanksgiuing for the fauour he had done vnto them. All these things haue I particularly declared, according as I haue found them written in holy Scriptures. Neyther ought any man to maruaile at this so wonderfull a discourse, that thorow the Sea there should a passage bee found, to saue so many persons in times past, and they rude and simple, whether it were done by the will of God, or that it chanced of it selfe; since not long time agoe, God so thinking it good, the Sea of Pamphilia diuided it selfe, to giue way to Alexander, King of Macedons souldiors, hauing no other passage, to destroy the Empire of the Persians. The next day the Ægyptian Armes, transported by the force of the streame, were cast ashore, into the Army of the Hebrewes: which when Moses perceiued that it was done by the prouidence of God, to the intent they might not be disarmed, he gathered them together, and furnished the Hebrewes therewith; who afterwards led them to the mountaine of Sinai, to sacrifice vnto God: and he offered him thanksgiuing for their deliuerance, in the behalfe of the people, according as he himselfe had before-time commanded him.

The yeere of the world, 2454. before Christs Natiuitie, 1510.

THIS new and vnexpected deliuerance of the Hebrewes from their danger, was not a little obscured by the wearinesse and tediousnesse of their journey, which they endured in their trauaile towards the mountaine of Sinai: by reason that the countrey was desart, and inhabitable, destitute of Victuals, and wholly depriued of Waters; and not onely barren of that which serued for the sustenance of men, but also euery wayes destitute of pasturage and prouision for cattell: for it was not only dry, and vtterly destitute of Water, but also depriued of all meanes to nourish and encrease fruit. Now they were enforced to prosecute their way thorow this countrey, by reason they could not otherwise chuse; so that they were constrained to beare with them the Water which they had drawne before such time as they entred the Desart, according as their Captaine and Conductor had commanded them: which being spent, they digged Pits, out of which they drew Water with great difficultie, by reason of the sterilitie of the countrey: and further, the Water which they found in those places was bitter, and no wayes fit to drinke; and that which was worse, very little in quantitie. Trauelling onwards of their journey after this manner, they arriued about the euening in a certaine place, which by reason the Waters thereabout were brackish, they called Mara, that is to say, Bitternesse. There, wearied with their trauaile, and their prouision failing them, they began to be trauailed with necessitie, so that they resolued to stay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certaine Pit there, which although it were insufficient to satisfie so great an Armie, yet for that they found it in that countrey, it yeelded them no little consolation. For they were giuen to vnderstand, that if they trauailed onwards, they should find no Water; and as touching the Water of that Pit, it was so bitter, and vnfit for their drinking, that it neyther was agreeable with mens taste, nor supportable for their very cattell likewise. Whereupon Moses seeing them so discomforted, neither knowing in what sort to satisfie them, in that he had not to deale with an opposite Armie, or Enemie, to the end, to enforce and to repell them with valour; and for that hee manifestly perceiued, that not onely a troupe of valiant men, but also a multitude of women and children were like to perish; he was very sore perplexed, not knowing what to doe; and on himselfe he heaped the calamitie of them all, as if himselfe onely were to beare the heauie burthen of their miserie; for all of them had their recourse vnto him, and to no man else: the women besought for their children, the husbands entreated for their wiues, beseeching him to take compassion of their desolations, and to furnish them with some meanes to escape their miserie. He addressed himselfe therefore in most humble manner to beseech Almightie God, that it might please him to conuert the euill qualitie of the Water, and to make it potable. Which grace and fauour he no sooner obtained, but he tooke the end of his staffe, and cast it at his feet, and afterwards brake it in the midst, and cleft it long-wayes, and cast it into the Pit; giuing the Hebrewes to vnderstand, that God had heard their prayers, and that he had promised them, to giue them that Water they desired, if so be they would obey him, and with alacritie and diligence performe that which should be commanded them. And when they were inquisitiue of that which they ought to doe; to the intent the Water might be changed, he enjoyned euery one of them, that was of best strength and abilitie amongst them, to draw Water; giuing them to vnderstand, that so soone as they had drawne out great store of Water from the Pit, the rest that should remaine, would be very good, and conuenient to be drunke. Wherein they trauelled in such sort, that the Water, agitated & purified by often drawing, became potable, and refected the wearie multitude. Hereupon dislodging from that place, they came to Helim, a country that afarre off seemed very pleasant, by reason that it was planted with Palme-trees: but the neerer they approched it, the more tedious they found it, (for there were no more then seuentie Palme-trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well growne, by reason of the drynesse and barrennesse of that country; for they were not watred by the fountaines, whereof there were twelue in that place, neither did any one of them yeeld any moisture, to giue them sustenance) so that endeuouring themselues to dig vp the sand, they could light on no veines of Water; and if perhaps any little deale appeared, it was so troubled by their digging, as it became vnfit to be tasted: neither did the trees beare any store of fruit, by reason of the want of Water. For which cause, the whole multitude began to murmure murmure against their Guide, ascribing all the cause of their calamities and miseries vnto him. G For hauing marched for the space of thirtie dayes, they had consumed all that which they brought with them; and conceiuing in their imagination, that there was no remedie, they were wholly surprized with despaire. Bethinking them therefore onely of that euill which was before their eyes, and forgetting the maruailes which God, by the ministerie & prudence of Moses, had made them both see and partake, they conceiued hatred against him, and were readie to stone him to death, as if he had beene the author of that calamitie which oppressed them. But he perceiuing the multitude so enraged and incensed against him, strengthened himselfe in God; and warranted by the testimonie of a good conscience, and the vprightnesse of his actions, he came out into the middest of them; who reuiled him, and had gathered stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorned with a singular grace and alluring countenance, and endued with pleasing H eloquence, and fit to pacifie the popularitie, he began to appease their wrath; exhorting them, not onely to forget their present difficulties, but also to remember their fore-passed blessings; not permitting, that the trauaile which they endured at that time, should driue out of their remembrance the graces and great good turnes which they had receiued at Gods hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliuerance from that extremitie, by the prouidence of God; who (as it were likely) made tryall of their vertue, to see what perseuerance they had; or whether they kept in their remembrance those things which had hapned vnto them; or whether forgetting their fore-passed pleasures, they would suffer themselues to be swallowed with their present miserie. He willed them therefore to take heede, lest through their impatience and ingratitude, they should be found vnworthy of Gods fauour; who both neglected his will, by I whose direction they were brought out of Ægypt, and sore threatned and hated him, which was Gods minister, especially since hitherto they might no wayes complaine of him in any thing, which hee had vndertaken to execute by the commandement of God. Then reckoned hee vp particularly vnto them, how the Ægyptians were ouerthrowne, and afflicted, whilest contrarie to Gods will, they endeuoured to detaine them: how the same Riuer, which to them was bloudie, and vnprofitable to drinke of, to themselues became both sweet and potable: likewise, how the Sea retyred it selfe, and furthered both their night and passage, wherein they saw themselues secure and free from danger; and contrariwise, their enemies destroyed, ouerthrowne, and drowned: and how, euen vntill that day, being disarmed, they were by Gods prouidence both furnished and fortified abundantly. Againe, how often God had deliuered them from apparant death K and danger, besides all mens opinion; who being All, and alwayes omnipotent, gaue them at that time, no, not the least suspition of his assistance. For which cause, they were to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselues, that the succour, although it were deferred, was neuer too late, which was receiued before such time as the danger had preuailed: and so to thinke, that God contemned not their perils, but that he made tryall of their fortitude and free loue, to see whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meat and drinke; or rather, whether after the manner of brute beasts, they had leifer be trained in seruile trauaile, to the end they might be glutted like them, and made the better able to endure their labour. To conclude, that he nothing feared his life (because that being vnjustly slaine, no euil could happen vnto him) but that he was fearefull of their safetie, lest lifting vp their hands to stone him, they should be L thought to oppose themselues against Gods Ordinance. Thus pacified he them, and mollified the furie they had conceiued to endanger his life: and so much preuailed he, that they repented them of that enterprize, whereby they sought to endanger him. And for that he knew that they had some reason to be thus mooued, he addressed himselfe to prayer and supplication: and ascending a certaine Rocke, he required Gods helpe to relieue their infirmities, wants, and afflictions, in whose hands onely the saluation of the people consisted; beseeching him in mercie to forgiue the people, being exasperated with extreme miseries, and by reason thereof distracted, and withdrawne from their dutie. Whereupon God promised him to haue care of the people; assuring him, to send them a speedie and present deliuerance. Which when Moses vnderstood, he came downe vnto the multitude: who perceiuing him altogether refreshed with joy, by reason of M those promises which he had receiued at Gods hands, exchanged their dolesome lamentations into a habit of delight. He therefore standing vp in the midst of them, told them, that he brought vnto them a most speedie remedie for their present necessitie. And not long after, a number of Quailes (which about the Gulfe of Arabia multiply and encrease, more then any other sorts of birds) flew and crossed the Sea; and being wearied in their flight, and accustomably accosting and flying neere to the ground, came and fell amidst the Campe of the Hebrewes: who caught them,

A them,as a prouiſion prepared for them by God,and ordained to extinguiſh their famine. Whereupon Moſes once more addreſſed himſelfe to call vpon God,yeelding him thankes for the preſent and the future good he had promiſed him. Who being after this manner fed and refreſhed, were preſently ſupplyed with a new kind of food. For at ſuch time as Moſes ſtretched out his hands,and prayed vnto God,a Dewe deſcended from Heauen,that thickned betwixt his hands:
which,for that he ſuppoſed it to be another kind of ſuſtenance,ſent them by God, he taſted the ſame; and taking pleaſure therein,for that the people knew not what it was,but thought it to be Snow which fell in that place, according to the ſeaſon of the yeere, he taught them, that it was no Dewe falling from Heauen,as they ſuppoſed, but that God had ſent them that grace, for the conſeruation and nouriture of their bodies: and hauing eaten thereof,he gaue them of it,to the B end he might ſtrengthen their beliefe; who taſting the ſame in like manner as their Chiefetaine had done, were greatly refreſhed with the ſuſtenance: for in ſweetneſſe and pleaſure,it equalled the Honey; in odour, Bdellium; and in forme and greatneſſe, the graine of a Coriander ſeede:
of which,euery one gathered. And by commandement it was enjoyned,that euery one of them ſhould particularly gather euery day the Meaſure of an Aſſaron, which is the tenth part of an Ephi,to the end,that no one ſhould be ſcanted of this food: which was done to that end,leſt the weaker ſhould want,whilſt the ſtronger,through auarice,ſhould gather more then ſufficed them.
And if any one, contrarie to the preſcript command, had gathered more then was permitted him,although he toyled and trauelled more then any of them, yet was his portion no wayes encreaſed by that meanes. For whatſoeuer (beſide the appointed Meaſure of the Aſſaron)remained C till the next morning,was of no value,through bitterneſſe; and was putrified,through wormes.
So diuine and admirable was this kind of food, and of that nature, that whoſo had ſufficient thereof,needed no other ſort of ſuſtenance. Moreouer,euen in theſe our dayes,all that countrey is beſtrewed and bedewed with that kind of Aliment, which God,in fauour of Moſes,ſent for the peoples ſuſtenance. The Hebrewes call it Manna: for in our Tongue,Man,is an interrogation, ſignifying,what is that? Thus liued they then joyfully,being ſuſtained by this kind of meat,ſent them from Heauen,and vſed the ſame for the ſpace of fortie yeeres,during that time which they liued in the Deſart. But afterwards,when they were diſlodged from that place,and encamped neere to Raphidim, they were extremely trauailed with thirſt; where, vpon their firſt arriuall, they found ſome few ſprings, but afterwards they found the Land wholly deſtitute of Water.
D They therefore once more were incenſed againſt Moſes. But he withdrawing himſelfe apart from the furie of the people,conuerted himſelfe vnto God in prayer; beſeeching him, that as he had giuen them food in their neceſſitie, he would now alſo giue them drinke at that preſent, wherein they were well-nigh choaked with thirſt; praying him to prouide them of drinke alſo, or otherwiſe, that their meat was vnprofitable to them: Whereon God preſently granted his prayer; promiſing Moſes, that he would giue him a Fountaine, and abundance of Water, from that place from whence he leaſt expected it. Hereon he commanded him,that ſtriking vpon the Rocke with his Rod,which was there by,hard at hand, he ſhould from thence ſeeke that which they demanded and wanted; aſſuring him,that euery one,without trauaile or labour,ſhould haue ſufficient therefro. Which counſaile when Moſes had receiued from Gods hands,he returned vn-
E to the people,who expected him,& had their eyes fixed vpon him: for at that time they beheld him deſcending from the Rocke,where he had made his prayer. No ſooner was he arriued,but he told them,that God would in like ſort deliuer them from that neceſſitie,& would graciouſly graunt them an vnexpected reliefe; telling them, that a floud ſhould ſuddenly breake from the Rocke. But they being amazed at that which they heard,and doubting leſt tyred with thirſt,and trauailed by journeyes,they ſhould be enforced to hew and cleaue the Rocke: Moſes ſtrucke the ſame in ſuch ſort with his Rod,that he diuided it in ſunder,and deliuered out moſt cleare & pure Water in great abundance. The people were very ſore aſtoniſhed at this ſo ſtrange accident: ſo that beholding the Water,their thirſt was quenched. They afterward drunke of the Water,and found it very ſweet and pleaſant, reſembling in the goodneſſe of it,the diuine bountie and power F of the Giuer thereof. For this cauſe they highly eſteemed Moſes,ſeeing that God had honoured him in this ſort; and they acknowledged Gods prouidence,and their thankſgiuing, by their Sacrifices; humbly thanking him for the care he had ouer them. The ſacred Scriptures likewiſe, which are kept and conſecrated in the Temple,teſtifie, that God had fore-told Moſes alſo,that Water ſhould in this ſort iſſue from the Rocke.

How the Amalechites and their aſſociates were ouercome, and how great a prey the Iſraelites obtained thereby.

The yeere of the world, 2454. before Chriſts Nativity, 1510.

BVT when the renowne of the Hebrewes waxed great, and was ſpred in the eares of all men, (ſo as the bruit thereof was heard in euery part) it came to paſſe, that the inhabitants of that countrey were in very great feare: Whereupon (ſending Embaſſages the one vnto the other) they mutually incited themſelues to expell and vtterly ruinate the whole Nation.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2.

Exod. 17. The Amalechites warre againſt the Iſraelites.

Amongſt the reſt, thoſe of the countrey of Gobol, and the Citie Petra, (who are called Amalechites, a Nation very warlike, and more actiue then the reſt) were the chiefe agents in this Expedition: whoſe Kings both encouraged one another, and whetted their neighbour Nations to the Iſraelites deſtruction; telling them, that a forraine Armie, flying from the thraldome of the Ægyptians, had inuaded their country, whoſe increaſes were not a little to be ſuſpected: counſelling them (before they had gathered head, and recouered more meanes, and a Countrey to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident, by reaſon of their forbearance) to charge them firſt, rather then to expect their increaſes, and ſo to oppreſſe them; eſteeming it a better point of wiſedome, to repreſſe their inſolencie and frowardneſſe in the Deſart, then to expect whileſt they were poſſeſſed of ſtrong Cities, and rich meanes. For this (ſaid they) is the part of wiſe men, to reſiſt the vpriſings and power of their aduerſaries; and not to expect, whileſt by dayly exploits they more and more increaſe; and rather to prouide to preuent, then deliuer themſelues from perill. After theſe Embaſſages, it was decreed by generall counſell, That they ſhould endeauour to confront and aſſault the Hebrewes. Theſe determinations and deſignes of theirs, amated and troubled Moſes very much, for that he expected no hoſtilitie. When therefore he perceiued, that the people were affrighted and amazed, to ſee themſelues (being wholly vnprouided) to be charged by ſo ſtrong and well-furniſhed an Armie, he recomforted them, and willed them to bethinke themſelues of Gods promiſes, who by his power had ſet them at libertie; aſſuring them, that they ſhould ouercome all thoſe that made partie and head againſt them, to deſtroy them: wiſhing them to thinke, that though they were inferiour vnto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and ſuch like; yet ſince they had God to friend, and readie to fight for them againſt their enemies, that they ought to conceiue ſuch courage, as if they were furniſhed with farre more then humane ſupplyes. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant, how great an aſſiſter God was, hauing had ſo often tryall of his goodneſſe in their greateſt dangers, whom both he knew to be an enemie to their enemies, and fauourable to their proceedings: which fauour of his, he moſt manifeſtly expreſſed, by his miraculous deliuerance of them from hunger and thirſt, by yeelding them free eſcape, when they were ſhut in by Sea and mountaines: And that which ſhould moſt animate them to the fight and victorie at that time, was, That after this plunge, they ſhould want nothing that appertained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moſes thus hauing encouraged the people by his words, he called vnto him the chiefeſt of the Tribes, and euery one of them that had the charge of them, both in priuate and publique aſſembly, commanding the yonger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their Generall. But they contemning their danger, and deſirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would prooue the finall end of their calamitie. For which cauſe, they inſtantly beſought Moſes to lead them forth againſt the enemie; praying him, not to dull the alacritie of the ſouldiers, by any vntimely delay. Whereupon (chuſing out among the whole multitude, ſuch as were moſt fit for Warre) he choſe Ieſus, the ſonne of Naueus, the Ephraimite, to lead them; a man valiant in Armes, and prouident in counſaile, and exceeding in pietie, and not degenerating in that reſpect from Moſes, his Maſter. He alſo in ſuch ſort diſpoſed certaine Bands, that he might not in any ſort be cut off from Water: he left alſo ſo many as might guard the multitude, and keepe the Campe and weaker companie. Thus ſtood they all the night long in a readineſſe to take Armes, ſuch as they had fitted for them, expecting their Captaines, who ſhould lead them out to fight, as ſoone as Moſes ſhould command them. On the other ſide, Moſes ſlept not, but inſtructed Ioſuah how he ſhould conduct the Armie. And as ſoone as the day appeared, he encouraged Ioſuah to ſhew himſelfe ſuch a one in that battaile, as both the place wherewith he was honoured, and the cauſe for which they fought, required; wiſhing him, by his proweſſe and good deſerts, to giue life and courage to his ſouldiers that followed him. He likewiſe exhorted the chiefeſt of the Hebrewes in particular, and in generall heartned and emboldned all others that entred the battaile.

Moſes encourageth the people to expect nothing but victorie.

And

A And as touching himſelfe, (after he had thus diſpoſed the Armie, by words and effect) he retired himſelfe vnto a mountaine, committing the Armie to Gods protection, and Ioſuahs conduct. Then encountred the Armies on both ſides, and euery one fought moſt valiantly; neyther wanted there encouragements on eyther ſides. And as long as Moſes lifted vp his hands, the Hebrewes had the better againſt the Amalechites. But for that he was vnable continually to ſupport the ſame, (and becauſe he throughly perceiued and obſerued, that as often as he held downe his hands, ſo long the enemies droue the Iſraelites to retreat) he willed his brother Aaron, and Vron (his ſiſter Maries husband) to ſtand on each ſide of him, and ſuſtaine his hands, and ſuccour him, for feare his forces ſhould faile him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrewes by maine force ouercame the Amalechites; ſo that all of them had beene ſlaine, if ſo be the B chace had continued, and had not beene cut off by the approach of the night. At this time our predeceſſors obtained a moſt happie and neceſſarie victorie: For they had the vpper hand ouer them that were embattelled againſt them, and aſtoniſhed and amated the Nations round about, and got great ſtrength and riches by their trauaile. For being ſeized of the enemies Campe, they generally gat great riches, and particularly were all of them relieued; whereas before that time they had not neceſſarie meanes to maintaine themſelues. And this victorie of theirs was the cauſe of their very great good fortune, not onely for the preſent, but alſo for the time to come: For not onely had they their enemies bodies vnder their ſubjection, but alſo their ſpirits; ſo as they were feared by all the Nations round about. And they multiplyed both in ſtrength and riches; for there was a great quantitie of Gold and Siluer taken in the Campe. C Diuers Veſſels likewiſe and Tables of Braſſe were found therein: likewiſe great quantitie of Tiſſue-worke, and excellent furniture for Armes. Moreouer, they had all their baggage, Tents, Harneſſe, and Horſes; and generally, the whole prouiſion of an arranged battaile became their prey. Then after alſo they became more vertuous, and induſtrious then before; ſuppoſing, that the end of all actions was obtayned by induſtrie. Thus ended this battaile. The next day, Moſes cauſed the enemies that were ſlaine, to be rifled, and gathered the ſcattered Armes of thoſe that fled. He honoured them alſo, that had brauely demeaned themſelues in the battaile, and prayſed the Captaine Ioſuah in publique; whoſe honour was confirmed by the applauſe of the whole Armie. There was not one Hebrew that periſhed that day: and ſo many of the enemies were there put to the ſword, as their number cannot be expreſſed. Hee offered D likewiſe a Sacrifice of thankſgiuing vnto God, and erected an Altar vnto him, and dedicated it to God, the Victor. Hee propheſied moreouer, that all the Amalechites ſhould be vtterly extinguiſhed, ſo that none of them ſhould be left aliue, in that they had aſſaulted the Hebrewes, and that in the Deſart, and at ſuch time as they were in affliction. He feaſted the Generall in like ſort. This iſſue had this battaile; which was the firſt that was leuied againſt them, or durſt aſſault them, ſince their departure out of Ægypt. But as ſoone as Moſes had celebrated a feaſt in memorie of the victorie, to the end he might giue the Hebrewes ſome repoſe after the battaile aboue-named, he cauſed them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed ſouldiers. Thus paſſing onwards by little and little, they arriued the third moneth after their departure out of Ægypt, neere to the mountaine of Sinai, where (as before-time it hath beene declared) Moſes ſaw E the Viſion in the Buſh, and other ſuch like wonders.

What counſell RAGVEL gaue to his ſonne in law.

WHEN Raguel, Moſes father in law, vnderſtood of this his good ſucceſſe, he came with great joy vnto Moſes, vnder purpoſe to ſalute him, his daughter Zephora, and her children: who (greatly rejoycing at his arriuall) prepared a Sacrifice, and feaſted the people neere vnto the Buſh that could not be conſumed by fire; and in the Banquet time, the F people was diſtinguiſhed, according to the order and place of euery family. But Aaron, with the aſſiſtants, tooke Raguel, and they ſung prayſes vnto God, aſcribing to him both the meanes and manner of their libertie. They alſo ſpake much in honour of their Generall, by whoſe vertue all things had had ſo fortunate an iſſue: Raguel on his ſide highly prayſed the people, and dignified Moſes their Gouernour, by whoſe prudence ſo many good and valiant men were guided. But on the next day, Raguel ſeeing Moſes oppreſſed with the multitude of buſineſſe, (by reaſon that he decided all their debates that appealed vnto him; who were thus perſwaded of him, That at that that time they were onely rightly censured, when Moses gaue the sentence; and they that were condemned by him, endured the verdict patiently, knowing that their cause was by him decided rather by the rule of justice, then the instinct of amerce) he for that time kept silence (in that he was loth to hinder them, who any wayes pretended to receiue any fruit of the vertue of his sonne in law.) But when he found him at his conuenient leysure, he withdrew him apart, and told him betwixt them twaine, that which he ought to doe; counselling him, that he should discharge himselfe of that paine, concerning affaires of so little consequence, and reserue onely to himselfe those affaires which were of the greatest importance, and concerned the publique estate of them all. For that there were diuers persons amongst the Hebrewes to be found, who would be capable and sufficient to heare and determine the Pleas; but touching the care of so many thousand soules, no man could vndertake it, except he were another Moses. Knowing therefore (said he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou hast behaued thy selfe towards the people, being the Minister of God, as concerning their safetie; suffer them to comprimit amongst themselues those actions and quarrels that fall amongst them, and reserue this interest to thy selfe, that thou mayest wholly intend the seruice of God, whereby thou mayest more easily exempt the people from their present necessities. If therefore thou giuest credit to my counsailes in humane affaires, thou shalt make diligent search and musters of thy whole Armie, and thou shalt establish Chiefetaines, that shall gouerne ouer ten thousands, and thousands, and fiue hundreths, and ouer fifties; and shalt ordaine Gouernours ouer them, who diuiding them by thirties, twenties, and tennes, may conduct and gouerne them. And let some be appointed amongst them, who may receiue their Titles, according to the number and names of those he commandeth; who being approoued by the whole companie, to be of good fame and vpright conscience, may censure and compound all their differences. And if any controuersie shall fall out amongst any of them in authoritie, they shall referre the deciding of that difficultie to thine owne person. By this meanes neyther shall any one of the Hebrewes be defrauded of his right, and thou thy selfe seruing God without molestation, mayest procure God to be more fauorable vnto thine Armie.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. Moses alloweth his father in lawes aduice.

This counsell of Raguel highly contented Moses, so that he fulfilled all that whereunto he had suggested him; not concealing the inuention of this policie, neyther attributing it to himselfe, but declaring publiquely vnto all men, that his father in law was the inuenter thereof. He hath likewise written in his bookes, that Raguel was the author of this Gouernment: accounting it no lesse honour, to attribute prayse to those that deserue it, then shame to vsurpe vpon another mans desert; so that hereby you may conjecture his vertue: of which, hereafter in many places wee haue more to say. Moses afterwards assembling all the people, told them, that he would ascend the mountaine of Sinai, to talke with God; to the end, that he might afterwards returne vnto them, and impart vnto them whatsoeuer profitable thing he had receiued from him in their behalfe. He likewise commanded them to pitch their Tents about the mountaine, and to haue it in reuerence, by reason of the Proximitie of God.

CHAP. IIII.

MOSES ascendeth the mountaine, and receiueth the Tables of the ten Commandements at Gods hands, and gaue them to the people.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 6. Moses ascendeth the mountaine of Sinai.

THIS said, he ascended the mountaine Sinai (which is the highest, beyond comparison, of all that countrey; and which, by reason of his strange height, and for his steepe and inaccessible ragged rockes, is not onely vnfrequented by men, but also may not be beheld, by reason it trauelleth the eye.) Further, for that it is reported, that God conuerseth and dwelleth on the same, it is held sacred by the inhabitants, and dreadfull and vnaccessible to all that behold it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commandement of the Prophet, remooving their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, suspending their judgements, and expecting the execution of the promises of those goods which Moses had fore-propheſied vnto them, at such time as he returned from God. And in the meane space, while they expected their Guide, they kept holyday, and feasted, and purified themselues for the space of three dayes, in all sorts of purification, and abstinence from the companie of their wiues, following that which Moses had commanded them. They besought God also, that he would be fauourable, and assist Moses, and by his meanes to blesse them with some fauour, that might make their life good and happie. They banquetted also in great pompe, and their wiues and children were richly attyred. Now, after they had feasted

A feasted fortie dayes space, on the third day, before Sun-rising, a Cloud couered all the Hebrewes Campe (a thing before-time vnseene by them) and enuironed all the place where they pitched their Pauillions. And although all the rest of the countrey had a cleare and vntroubled Skie, yet thereabout violent Winds were raysed, and hideously roared, and a tempestuous Raine succeeded them; and Thunderclaps, dreadfull to heare, and Lightnings, horrible to behold, signified, that God was there present, and that Moses (with good successe, and for their profit) had conferred with him. Let those that reade this, judge thereof, as it shall please them: but as touching my selfe, it is not any wayes lawfull for me to depart in any sort from that which is written in holy Scriptures. That which the Hebrewes both heard and saw, in that it was strange and vnaccustomed vnto them, troubled them greatly. Furthermore, the report that was published as touching
B that mountaine, That God repaired and dwelt on the same, maruailously amated their spirits. They therefore sad and pensiue, contained themselues within their Tents, thinking that Moses was destroyed through the wrath of God, and expecting no lesse miserie themselues. But whilest they were thus troubled in thought, Moses presented himselfe vnto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleasing majestie, and lookes so contented, as they testified the inward consolation of his minde) whom they no sooner beheld, but suddenly all their feare vanished, and in place thereof, a hope of some great good hap succeeded; and withall, the ayre, vpon his arriuall, recouered his former clearenesse and serenitie. Hereupon he summoned the people to a solemne and generall assembly, to the end he might report, and they heare, what Commandements God had giuen them by him. No sooner were they assembled, but hee (from an vpper place, to the end
C that all the people might both see and heare him) stood vp and spake after this manner: Know (sayth he) you Hebrewes, that Almightie God, as he hath neuer neglected my prayers hitherto, so at this time also hath he entertained me (being your Truchman & messenger) very graciously: and behold himselfe here in presence in your companie, and propitious to your supplications, readie to prouide you of meat to sustaine your bodies, and order & dispose your policie, to make it lasting and happie. Now although that you see me, and that a humane tongue speaketh vnto you, yet despise not my words, no more then you doe his workes, alreadie executed and testified vpon our Nation. For if you consider the worth and wonder thereof, you shal conceiue his greatnesse that hath brought them to passe, and hath neuer denyed to talke with me, and heare me, when I spake for your profit. For it is not Moses, the sonne of Amram and of Iocabel, but He it is
D that constrayned Nilus to flow with bloud, and that through diuers Plagues hath tamed the pride of the Ægyptians: it is He that hath giuen you passage thorow the midst of the Sea: it is He that hath furnished you with meat prepared from Heauen, at such time as you were in extremitie: it is He that made water spring out of the Rocke, to coole your thirsts, at such time as you were in necessitie: it is He by whom Adam had the possession and fruition both of the fruit of the Earth, and the fishes of the Sea: by Him, Noe escaped from the Deluge: by Him, our ancient father Abraham, of a wandring Pilgrim, became an Inhabiter of the Land of Chanaan: by Him, Isaac was borne, at such time as his father and mother were old: by Him, Iacob hath beene ennobled, by the vertue of his twelue sonnes: by Him, Ioseph became Lord ouer all the forces of the Ægyptians: He it is that graciously imparteth these words vnto you, by me his messenger. Let E therefore these wholsome Lawes of his be holy and inuiolable amongst you, and more deare vnto you then either your wiues and children: for in obseruing the same, you shall lead a happie life, enjoy a fruitfull Countrey, a calme Sea, and a Progenie made happie, according to the Lawes of Nature; finally, you shall become alwayes dreadfull vnto your enemies: For I haue talked face to face with God, and haue heard his immortall voyce; so dearely beloued are you vnto him, and so carefull is he of the prosperitie of your Nation. This said, he conducted the people, (both men, women, and children) to the end they might heare God talke vnto them, and teach them what to doe (for feare the Law should haue beene in lesser regard, if it had beene presented to their vnderstandings by a humane tongue:) they all of them therefore heard his voyce descending from the mountaine, so that euery one vnderstood the same. But these Precepts which Moses
F left registred in two Tables, it is not lawfull for me to expresse in so many words, and therefore I will onely expresse the sentences. For he teacheth vs:

First of all, that there is one God, who is onely to be worshipped.
Secondly, that no Image of any creature is to be adored.
Thirdly, that no man ought to sweare rashly.
Fourthly, that the seuenth day is not to be prophaned by any worke.
Fifthly, that father and mother should be honoured.

Exod. 21.

When the multitude with great ioy had heard God himſelfe ſpeake vnto them (according as Moſes had foretold them) he diſmiſſed them, and each one departed to his tent. But ſome few daies after they preſented themſelues before his Pauilion, beſeeching him that he ſhould bring them thoſe Lawes, which he had receiued at Gods hands: He to the intent to gratifie them, opened the Lawes, and preſcribed vnto each of them what they ought to do at the ſame time (as in due place it ſhall be expreſſed. But the greater part of the Lawes I deferre till another time, meaning in priuate to comment thereupon. About the very ſame time, Moſes once more aſcended the mountaine of Sinai (hauing premoniſhed the people thereof) and aſcended the ſame in their ſights: but when the time ſeemed tedious vnto them (for he was ſequeſtred from them for the ſpace of forty daies) they were in great feare, leſt ſome inconuenience had hapned vnto him; neither were they ſo much agrieued at that which had chanced vnto them, as for that they were perſwaded of the death of Moſes. For there fell a contention amongſt them, the one affirming that he was dead and deuoured by wild beaſts (which was their opinion, who conceiued a hatred againſt him) the other ſaid that he was rauiſhed vp vnto God: but they of the wiſer ſort among them, who took no pleaſure to heare any one of theſe their ſuſpicions, contained themſelues; being equally affected in reſpect of both the opinions; for that the one ſeemed not to be eſtranged from humane chance, and the other had ſome correſpondence with the vertues of the man: ſo that they endured his fortune with an equall mind, and lamented their own miſ-hap, in that they were depriued of ſuch a Gouernour and Patron as he was, and whoſe like they thought it a matter impoſſible to find: neither did their care ſuffer them to hope: neither depriued of hope could they chooſe but complaine: neither durſt they remoue their tents, in that they were commanded to expect his returne. At length (when fortie daies and fortie nights were paſt) hee returned vnto them; hauing (during that time) taſted no mortall ſuſtenance: and by his arriuall the whole hoſt was repleniſhed with great ioy; whom he certified that Gods prouidence was alwaies aſſiſting them, and that during the terme of thoſe daies, he had learned the meanes how they ſhould liue ciuilly, orderly, and bleſſedly; telling them that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereinto he would deſcend as often as it pleaſed him, which alſo in their trauell they might carry about with them; ſo that they ſhould haue no more need to aſcend vnto Sinai, but that he himſelfe might come and lodge with them, and be aſſiſtant to their praiers. Hee told them likewiſe the meaſure and order of the ſaid Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing but that they preſently addreſſed themſelues to the building thereof. This ſaid, hee ſhewed them the two Tables, containing the tenne Commandements written therein, in each of them fiue: now were theſe written by the hand of God. They all of them (reioycing at that which they had heard and ſeen) ceaſed not to imploy themſelues to their vttermoſt: ſo that they brought in ſiluer, gold, braſſe, and ſtore of wood fit for building; and which would not bee wormeaten, the hairs of goates, and the skins of ſheepe, the one died azure, and the other white; wools of the ſame colour, fine linnen, ſtones enchaſed in gold, wherewith men were accuſtomed to decke themſelues, with great quantitie of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, which was made like to a portable and mooning temple: this ſtuffe being thus gathered together, and collected with ſo great affection (according to each mans vtmoſt abilitie, he appointed work-maſters according to the Commandement of God, but ſuch, as the like might not haue bin choſen, although the matter had been committed to the peoples ſuffrages: their names are now likewiſe extant in the volumes of the ſacred Scriptures. Beſeleel of the tribe of Iuda, the ſonne of Vron of the tribe of Iuda, and Mary Moſes ſiſter: and Eliab the ſonne of Iſamach, of the tribe of Dan. The people ſhewed themſelues ſo forward in the finiſhing of this worke, that Moſes was compelled to reſtraine them, cauſing it to be proclaimed, that they had ſufficiently gathered for the worke already: for the work-maſters certified him no leſſe. They therefore addreſſed themſelues to finiſh the Tabernacle, being particularly inſtructed by Moſes of the meaſure and greatneſſe thereof, and how many veſſels they ought to haue, according to the module which God had propoſed to Moſes. The women alſo ſtroue with emulation to exceed each other in the making of the veſtures of the Prieſts, and other things which were conuenient for that work, to the end to honour the ſeruice of God.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tabernacle made by MOSES in the deſart, reſembling a portable Temple.

The yeere of the world, 2455. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1509.

NOVV when all things were prepared for this worke, as gold, braſſe, and wouen worke, Moſes commanded them to feaſt, and ſacrifice each one according to his abilitie, and ſet forward the building of the Tabernacle. Firſt of all therefore he meaſured the outward court, which in breadth contained fiftie, and in length one hundred cubites, in ſuch manner as followeth. Hee raiſed pales of fiue cubites high, and twentie in length, from the one ſide to the other, and tenne in breadth; in the hind-ſide to euery one of theſe pales or poſtes there were faſtned rings, the chapters whereof were ſiluer, and the baſes thereof gold, and the lower parts of theſe reſembled the points of a ſpeare made of braſſe, and fixed in the earth. Thorow the rings there paſſad certaine cords of fiue cubits length, which on the one ſide faſtned in the ground with brazen nayles of a cubits length, did faſten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle againſt the force of winds. Then was there a moſt fine ſilken Curtaine drawne about the ſame, which hanging from the chapters of the baſes, and incloſing all that place, ſeemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three ſides of the incloſure arounded. But the fourth ſide, being of fiftie cubites, was the front of the whole frame; the doore wherof was twenty cubits wide, hauing on both ſides double barres in ſtead of poſts; and theſe alſo were of ſiluer, except the baſes which were of braſſe; and on both ſides there ſtood three barres well faſtned, which were alſo hung round about with a Curtaine of wouen ſilke: but at the gate there hung a vaile of twenty cubits long, and fiue deepe, wouen of purple, violet and fine ſilke, embrodered with diuers flowers, without any figures of ſenſible creatures: within the gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foote of the ſame metall, wherein the Prieſts might waſh their hands and feet. And after this manner was the encloſure of the Court; In the midſt hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the Eaſt, that the riſing ſunne might ſhine vpon it: the length therof was thirty cubits, and the breadth twelue; the one of the walles thereof was towards the South, another towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the Weſt; and it was as high as long; and on each ſide there were twenty woodden plankes foure ſquare, and ioyned together, foure fingers thicke, and a cubit and a halfe broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and euery boord had two hinges, which were put thorow the two baſes that were of ſiluer, & in their ſockets receiued the hinges of the boords: the plankes of the weſt wall were ſixe in number, and gilded both within and without, all of them ſo clozed together, as it ſeemed to be but one wall. But on both ſides there were certaine boords neerely ioyned together, which in breadth contained the meaſure of one cubit and a halfe; and in thickneſſe, the third part of a hand breadth; and ſo made vp thirty cubits: but ſixe boords made vp the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were ioyned other two boords cut halfe a cubit broad, which they placed in the corners in ſtead of whole ones: euery boord had rings of gold faſtned to the outward front thereof, riueted in order, and anſwering one another on euery ſide. Thorow theſe rings were put certaine barres which were couered with gold, euery one fiue cubits long, which ioyned the boords together: and the end of euery barre was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a boxe. And on the backeſide of the walles of the Tabernacle, there was one ranke of barres placed long-wiſe, paſſing thorow all the plankes, in which by hookes or haſpes, the ſides of either were held together, and riueted and faſtned one within the other; by which meanes the Tabernacle was ſecured from the force of winds, and kept ſteddy and immoueable. Within, the length thereof was diuided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubites, on the inſide were placed foure pillars made of the ſame worke and matter, planted on like baſes, and diſtant one from the other by equall ſpaces ouerthwart, beyond theſe was the ſecret place. The reſt of the Tabernacle was for all the Prieſts; and this tripartite diuiſion of the Tabernacle reſembled the nature of the world, for the third part (which was contained within the foure pillars, to which the Prieſts had no acceſſe) did in a manner repreſent heauen the ſeate of God: but the ſpace of twentie cubites (which was onely permitted to the Prieſt, and was vnacceſſible to others) reſembled the ſea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed fiue pillars vpon brazen baſes; after theſe the Curtaines were ſpred about the Tabernacle, wouen of ſilke, and embrodered with purple, violet, and ſcarlet colours; the firſt of theſe was ſpred ten cubits euery way, and was drawn about the pillars, which ſeparated the Adyt from the other ſpace; and ſeuered it from the ſight of men; and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that was ſituate beyond the foure Pillars, it was called the Sanctum ſanctorum, or holy of holieſt: and this Curtaine or Veyle was pictured with all ſorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diuerſified with all that which might giue it ornament; but that there were no figures of liuing creatures to be found therein. The ſecond Veyle equalled the firſt in greatneſſe, workmanſhip, and colour, and incompaſſed the fiue Pillars of the entry; which reaching from the top to the middeſt of them, and faſtened to each of them by a certaine Ring, gaue acceſſe to the Prieſts that entred the ſame. To this almoſt was there annexed on the out-ſide, another Veyle of like bigneſſe, and wouen of Linnen, drawne vpon Cords from the one ſide to the other, by meanes of certaine Rings; which was ſometimes ſpred, and other times (eſpecially on the holy-dayes) vnſpred, leſt it ſhould hinder the peoples ſight: on the other dayes (eſpecially ſuch as were cloudie) it was ſpred, and ſerued for a couerture to defend the painted Veyle from the weather. Sithence, that cuſtome hath continued, after the building of the Temple, that another ſuch like Veyle (as this) ſhould be ſpred in the entrance. Beſides this, there were ten other Veyles, foure cubits broad, and twentie eight cubits long, with certaine golden hookes, enchaſed the one within the other, to the end to conjoyne them, ſo that they ſeemed to be one; which being ſpred, did couer the Tabernacle in the vpper part, and the walls on the ſides, and behind; not extending to the earth within the compaſſe of a foot. Moreouer, there were eleuen other hangings of equall breadth, but longer; namely, euery one of them of thirtie cubits, wouen with as great Art of Haires, as the other out of Wooll; which couering all the reſt, extending to the earth, reſembled the forme of a Bed-chamber: one of them couered and extended from the front, which being the eleuenth, was annexed to this vſe. Theſe alſo were couered with certaine skinnes ſewed together, which protected the ſame againſt the ſtorme and injurie of raine. For which cauſe, to them that beheld it from farre, it ſeemed a thing moſt worthie of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other ſort ſhine, then as if a man ſhould haue beheld the Heauens. But the Veyles of haire and skinnes hung after ſuch a manner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, ſet to reſiſt the force and outrage of ſtormes and tempeſts.

Exod. 37. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8.

AFTER that the Tabernacle was after this manner builded, they erected alſo an Arke, which was dedicated vnto God, of a certaine Wood that was naturally ſtrong, and ſuch as was permanent, and reſiſted corruption. This, in our natiue Tongue, is called Heoron, framed after this manner: The length thereof was of fiue handfuls, and the bredth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was couered with golden plates, and it had a couer fitted with golden hinges, egall on euery ſide. And to euery ſide in length there were faſtened two Rings of Gold, driuen and riueted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certaine barres of Gold were thruſt, that whenſoeuer there were any need, it might be carried any wayes: for neuer was it borne on beaſts backs, but the Prieſts bare it on their ſhoulders. On the couer thereof there were two ſemblances planted, which the Hebrewes call Cherubins, (which are winged creatures, of a ſtrange forme, the like whereof were neuer ſeene by any man) which Moſes ſaw figured on Gods Seat. In this Arke he placed the Tables, containing the ten Commandements; in euery one fiue, and in euery page two and a halfe: and this Arke hid hee within the Sanctuarie.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 9. The Table.

IN the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not vnlike to that at Delphos, two cubites in length, and one in bredth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feet thereof, from the middeſt downewards, were like thoſe feet which the Doriens ſet vnto their Beds; but that which aſcended from the other halfe vpwards, was ſquare. The bodie of this Table was arounded with a border, ſtanding out foure fingers length; and in euery of the feet, there were Rings faſtened about the top of the foot, to which were annexed on both ſides two things, after the manner of handles, gilded, and framed of moſt firme wood, which were not thruſt thorow the circle on both ſides, like barres, but with a button tooke hold of the vpper border of the Table, and beneath comprehended the ring of the foot, being a meanes to transferre it whitherſoeuer need requi-

A required. This was wont to be placed in the Temple towards the North wall, not farre from the Sanctuarie: and on it were placed twelue vnleauened loaues, set fixe by fixe, the one ouer against the other, and made of two Assars of the purest wheate, which measure of the Hebrewes contained seuen Cotylas of the Achenians; and aboue these loaues two golden pots filled with frankincense; but after seuen dayes, other loaues were set in their place on that festiuall day, which wee call the Sabbath. The cause of which ceremonie shall hereafter bee declared by vs. Hard by this Table neere the South wall, was placed a Candlesticke of molten gold (but not solid) of one hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrewes call Cincbares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with bowles, lillies, pomegranats, and little cups; then arising vpwards from one base, it was diuided into seuen branches, according B to the number of the Sunne and the rest of the Planets: it stretched out likewise into seuen heads, hauing orderly correspondence the one with the other, on which were planted seuen candles, according to the number of the seuen Planets, which branched out towards the East and South, in that the Candlesticke was set sidelong. Betweene this and the Table (as I said) was a little Altar erected for incense, made of lasting wood likewise, and couered on euery side with a solid plate, being a cubit broad from euery corner, and twice as high, on which there stood a little hearth enuironed with a golden crowne on euery side, in which were rings with their barres and staues, whereby it might be borne by the Priests in the way. There was another Altar of wood also before the doore of the Tabernacle, couered with plates of brasse, fiue cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with brasse, the hearth wherof C was made after the manner of a grate: for the earth receiued whatsoeuer fire fell from aboue, by reason there was no base therevnder, but neere vnto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and censers, and cups, with other instruments made for the diuine seruice, al which were of pure gold.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the vestment of the Priest, and of the high Priest.

SVCH was the Tabernacle with all that belonged thereunto. Now remaineth for mee to discourse as well of the vestments of the other Priests, which they call Chaneas, as of the Priest, whom they name Sar-Hazabachim, signifying thereby the high Priest. And first D of all as touching the ordinary Priests. When as the Sacrificer (purified according to the purification which is ordained by the Law) addresseth himselfe to sacrifice: he first of all inuesteth himself with Manachasses (which is as much to say, a trusse or restrainer, which is a kind of breech or slop, couering the priuities, made of wouen silke) where-thorow hee thrusts his feete, as in a paire of vpper breeches, and fastens the same about his loynes: On this hee casts a linnen shirt or surplice, made of double linnen (which wee call Chetomene) and that word signifieth a linnen garment or surplice: for we call linnen Cheton (that kinde of garment is a coate comming downe to the ankles, bound to the bodie; hauing narrow sleeues about the armes) which is tied vpon the brest a little beneath the armeholes, with a girdle foure fingers broad, inwardly void, so wrought as it seemed to be like a serpents skinne.) It is likewise pictured with red, purple, Hyacinthine and E silken flowers, but the ground is only silke; which being twice doubled about his brest, extendeth downe to his ankles at such time as he desisteth from sacrifice, (and this seemed they to weare in way of ornament) but when as hee is to minister in sacrifice, then (lest blowne vp by the wind, it should hinder his work) he casts it on his left shoulder. This girdle Moses calleth Abaneth, and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians, name it Emian (for so they call it.) This coat was in no manner pleited, and in the necke hath a broad opening, fastened about the two shoulders with clasps, from the edge of the coller to the brest and the middest of the backe: This call they Massabassanes. But on his head he weareth a hat (not made with a high crowne, neither comprehending the whole head, but somewhat more then the halfe:) this is called Masnaemphthes; which is decked and dight after such a rate, that it seemed a Chapplet made of thicke Riban, or of wouen F linnen oftentimes doubled and sowed, which in the vpper part is couered with another linnen, descending to the front, hiding those seames of the Riban which were vnseemely to be beheld; this is curiously fitted, lest during the time of sacrifice it should slip off. Such in generall were the Ornaments of the Priests.

The High Priest also vseth the very same (omitting none of those things which wee haue reckoned vp) but beside the rest he put on a Hyacinthine coloured coate, extending in length to his hammes (which our countrey call Methir) this girdeth hee vnto him with a girdle of diuers colours (not vnlike the former) but that it is ſtudded with gold: but the skirt of the veſture is bordered with fringes, ſowed together, to which are tyed certaine counterfait pomgranates with certaine golden bels, properly diſpoſed; ſo that betweene two Pomgranates, there is placed a bell, and betweene two bels one Pomgranate. This coate is not made of two pieces (as hauing ſeames on the ſhoulders, and on the ſides) but a long vaile wouen and left open in the coller, not athwart, but long-waies, from the breſt to the middeſt of the backe. To it is a riban or hemme faſtned, leſt the opening ſhould bee perceiued: it is likewiſe open in that place where the hands ſhould be put out. Beſides theſe veſtures, he hath a third called an Ephod (reſembling a Grecian frocke, that is made after this manner.) It is wouen of diuers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midſt of the breſt there is a ſpace left open: the ſleeues are made in ſuch manner, & all the reſt in ſuch ſort compoſed, that it ſeemeth to be a coat: in this void ſpace there is a piece enchaſed of the bigneſſe of a ſpan long, embrodered with the ſame colours, gold, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Eſſen, that is as much to ſay, as Rationall (which wholly filleth the ſpace that was left void by them that haue wouen the Ephod.) And this piece is ioyned with the Ephod, and to euery corner thereof with buckles of gold, which are tied with a lace of Hyacinth applied to tie them together with theſe buckles. And to the end the ſpace between the buckles bee not ſlacke, they filled the ſuture with a Hyacinthine threed: but on either ſhoulder two Sardonix ſtones enchaſed in gold (in ſtead of buttons) doe tie the hood or Ephod; in theſe are ingrauen the names of Iacobs ſons in Hebrew Characters, in either ſtone ſixe: ſo that the elder of them were placed on the right ſhoulder. Moreouer twelue precious ſtones diſtinguiſh the Eſſen or Rationall it ſelfe, of excellent greatnes and beauty, which for their ineſtimable price could not be bought by any priuate man. They were inchaſed three and three in foure ranks in certaine crownes of gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the firſt order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the ſecond, a Carbuncle, a Iaſpis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurius, an Amethyſt, and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chryſolite, an Onyx, and a Berill ſtone. In theſe were the names of Iacobs ſonnes engrauen, whom we eſteeme for the firſt authors of our tribes (euery ſtone being honoured with a ſeuerall name, according to the order of their birth.) But whereas theſe rings (whereof before wee haue ſpoken) are weake and cannot ſuſtaine the waight of the precious ſtones, they made other two greater in the toppe of the Rationall inclining toward the neckeward, beeing eminent aboue the texture, which might receiue the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the ſhoulders to be faſtned with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked, and conueied certaine pipes, but thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brim behind the Ephod, to faſten the Rationall, to the end it ſhuld neither ſway this waies nor that waies. To the ſame Rational alſo was there a girdle ſewed, diſtinguiſhed with the ſaid colours and gold; which comprehending the whole, and again knit vpon the ſeame, was ſuffered to hang downewards. And as touching the fringes, they were ſhut in hollow loops of gold from the one end to the other. Now his hat was ſuch as the other Prieſts vſed, on which there ſtood an other ſewed thereto, and flouriſhed with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was inuironed with a golden crowne, in which there were diuers veſſels of gold made after ſuch a ſort as may be ſeene in that herbe which we call Daccharus, and amongſt the Grecian herbaliſts, Henbane. And leſt any man that hath heretofore ſeene the ſame, ſhould be ignorant of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the ſame, hath not ſeene the herbe it ſelfe; I haue thought good to ſet downe the deſcription thereof in this place. This herbe is of the height of three ſpans, it hath a roote like a Turnep or Nauew (and he ſhall not erre, that in regard thereof ſhall compare it therewith) it hath leaues that reſemble Smallage or Rocquet: this out of the ſtem thereof yeeldeth forth a certaine bud cleauing to the branches of it, inueſted with a coat, which it caſteth off when the fruite waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the ioynt of a little finger, hauing a circumference like vnto a cup; which I will deſcribe more fitly, once againe, that the ignorant may the better diſcouer it. In the lower part therof about the bottome it reſembleth in roundneſſe a halfe bowle; and according as it groweth euery part thereof is ſtreightned, vntill being againe dilated in the extremitie or brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much vnlike to a Pomgranate cut in the middeſt, to which there is annexed and groweth a round couer as if turned and framed on purpoſe, hauing theſe eminent clefts (as I ſaid) like to the middeſt of a Pomgranate, reſembling the pointed and ſharpe thornes, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certaine fruit vnder the couer, and in the whole cup is like to the ſeede of the herbe Sideritis, his flower is not much vnlike that which ſpringeth from the Poppey. Such was this crown about the necke and the two temples, for theſe cups came not neere the front or brow. For on the

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the ſtrange and cauſeleſſe malice, which other Nations haue conceiued againſt vs, as if we were injurious againſt the diuine Majeſtie, which (they ſay) they ſo much honour. For, if a man marke the compoſition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Prieſt, and conſider all the neceſſaries which we vſe in celebrating the diuine Seruice, they ſhall find, that our Law-maker was a man of a diuine ſpirit, and that we without any deſert are injured by other Nations. For, if without partialitie a man will duly examine it, he ſhall find, that all things haue beene done to repreſent and figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirtie cubits, diuided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrificers, as a

The Table on which the twelue Loaues were placed, ſignifieth the yeere diuided into twelue moneths. The Candleſticke, made of ſeuentie pieces, ſignifieth the twelue Signes, thorow which euery one of the ſeuen Planets paſſe: the ſeuen Lampes that were therein, repreſented the ſeuen Planets. The Veyles, made of foure ſeuerall kinds of ſtuffes, reſembled the foure Elements: for the Linnen ſeemed to repreſent the Earth, from whence it was drawne & deriued: the Purple reſembled the Sea, becauſe the Purple colour is made of the bloud of a ſhell-fiſh, called Murex: the Hyacinth ſignifieth the Ayre: and as touching the Scarlet, it ſignifieth the Fire. The Tunicle likewiſe of the high Prieſt demonſtrateth the Earth, for it is

C made of Linnen. The Hyacinth ſheweth the Pole: the Pomegranats reſembled the Lightning, as the Bells the noyſe of the Thunder. The Sircot ſheweth, that the whole World is compaſſed of foure Elements, reſembled in his foure colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things. Eſſen alſo is planted in the middle thereof, in ſuch ſort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewiſe, the Girdle wherewith he is girt, reſembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix ſtones (ſet as Buttons or Loopes in the high Prieſts Garment) ſignifie the Sunne and Moone. The number of the Gems are alluded to the number of the Moneths, or the twelue Houſes, or the equall number of the parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiake (he ſhall not much erre, that followeth either the one or the other of theſe opinions.) The Cap likewiſe hath an alluſion to Hea-

D uen, by reaſon of his Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwiſe, the Name of God might be placed therein: for it was beautified with a Crowne of Gold, to ſignifie the Light, wherein God highly delighteth. Let this ſuffice for the preſent: for that which we ſhall diſcourſe hereafter, will furniſh vs with ſufficient and ample matter, to ſhew and ſet out the vertue of our Law-maker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Prieſthood, and the Lawes which appertaine to the Feaſts and Sacrifices.

E AFTER theſe things aboueſaid were finiſhed, and left as yet vnconſecrated, God appeared vnto Moſes, commanding him to eſtabliſh Aaron, his brother, in the Prieſthood (who, in reſpect of his vertue, deſerued that title of honour aboue all the reſt.) For which cauſe, Moſes (aſſembling the congregation) diſcourſed vnto them his vertues, and diſcouered his good affection, and reckoned vp vnto them, how many dangers he had ſuffered in their behalfe, (whereof each of them gaue ample teſtimonie, declaring the forward zeale and loue they alwayes bare vnto him) whereupon he ſpake vnto them after this manner: The worke is now brought to ſuch an end as it hath pleaſed God, and hath beene poſſible for vs: and for that you know we are to receiue him into this Tabernacle, we ought aboue all things to haue an eſpeciall care in the election of ſuch a one, who ſhall make ſacrifice and ſupplication for vs. Touching my ſelfe, if the matter depended on my priuate choyſe, I ſhould eſteeme no man more worthy then my ſelfe to

F execute this Function, both for that naturally men loue themſelues, and for that I am well aſſured, how many trauailes I haue ſupported for your ſafetie ſake. But God himſelfe hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath choſen him for his high Prieſt and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of vs in equitie and juſtice; commanding, that he ſhould be inueſted with the Robe conſecrated to God, and that he ſhould take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He ſhall make prayers for you vnto God; who will heare them willingly, by reaſon that he hath care of your race, and will receiue them, proceeding from a perſonage whom he himſelfe had elected.

These words of his were gratefull vnto the people, and they all of them approoued the election G which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour then any other, both by reason of his race, as also in regard of the prophecying spirit and vertue of his brother. He had at that time foure sonnes, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoeuer remained of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was imployed to make Veyles to couer the Tabernacle, Candlesticke, Altar, and the other Instruments, to the end, that in their trauaile they should not be soyled eyther by raine or dust. And hauing once more assembled the people together, he commanded them to offer euery one of them halfe a Sicle; (now the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew Coyne, that is as much in value as foure Athenian Drammes) whereunto they obeyed willingly: so that the number of them that offered, was sixe times one hundreth thousand fiue hundreth and fiftie. And they that brought this Money, were such as were of a H free condition, and betwixt the yeeres of twentie and fiftie; and that which was receiued, was imployed in the necessaries of the Temple. Then did he purifie the Tabernacle, and the Priests, in manner and forme following. He tooke the weight of fiue hundreth Sicles of chosen Myrrh, and the like quantitie of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a most odoriferous Drug) the halfe of the said weight; and he caused all these to be beaten and infused into a Hin of Oyle of Oliue, others write, Palme; (this Hin is one of our Measures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed & boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a most odoriferous Oyntment; which he tooke, and anoynted the Priest withall, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them: offering many and sundry sorts of beasts, of great price, to sacrifice within the Temple, vpon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbeare to speake any further, for feare I should grow offensiue and tedious to the Readers.) Twice I a day, before the Sunne-rise, and Sunne-set, they were to burne Incense, and purifie the Oyle, and refresh the Lampes; whereof, three ought to burne euery day vpon the sacred Candlesticke, in honour of God, and the rest were lighted in the euening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Beseleel and Eliab were the most excellent and experteſt workemen; for whatsoeuer had beene enterprized by others, they in their Art polished and perfected. And they of themselues found many new things, of their owne inuention: yet was Beseleel judged the most excellent of them two.

All the time imployed in this worke, was seuen months; and at that time was the yeere accomplished, which began at their departure out of Ægypt. In the beginning of the second yeere, in K the month which the Macedonians call Xantichus, and the Hebrews Nisan, vpon the new Moone, they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereunto, according as I haue made mention. And God presently testified, that both their Gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrewes labours fruitfull and pleasant in his sight; testifying his presence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the Heauen was otherwayes cleare and faire, ouer the Tabernacle onely there was a Cloud; not wholly thicke, like a Winter storme, nor obscure; and yet not so thinne, as a man could see thorow the same; from whence there descended a Dewe, that gaue testimonie of Gods presence vnto them that had will, and beleefe. Moses honoured the Worke-masters that made the Worke, with such rewards as appertained vnto them by desert; and sacrificed according as God had commanded him, in the Doore or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, a Ram, and L a Kid for their sinnes, (but with what ceremonie these things are done, I will declare, when I entreat of Sacrifices, as also what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed vpon) and with the bloud of the slaughtred beasts he besprinkled the Vestment of Aaron, and purified both him and his children with fountaine water and the precious Oyntment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seuen dayes space he consecrated both themselues, and their Vestments, and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained thereunto, with that Oyle whereof I haue before-time fore-told you, with the bloud of Bulls and Rams slaine euery other day, after their kind. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a holy-day and festiuall to all the people, and decreed, that euery one of them should particularly sacrifice, according to his abilitie; and they with emulation (striuing to exceed one another) obeyed M him, and offered vp their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

Exod.45. The Tabernacle was dedicated on the first day of April, the second yeere after their departure out of Ægypt, the yeere after the Creation of the World, 2455. before Christs birth, 1509.

The dedicatlon of the Tabernacle, and the Priests. Leuit.8.

Whilest thus the Sacrifices were vpon the Altar, suddenly there issued a fire from them, which kindled of it selfe, the flame whereof resembled the Light, or brightnesse of Lightning, and consumed all that which was vpon the Altar. At that time there hapned an inconuenience to Aaron, which although it somewhat mooued and amated his fatherly patience, yet digested he it with a constant and generous mind: for he was a man of much constancie, and such a one as knew, that nothing Leuit.9. The Sacrifice is consumed of it selfe. Leuit.10.

A nothing could befall him without the preſcience and prouidence of God. For of thoſe foure ſons (which I told you that he had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing ſacrifices vnto the Altar (not ſuch as were appointed by Moſes, but of that ſort they were accuſtomed to offer beforetimes) were burned by the violent flame that iſſued from the Altar, ſeiſing both their breſts and faces, in ſuch a ſort, as by no meanes poſſible that might bee extinguiſhed; ſo that at length they dyed. Moſes commanded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the hoſt, and burie them ſumptuouſly: all the people wept and were amazed very much at this their death, ſo ſtrange and vnexpected. But Moſes ordained that neither the father, nor his ſonnes ſhould lament; but that they ſhould rather make eſtimate of Gods honour, then of their owne misfortune: for Aaron was already inueſted in the ſacred robe.

Nadab and Abihu Aarons ſons burned.

B But as touching Moſes, he refuſed all honours which were offered him by the people, neither applyed hee himſelfe vnto any other thing but to the ſeruice of God: neither did hee aſcend any more vp to the mountaine of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle to take counſell at Gods hands in thoſe things, whereof he had need to be informed. Hee demeaned himſelfe like a priuate man, not onely in his apparell, but in all other things, and liued very popularly, perſeuering in that familiar and ciuill courſe of life, and challenging no priuiledge aboue any man, but onely in thoſe things which pertained to the adminiſtration of the Commonweale.

Beſides theſe, he reduced vnder writing both the lawes and ordinances as touching Policie, in due performance whereof if they ſhould liue, they ſhould be both agreeable to God, and C liue without cauſe of controuerſie the one againſt the other. And all this eſtabliſhed hee, following thoſe directions, which God inſtructed him in. But now will I returne and bend my ſtile to diſcourſe vpon that which I haue omitted in the ornament of the High Prieſt: for this apparell of theirs leaueth not any occaſion to falſe prophets, to execute their wicked impoſtures: and if there bee any ſuch, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods Maieſtie, this habit maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to bee preſent with the ſacrificers, at ſuch time as it pleaſeth him; and to be abſent when him liſteth: which God would haue made knowne not onely to the Hebrewes, but to all thoſe ſtrangers, who by any occurrence might be eye-witneſſes of the ſame. For of thoſe ſtones which the High Prieſt bare on his ſhoulders (which were Sardonixes, whoſe nature is ſo notorious to all men, that it were vn- D neceſſarie to reueale it (the one ſhined at ſuch time as there was any offering, & that other which was faſtned on his right ſhoulder, ſhined very cleerely at ſuch time as God was preſent at the ſacrifice, and caſt his raies afarre off, that it might bee perceiued by thoſe that beheld the ſame, both contrary to his nature and cuſtome: which truely deſerueth admiration amongſt all men, except thoſe who through contempt of Religion, doe hunt after an opinion of wiſedome. But that which I will now ſpeake of, is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelue ſtones which the High Prieſt bare (ſewed and enchaſed in his Rationall in the midſt of his breſt) God was wont to foreſignifie victorie to thoſe that were addreſſed to battell. For ſuch brightneſſe lightned out of them, euen before ſuch time as the army did diſlodge or enter skirmiſh, that it was notoriouſly knowne to the people, that God was preſent and ready to aſſiſt them: for which E cauſe the Greeks making account of our manner of liuing, in that they had no power or reaſon to contradict it, haue called that Rationall which we terme Eſſen (mooued thereunto by this expreſſe miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rationall and the ſtone Sardonix gaue ouer to ſhine two hundred yeeres before I began to write theſe Antiquities, by reaſon of Gods wrath which hee had conceiued through the breach of his lawes (of which at another time I will more fitly intreat, and at this time continue and proſecute my intended diſcourſe and purpoſe. After the Tabernacle had beene thus conſecrated, and that which appertained to the Prieſts was ſet in order, the people was perſwaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and began to ſacrifice and ſing hymnes of praiſes, as to him that had driuen farre from them all ſuſpicion of euill, and from whom they expected in time to come farre better and F more proſperous things; and both in generall and in particular they offered gifts vnto God according to their tribes: for the Gouernours of the tribes (aſſembling themſelues together two by two) prepared a Charriot and a yoake of Oxen, ſo that there were ſixe Charriots to beare the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore euery one of them offered a viall and a cenſer, and a cofer to keepe Incenſe in, which was eſteemed to be worth tenne Dariques, and this was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the cenſer was of ſiluer, and both of them together weighed two hundred ſicles; yet on the viall there were but 70. employed: and both the cofer cofer and viall were filled with meale ſteeped and moulded in oyle, which they were wont to G vſe at the Altar, at ſuch time as they offered ſacrifice. They offered likewiſe a Calfe, and a Ram, with a Lambe of one yeere old, for a burnt ſacrifice; and a Goat for a Sinne-offering. All the other Gouernours likewiſe brought euery one of them their ſacrifice called Salutarie, for euery day two Oxen and fiue Rams, with a Lambe and a Goat of a yeere old, and ſacrificed them during the terme of twelue dayes euery one. But Moſes aſcended no more to the mountaine of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was inſtructed by God of that which he had to doe, and what lawes he ought to make, which are ſo good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wiſedome: They haue beene faithfully obſerued likewiſe alwaies, becauſe they are ſuppoſed to be receiued from God. So that not any one of his lawes haue beene theſe lawes, being reſolued to compoſe another treatiſe as touching the ſame.

CHAP. X.

The Ordinances of Sacrifices and Purifications.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. al. 12.

NOVV will I onely reckon vp a few things as touching the purifications and ſacrifices (in that we haue begun to talk of ſacrifices.) The ſacrifices are of two ſorts: the one of them is made for a priuate perſon; the other for the people in generall: and theſe are made in lar perſon that offered a burnt-offering, killed an Oxe, a Lambe, and a Goate of one yeere old, (yet is it lawfull to kill Oxen more elder.) But all thoſe creatures which muſt be conſumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Prieſts beſprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dreſſe they the beaſt, and cut it in pieces, and pouder it with ſalt, and lay it on the Altar already charged with cleft wood, and flaming fire: then after they haue well cleanſed the feete and intrails, they lay them with the reſt; and the Prieſts take the skinnes. Such is the maner of a burnt-offering or Holocauſt. They that offer ſacrifices of thankſgiuing, kill like-the caule, and all the fat; with the lobe of the liuer, and the tayle of the Mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the breſt, and the left leg is left to the Prieſts: and as touching the reſt of the fleſh, the Prieſts banquet therewith for the ſpace of two dayes; and if then there remain any thing therof, it is burned. The ſame cuſtome and ceremonie likewiſe is obſerued in the ſacrifice for ſins: but thoſe that are not of ability to offer the greater offerings, offer vp two Pigeons, or two Turtles, the one of which the Prieſts haue to feaſt withall, and the other is conſumed with fire. We will intreat more expreſſely of the ſacrifices of ſuch beaſts, at ſuch time as we ſhall diſcourſe vpon ſa-

The Law likewiſe forbiddeth to offer any beaſt whatſoeuer, that day that it is borne, or to kill it with his Dam, or in any other ſort,before it hath fed twelue dayes. There are alſo other Sacrifices made for deliuerance from ſickneſſe,or for other cauſes;in which Sacrifices,they imploy Wine or Liquor with that which is offered; of which Liquors,it is not lawfull to reſerue any thing againſt the next morrow, when the Prieſts haue taken that portion which belongeth to,and ſufficeth them.The Law commandeth,that on the common Purſe there be euery day killed a Lambe of a yeere old, the one in the morning, the other at the ſhutting vp of the euening: and on the ſeuenth day, which is called the Sabbath, that two ſhould be offered in that manner as hath beene declared. And on the new Moone, beſides their dayly Offerings, B they ſacrifice two Oxen, ſeuen yeereling Lambes, and a Wether and a Kid, for the abolition of thoſe ſinnes which are committed through forgetfulneſſe. On the ſeuenth moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) beſides the aboue-named, they ſacrifice a Bull,one Mutton,ſeuen Lambes,and a Kid for ſinnes. The tenth day of the ſame moneth,according to the Moone,they faſt till the euening,and on the ſame day they ſacrifice a Bull,two Muttons,ſeuen Lambes,and a Goat,for a Sinne-offering: beſides which,they bring two Kids;one of which is ſent aliue,out of the limits of the Campe into the Deſart(on whom all the euill may fall,if ſo be any be threatned to the people) the other is borne without the Campe,into a cleane place,where it is burned with the skin,being not any wayes purged. With this they burne a Bull,which is not allowed out of the common charge,but by the proper coſts of the Prieſt.This Bull being opened and ſlaine,and C the bloud thereof(with that of the Goat)being carried into the Tabernacle,he ſprinkleth the couer thereof with his finger ſeuen times,and the Pauement as many times,and the Tabernacle and the Altar of Gold,and all the reſt about the great Altar,which is abroad in the Court. Beſides that, they ſet on the Altar the reines,and the fat with the Lobe of the Liuer, and the Prieſt offereth vnto God a Mutton for a burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the ſaid moneth(at ſuch time as it draweth towards Winter) he commanded them to plant Tabernacles euery one in his family, againſt the inſtant cold weather which the encreaſing yeere was wont to bring: and that when they ſhould enjoy their Countrey,and ſhould enter that Citie which they ſhould hold for their Metropolitane,(by reaſon of the Temple which ſhould be there builded) they might celebrate a feaſt during eight dayes ſpace,in offering burnt-offering and Sacrifices vnto God:and that D in witneſſe of their thankſgiuing,they ſhould beare in their hands a branch of Mirtle and of Willow,tied together with wooll,and a bough of Palme likewiſe,to which a Peach was faſtned;and that the firſt day they ſhould ſacrifice thirteene Oxen, and foureteene Lambes, and two Sheepe, with a Goat,for a Sinne-offering.Thoſe dayes that enſued,they ſacrificed likewiſe a like number of Lambs,and Wethers,with a Kid; and in rebating day by day the number of Oxen,they come backe to the ſeuenth.The eighth day they ceaſe from worke. On this day(as we haue ſaid) they ſacrifice a Calfe,a Ram,and ſeuen Lambes,and a Kid, for a Sinne-offering: and it is the cuſtome of the Hebrewes to performe theſe Sacrifices at ſuch time as they pitch their Tabernacles.In the moneth Xantique(which we call Niſan) which is the firſt moneth of the yeere, the fourteenth day after the new Moone,the Sun being in Aries, (for at that time were we deliuered out of Ægypt) E he ordained, that euery yeere we ſhould doe Sacrifice,which we call the Paſſeouer, which (as I ſaid)was celebrated the ſame time that we departed out of Ægypt.This ſolemnitie of Eaſter we celebrate by companies, without reſeruing any thing of that which is offered, till the next day. The fifteenth day the feaſt of vnleauened bread followeth the ſolemnitie of the Paſſeouer; and during thoſe ſeuen dayes,it is vnlawfull to eat any vnleauened bread:and euery day are ſlaine two Bulls,one Ram,and ſeuen Lambes, which are all conſumed with fire; to which there is added a Kid,for a Sinne-offering,for a ſeuerall dayes banquet to feaſt the Prieſts with.The ſecond day of this feaſt of vnleauened bread (which is the ſixteenth of the moneth) they begin to enjoy the fruits that are mowed, and before that time vntouched. And for that it is very conuenient,that God ſhould be honoured with the firſt fruits thereof, from whom they receiue ſuch abundance, F they offer the firſt fruits of Barley after this manner: After they haue dryed a handfull of the eares,they beat or threſh it, and cleanſe the Barley from the chaffe, and offer an Aſſar of the ſame vpon the Altar vnto God;and after they haue caſt a handfull of the ſame on the Altar,they leaue the reſt for the Prieſts vſe: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reape as well in publike as in particular.With theſe firſt fruits,they ſacrifice vnto God a Lamb,for a burnt-offring. Seuen weekes after the feaſt of the Paſſeouer (that is,fortie nine dayes) on the fiftieth(which the Hebrewes,by reaſon of the number,call Aſartha) they offer vnto God a leauened bread,made of

But the burnt-Offerings are, of three Calues, two Wethers, and foureteene Lambes; beſides two Kids, for a ſinne-Offering. There is not any feaſt wherein they offer not a burnt-Offering, and deſiſt not from all manuall labour: but in euery one of the ſame, there is ordained a certaine ſort of Sacrifice which they ought to doe; and it is preſently ordered, that they reſt from their labours, and after Sacrifice fall to banquet. On the common charge they offered vnleauened Bread, of twentie foure Aſſars of flower: and thoſe Loaues they baked two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the morning, they bring it, and ſet it on the ſacred Table, oppoſing ſixe to ſixe, the one againſt the other; and vpon them are impoſed two platters full of incenſe: and theſe things remaine after this manner H till the next Sabbath, and then ſet they new in the place of the firſt, which are giuen to the Prieſts for their maintenance. The incenſe is caſt into the ſacred fire, in which the burnt-Offerings are conſumed, and in place thereof there is new incenſe put. The Prieſt alſo ſacrificeth on his owne charge, flower mingled with oyle, and a little baked by fire; and this doth he twice euery day, and bringeth to the fire halfe an Aſſar of flower in the morning, and the other halfe in the euening. But I will entreat hereof more expreſſely hereafter; and for the preſent, me thinkes I haue ſufficiently ſpoken alreadie.

The Tribe of Leui ſacred to God.

Moſes ſeparated the Tribe of Leui, and exempted them from the other people, to the end they might be conſecrated vnto God; and he purified them with liuing fountaine-water, and purged them with ſolemne Sacrifice, and committed the Tabernacle to their charge, with all the holy I things pertaining thereunto, and all the reſt which had bin made for the couer of the Tabernacle, to the end they might be miniſters to the Prieſts, their ſuperiors, who were alreadie conſecrated to God. After this he diſtinguiſhed the beaſts alſo; namely, thoſe that were to be eaten, from thoſe which were to be forborne and abſtained from, (of which we will ſpeake, at ſuch time as occaſion is offered vs; and will bring proofes, and the reaſon which induced him to ordaine, that ſome were proper to feed vpon, & for what cauſe he would that we ſhould abſtaine from otherſome.) He hath generally interdicted all vſe of bloud in meats, eſteeming the bloud to be the ſoule and ſpirit of beaſts. He hath alſo generally prohibited to eat the fleſh of thoſe beaſts that died by themſelues: likewiſe the caule and fat of Goats, of Sheepe, and Oxen. He thruſt them likewiſe out of the companie and conuerſation of men, who were leprous, and ſuch as were troubled with K the flux of their ſeed. And as touching women that haue ſickneſſe, he ſequeſtred them for the ſpace of ſeuen dayes, after which, it was lawfull for them to conuerſe indifferently the one with the other. The like decreed he of thoſe that had aſſiſted the buriall of a dead man, whom he permitted to conuerſe with other, after ſeuen dayes were expired. It was a thing alſo decreed by law, that he that was ſurprized with vncleanneſſe, and vnpurified beyond the number of thoſe dayes, he ſhould ſacrifice two Wethers, one of which ſhould be purified, and the other giuen to the eſteeming them as men little differing from the dead. And if any one, by his prayers made vnto L God, was deliuered from this diſeaſe, and his skin reduced to his natiue colour, ſuch a one preſented himſelfe before God in diuers Oblations and Sacrifices; of which, we will ſpeake hereafter.

Againſt them that obiect againſt Moſes and his followers, that they fled out of Ægypt for Leproſie.

For which cauſe they are worthy to be laughed at, who ſay, that Moſes fled out of Ægypt, becauſe he was a Leper, and that he conducted with him other ſuch as were trauelled with that diſeaſe, and brought them into the Land of Canaan. For, if that were true, Moſes had not made theſe Ordinances, to his owne prejudice: which if other had propoſed, it behooued him to haue oppoſed himſelfe againſt them; eſpecially, ſince amongſt other diuers Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are ſo farre from diſdaine & contempt, as that they haue bin made Generals of moſt notable Armies, and elected for Gouernors of Commonweales, hauing libertie to enter the Temples, and to be preſent at the Sacrifices. What therefore hindred Moſes (if he had M bin polluted with the like hatefull ſickneſſe) to make ſuch lawes, and ordaine ſuch ſtatutes among thoſe people, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby ſuch as were therewith infected, might be preferred? By which it is manifeſt, that thoſe things that are obiected againſt him, are rather of malice then probabilitie. But Moſes being cleane from ſuch ſickneſſe, and conuerſing amongſt his countreymen which were vntainted, made theſe Ordinances for them that were ſicke, hauing regard to the honour of God. But of theſe things, let each man cenſure as beſt liketh him.

He

A He forbade that women ſhould enter into the Temple after their deliuerance, or to aſſiſt the ſacrifice, vntill fortie dayes were expired (if they had beene brought a-bed of a ſonne) but if it were a daughter, he willed that the number of the dayes ſhould be doubled; and that when they ſhould enter, they ſhould preſent their offerings vnto God, and to the Prieſts that offered them. And if any one ſuſpected that his wife had committed adulterie; he brought an Aſſar of grinded barley, and caſt a handfull therof before God, and the reſt was reſerued for the maintenance of the Prieſts: and then the Prieſt placing the woman in the Porch which is right ouer againſt the Temple, and taking the couer from her head, writeth the name of God vpon a skinne, and maketh her ſweare that ſhe hath not plaied falſe with her husband; and wiſh if ſhe had tranſgreſſed the bounds of chaſtity, that her right thigh might be put out of ioynt, her wombe might B rot, and that death might follow thereupon: but if (through entire loue, and iealouſie proceeding therefro) her husband had beene inconſiderately drawn into that ſuſpicion, that ſhe might within ten moneths bring forth a male child. And after ſuch an oath miniſtred vnto her, the Prieſt wipeth out the name of God that was written on the skinne, and wringeth it into a viall; and then taking of the earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and hauing mingled the ſame, giueth it to the woman to drinke; and if ſhee had beene vniuſtly accuſed, ſhe continueth with childe, and beareth her fruit her full time: but if ſhe hath falſified her faith to her husband, and forſworne her ſelfe before God, then dieth ſhe a ſhamefull death, for her thigh is nummed, and her wombe growes full of water. See here how Moſes hath prouided for theſe ſacrifices at the purifying of a woman. He furthermore made theſe lawes which enſue. He generally forbad C adulterie, iudging it to be a great good hap, if men demeaned themſelues honeſtly in marriage: and that both in politique eſtates, and priuate families, it was a thing moſt profitable, that children ſhould be borne in lawfull Matrimony.

Exod. 22. Deut. 17. Leuit. 18. 20, 21, 29.

The law alſo forbiddeth a man to haue the vſe of his mother (for that it is a thing moſt abominable) and likewiſe prohibiteth him to keepe vnlawfull companie with his fathers wife, his aunt, and his ſiſter, or his ſonnes wife: and deteſteth it as a moſt hainous and hideous offence. It prohibiteth alſo the vſe of a woman when ſhe hath her monethly ſickneſſe; the vſe of beaſts alſo eſpecially the male, by reaſon that ſuch affections are abominable: and againſt the tranſgreſſours of theſe lawes hee eſtabliſhed moſt ſtrict and mortall puniſhments. Hee willed alſo that the Prieſts ſhould be twice more chaſte then the reſt, for he not onely forbade them that which he D prohibited others; but moreouer he inioyned them not to marry thoſe that had beene abandoned, or ſlaues, or priſoners, or victuallers and tauerners, forſaken by their husbands for any occaſion whatſoeuer. And as touching the high Prieſt, he permitted him not to match with the widdow of him that was dead (although it were made lawfull for the other Prieſts) and granted him only liberty to take a Virgin to his wife, and to keepe her. The ſaid high Prieſt is alſo forbidden to approch a dead man (although the other Prieſts are not ſcanted of that liberty to approch their brothers, fathers and mothers, and children deceaſed.) Willing that they ſhould be ſimple in all kinde of ſimplicitie.

He likewiſe ordained, that the Prieſt which ſhould not be ſound in body, ſhould be maintained by the other Prieſts, but in the meane time that he ſhould not approch the Altar, neither E enter into the Temple: willing that not onely they ſhould be neat in that which concerned the diuine ſeruice, but alſo that they ſhould ſtudie and indeauour to be the like in all the actions of their life, to the end that no man might reproue them. For which cauſe they that beare the habit of the Prieſts are vnreproueable, and in all things pure and ſober, being forbidden to drinke wine as long as they ware the prieſtly veſture. They were willed alſo to offer vp entire ſacrifices, and no wayes maimed. Theſe ſtatutes did Moſes decree, and make during his life time. And afterwards he deuiſed others alſo, at ſuch time as he remained in the deſart; which both the people might practiſe in that place; and then alſo when they had poſſeſſed the land of Canaan. He gaue reſt vnto the earth the ſeuenth yeere; ſo that it was neither tilled nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to reſt from their labours on the ſeuenth day of the weeke) and hee F ordained, that the fruits which the earth of it ſelfe brought forth, ſhould be common to all thoſe that would make vſe thereof, as well to thoſe of the countrey, as ſtrangers, without any forbidding or reſeruation. He likewiſe decreed that this ſhould be done after the ſeuenth week of yeers, which containeth the ſpace of fiftie yeeres, which the Hebrews call Iubile, in which the debtors are acquited by their creditors, and the bond-men made free, who being of the people (and for that they had forfeited againſt ſome one law) had beene puniſhed, being handled after the manner of ſlaues, and not put to death; and to thoſe, who from the beginning had been poſſeſſours of lands, lands, they were restored vnto them in this manner following. The Iubile being at hand (which word signifieth liberty) both he that sold, and he that bought the land, meet together, and cast vp the account of the profits and expences that haue beene reaped and bestowed on the land; and if it be found that the profits doe amount, he that sold the land repossesseth it: but if the charges exceed the value of the profits, he restoreth the surplusage to the buyer that is due vnto him, and retaineth the land to himselfe. And if the profits and expences are answerable the one vnto the other, the restitution is made to him that had the ancient inheritance. He ratified likewise the same law in houses that were bought in Villages or Cities. For if he that sold, counted downe the money he had receiued before the yeere were finished; he compelled the purchaser to restore him his house: and if hee stayed till the yeere were fully finished, the possession and free purchase remained vnto him that bought it. Moses receiued this disposition of his lawes from God, at such time as his flockes fed at the foote of the mountaine of Sinai, and he gaue them in writing to the Hebrewes.

CHAP. XI.

The lawes and customes of warre.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. all 12. Num. 1. Moses numbreth vp the people.

AFTER that these lawes had beene after this manner digested, Moses addressed himselfe to the affaires and lawes of warre (forethinking him of those battels which should follow.) He therefore commanded the Gouernours of the tribes (the tribe of Leui onely excepted) to take a precise view and musters of those men that were capable and able to beare armes (for the Leuites were sacred and exempt from those functions) and the search being made, there were found sixe hundreth and three thousand, sixe hundreth and fiftie fighting men, betwixt the yeeres of twentie, and fiftie. But in stead of Leui he chose Manasses, the sonne of Ioseph; and Ephraim for his father Ioseph: for so much had Iacob intreated at Iosephs hands, that he would giue him his sonnes, that hee might adopt them (as it hath beene aforetime declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midst of the Campe, guarded and defenced with the tribes which were incamped three by three on euery side. There were certaine waies or paths likewise laid out between them, and a market place was quartered out, and shops for all sorts of merchandize disposed by order, and workemen and artizans of all occupations, trauelling in their shops; so that to looke vpon it, it resembled a Citie that marched and encamped.

Num. 2. 3. 4.

The disposition of the army.

The Priests first were planted next vnto the Tabernacle, and after them followed all the community of the Leuites (for there was a view also made of them, accounting all the males exceeding the age of thirty dayes; and they were counted to be twenty and three thousand, eight hundreth and eightie.) And when it chanced that a cloud descended vpon the Tabernacle, then rested they, as if God thought good to rest in that place; and if it departed from the same, then remooued they likewise. He inuented also a certaine kinde of Cornet made of siluer, and framed after this manner. In length it was almost a cubit, and it was like the narrow whistle of a Fife, but a little more thicker, yet neuertheless, it was wide enough for the space of the mouth, to the end to receiue the breath, and the end thereof was made like a little Bell, in forme of a Trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew tongue Asofra. There were two of them, whereof the one of them serued to assemble and call the people to publike assemblies; and the other to conuocate the Gouernours when they were to consult vpon affaires of estate: and if both of them were sounded, then all of them in generall gathered together. When the Tabernacle was remoued, this manner was obserued; As soone as the first charge was sounded, they that were incamped toward the East, first of all dislodged: at the second charge, they to the Southward disincamped; then was the Tabernacle vnpitched, and carried in the midst, sixe of the tribes marching before, and sixe of them after: the Leuites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they sounded the third time, the quarter toward the West-ward remooued: and the fourth was that to the Northward. They made vse also of all these Cornets in the diuine seruice, with which they ordered the sacrifices on the Sabbath and other dayes. Then also was the first Passeouer celebrated with solemne offerings after their departure out of Ægypt, they being in the desart.

Sedition againſt MOSES, through the ſcarcitie of Victuals: and the puniſhment of the Rebellious.

The yeere of the world, 2455. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1509.

NOT long after this, they remooued their Campe from the mountaine of Sinai: and after certaine encampings (of which we will ſpeake) they came to a place which is called Iſeremoth; where the people once more began to ruminate and reuiue their Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage vpon Moſes; obiecting, that by his perſwaſion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not onely that they were deſtitute of the plentie thereof, but alſo in ſtead of hoped felicitie, forced to wander here and there in extreme miſerie, and trauelled with want of Water: and that if Manna likewiſe ſhould in any ſort faile them, they were like all of them, without queſtion, to periſh for want of ſuſtenance. Hereunto annexed they diuers contumelies, which were euery where inflicted againſt him, being a man of ſo great deſert and conſequence. Meane while there aroſe one amongſt the people, who (admoniſhing them of the forepaſſed benefits receiued by the hands of Moſes) counſelled them to be of good courage; aſſuring them, that at that time they ſhould not be fruſtrate eyther of that hope, or helpe, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incenſed againſt him by theſe words, and more and more whetted their ſpleenes againſt the Prophet: Who ſeeing them ſo deſperate, willed them to be of a good courage; promiſing them, that although by injurious ſpeeches he had vndeſeruedly beene offenced by them, yet that hee would giue them ſtore of fleſh, not for one day onely, but alſo for many. But they being incredulous, (and ſome one amongſt them demanding, how he could make prouiſion for ſo many thouſand men) God (ſayth he) and I, although we be euill ſpoken of by you, yet will we neuer deſiſt to be carefull for you, and that ſhall you ſhortly perceiue. Scarce had hee ſpoken this, but that all the Campe was filled with Quailes, which they hunted for by heapes. Yet God, not long after that, puniſhed the inſolencie and ſlander of the Hebrewes, by the death of no ſmall number: for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cauſe was impoſed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba; as if you ſhould ſay, The Monuments of Concupiſcence.

Of the Spyes that were ſent to ſearch the Land of Canaan: and how returning to the Iſraelites, they amated them with feare.

BVT after that Moſes had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a countrey not ſo apt for habitation, (not farre from the borders of the Canaanites, which is called the Iawes) he called the people to a Councell, and ſtanding vp in the midſt of them, he ſpake after this manner: God (ſaith he) hauing decreed to graunt you two great benefits, namely, the libertie & poſſeſſion of a happie Country, hath granted you alreadie the poſſeſſion of the one, and will ſhortly make you partakers of the other. For we are vpon the borders of Canaan; from whence, both the Cities and Kings are ſo farre from driuing vs, as the whole Nation being vnited together, is not of power to expell vs. Let vs therefore addreſſe our ſelues very confidently to attempt the matter: for neyther without fight, will they reſigne the title of their Countrey vnto vs; neyther without great conflicts, may we obtaine the Palme of Victorie. Let vs therefore ſend out certaine Spyes, to ſearch into the ſecrets of the Countrey, and ſuch as may conjecture how great their power is: but aboue all things, let vs be at vnitie one with another; and let vs honour God, who aſſiſteth vs in all dangers, and fighteth for vs. After that Moſes had ſpoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counſels) choſe twelue out of the moſt nobleſt Families of the Tribes, to goe & ſearch the Country, out of euery Tribe one: Who beginning from the parts extending towards Ægypt, viſited all the Countrey of the Canaanites, vntill they came to the Citie of Amathe, and the Mountaine of Libanus. And hauing ſearched out both the Land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home againe, hauing conſumed fortie dayes in thoſe affaires. Moreouer, they brought with them ſuch Fruits as the Countrey yeelded; and by the beautie thereof, and by the quantitie of thoſe riches, (which they reported to be in that Countrey) they encouraged the hearts of the people to fight valiantly: but on the other ſide, they diſmayed them with the difficultie of the conqueſt, ſaying, that there were certaine Riuers impoſſible to be ouerpaſſed, both for their greatneſſe & depth; that there were therein alſo inacceſſible Mountaines and Cities, fortified both with walls and bulwarkes. Moreouer, they told them, that in Hebron they found a Race of Gyants. And thus these Spyes (when as they had found all things farre greater amongst the Chanaanites, then to that day they had seene, since their departure out of Ægypt) they of set purpose, by their feare, brought the rest of the multitude into a dangerous suspition and perplexitie: Who conjecturing by their discourse, that it was impossible to conquer the Land, dissoluing the assembly, returned each one to their houses, lamenting with their Wiues and children, saying, That God had onely in words promised many things, but that in effect he gaue them no assistance. Moreouer, they blamed Moses, and reuiled both him and his brother Aaron, the high Priest. And thus spent they all the night in disquiet, vrging their discontents both against the one and the other. But on the morrow they reassembled their Councell, vnder this pretence, That stoning Moses, & his brother, they might returne back againe to Ægypt, from whence they came. Which euent, when two of the Spyes greatly suspected, (namely, Iesus, the sonne of Naue, of the Tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the Tribe of Iuda) they went into the midst of them, and appeased the multitude; praying them to be of good hope, and not to challenge Almightie God of deceit, by yeelding certaine slight beliefe to some, who by spreading vaine rumors of the affaires of Canaan, had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, that they should follow them, who both would be the actors and conductors also of them in the conquest of the countrey: and that neyther the greatnesse of the Mountaines, nor the depth of the Riuers, could hinder them, that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, especially God being their Guide, and readie to fight for them in that battaile. March forward therefore, (said they) and laying aside all feare, (and being assured of the diuine succours) follow vs with a bold courage whithersoeuer we lead you. With these words laboured they to appease the insulting multitude. In the meane while, Moses and Aaron falling prostrate on their faces, besought God, not for their owne safetie, but that it would please him to restore the despairing multitude to a better minde, who were troubled with so many present and instant necessities. Whereupon suddenly a Cloud appeared on the Tabernacle, and gaue testimonie, that God was there present. Which when Moses perceiued (drawing his spirits vnto him) he pressed into the presence of the multitude, and told them, how God was incited and whetted to take punishment of the outrage which they had committed against him; yet not so seuerely, as the iniquitie of their sinnes deserued, but in that discipline which fathers are accustomed to vse, for the instruction of their children. For at such time as he stood before God in the Tabernacle, and besought him with teares for the safetie of the multitude, God had recounted vnto him, how many benefits and fauours they had receiued from him, and how vngratefull they shewed themselues towards him: and that at the present being transported with the feare of the Spyes, they had esteemed their reports more true, then his promises. Notwithstanding all which, that he would not vtterly consume them all, nor exterminate their whole Race, (whom he had honoured aboue all the Nations of the Earth) but that he would not graunt them the grace to conquer the Land of Canaan, neyther making them partakers thereof; but would bring to passe, that they should liue in the Desart, without house or Citie, for the space of fortie yeeres, for punishment of their transgression. Yet hath he promised (said he) to giue the Countrey to your successors, whom he will make Lords of their goods, and heires of those possessions which you haue enuied your selues.

The Israelites should wander in the Desart fortie yeeres.

After that Moses had discourséd these things after this manner, according to the Ordinance of God, the people were in great sorrow and calamitie, and besought Moses, that he would appease Gods wrath conceiued against them; beseeching him, that forgetting their faults that were past in the Desart, he would make them Lords of their enemies Cities. Moses answered them, that God was not incited against them according to the manner of humane weakenesse, but that hee had giuen a just sentence against them. In this place it is not to be supposed, that Moses (who was but a man onely) did appease so many multitudes of displeased men, but that God assisted him, and brought to passe, that the people were conquered with his words, (hauing with diuers disobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were falne, knowne, that obedience was both good and commendable. Furthermore, for that Moses was admirable for his vertue, and the force proceeding from his faith: of whom, not only they haue spoken, who liued in his time, but euen at this day there is not any one amongst the Hebrewes, who (as if Moses were now here present to chastise him, if hee ran astray) would not obey the Ordinances made by him, although hee might make breach of them in secret.

There are besides diuers great and euident signes of the more then humane vertue which was in him: and amongst the rest, this was not the least, That certaine strangers trauelling out of the Regions beyond Euphrates a foure moneths journey, to their great charges, and with no leſſe perill, to honour our Temple, and offer Sacrifice, yet could they not obtaine licence or permiſſion to offer, in that by our Lawes it was not lawfull for them to doe it: and ſome other, without ſacrificing, (otherſome the Sacrifice halfe finiſhed, the reſt not permitted to enter the Temple) haue returned backe againe to their homes, without finiſhing their purpoſes, chuſing rather to obey Moſes Law, then their owne wills; yet being reprooued therein by none but their owne conſciences. So much did the opinion once conceiued of this man preuaile, that hee is eſteemed more then a man, who is ſuppoſed to haue receiued Lawes from God, and to haue deliuered them to men. Of late alſo, (not long before the Warres of the Iewes, during the Empire of Claudius, and Iſmael being high Prieſt amongſt vs) when as ſo great a Famine oppreſſed our Nation, that an Aſſar was ſold for foure Drams, and there was brought to the Feaſts of Azymes the quantitie of ſeuentie Cores, (which make thirtie Sicilian and fortie Athenian Medimni, which are two Buſhels of ours almoſt) ſome of the Prieſts were not ſo bold as to eate one graine of Barley, (notwithſtanding the countrey was in that extremitie) fearing the Law, and Gods diſpleaſure extended alwayes againſt ſinnes concealed. For which cauſe, wee ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, conſidering, that the Writings left by Moſes, are in ſuch force, euen at this day, that they themſelues who hate vs, confeſſe, That he that hath inſtituted our Gouernment, is God, by the meanes and miniſterie of Moſes, and his vertue. CHAP. I.

The fight of the Hebrewes with the Canaanites: and their ouerthrow by them, without MOSES knowledge.

Num. 14. The Israelites without Gods or Moses command, determine how to assayle the enemies.

WHILEST thus the Hebrewes passed their life in great penurie and perplexitie in the Desart, groaning vnder the burthen of their grieuous afflictions; there was nothing that more distracted and distempered them than this, That God had forbidden them to hazzard or enter battaile against the Canaanites. Neyther would they now any longer giue eare vnto Moses, (who perswaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themselues, that both without his conduct and counsailes, they might easily obtaine victorie ouer their enemies: and accused him likewise, as if he sought after no other thing, but that they being dayly pressed with great wants, should be enforced continually to depend vpon his counsailes. Whereupon they embattailed themselues against the Canaanites; presuming with themselues, that God would succour them, not onely in regard of Moses, but also for that he had a generall care of their Nation, euer since the time of their forefathers, whom he had alwayes held vnder his protection; and by reason of whose vertues, he had alreadie graunted them libertie. They said likewise, that if they would take the paines at that time, and endeuour themselues, that God would alwayes fight with them: protesting, that they were able to ouer-runne the Nations, although they were but themselues; yea, although Moses would endeuour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was behoofefull, that all of them should be Lords of themselues; and that being recomforted and redeemed from the seruitude of Ægypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize ouer them, or to conforme their liues to his will; vnder this vaine beliefe, that God had onely discouered to Moses that which was behoofefull for them, by reason of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not deriued from the loynes of Abraham, and that he onely were the motiue of all, in fore-knowing the things that should happen vnto them, by particular instruction from God? That euen then they should seeme to be wise, if (condemning his pride, and fixing their trust vpon God) they would take possession of the Country which he had promised them, in spight of Moses contradiction; who for this cause hindred them, setting the name of God before them: That therfore putting before their eyes their necessitie, and the Desart, which dayly more and more aggrauated their miserie, they should endeuor themselues couragiously to sally out against the enemie, the Canaanites; alledging, that God would be their Guide, so as they had no reason to expect the assistance of their Law-maker. At last, when this sentence was approued by a generall allowance, they flocke out in multitudes against their enemies: who neyther affrighted by their fierce assault, neyther terrified with their infinite multitude, valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrewes being slaine) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turne their backs) euen vnto their Campe. This ouerthrow (hapning beside all mens opinion) wondrously dejected the minds of the multitude, that they grew desperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had sent and inflicted that plague vpon them, because without his counsaile and fauour they had enterprized the battaile. But when Moses perceiued, that both his owne countrymen were dismayed with the ouerthrow which they had, & the enemie was waxen proud with their late victorie, fearing likewise lest (not content with their present successe) they should attempt further, he determined to retyre his forces backe againe into the Desart. And whereas the people promised thereafter to be obedient to him, (being taught by their owne miserie, that nothing would fall out prosperously vnto them, without the counsaile and conduct of their Guide) they dis-incamping themselues, retyred into the Desart vnder this resolution, That they would no more attempt the battaile against the Canaanites, before they receiued a signe of their good successe from Heauen. But euen as in a great Armie it accustomably falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax headstrong & disobedient to their Gouernors, so did the like also happen amongst the Iews. For whereas they were in number six hundreth thousand, & euen in their better fortunes seemed disobedient to their Gouernors, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants & misfortunes, both amongst themselues, and against their Gouernor. For which cause, there arose so great a Sedition, as neither amongst the Greeks or Barbarians the like was neuer heard of. Which things without doubt had ouerthrowne them (being brought into so desperat an estate) except Moses (forgetting the injurie he had receiued, Neyther did God vtterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious againſt their Law-maker, and tranſgreſſed alſo againſt the Lawes which he had deliuered them by Moſes, yet deliuered he them out of that dangerous Sedition; of which (without his eſpeciall prouidence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable iſſue. This Sedition, as alſo how Moſes gouerned the eſtate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, hauing firſt expreſſed the cauſe thereof. The yeere of the world, 2455. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1509.

CHAP. II.

B The Sedition rayſed by CHORE againſt MOSES and his brother, for the Prieſthood.

CHORE (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongſt the Hebrewes, and endowed with a certaine kind of popular eloquence) ſeeing Moſes placed in the higheſt eſtate of dignitie, was ſore troubled and oppreſſed with enuie. For, although he were of the ſame Tribe and kindred, yet thought he it to be a great indignitie in himſelfe, to be held his inferior, being both more enabled in riches, and nothing inferior in parentage. For which cauſe, he began to mutine and murmure amongſt the Leuites, (which were of the ſame Tribe with him, and his kinſmen) telling them (in vehement diſcourſe) that it was not to be ſuffered nor permitted, C that Moſes, vnder a pretext of certaine Diuinitie, ſhould by ambitious policie (to other mens prejudice) only ſtudie his owne glory: ſhewing them, how of late, without all Law and right, he had giuen the Prieſthood to his brother Aaron, and diſtributed other dignities at his owne pleaſure like a King, without the allowance & approbation of the people: That this injurie done by him, was not to be endured, by reaſon, that ſo couertly he had inſinuated himſelfe into the Gouernment, that before he might be eſpyed, the people ſhould be brought vnder ſeruitude. For he that knoweth himſelfe to be worthy of a Gouernment, ſtriueth to obtaine the ſame by kind perſwaſions, and conſent of the people, and not by force and violence: but they that deſpaire by good meanes to attaine thereunto, doe notwithſtanding abſtaine from force, leſt they ſhould loſe the opinion of their goodneſſe & honeſtie; yet endeuour they by malicious ſubtilties to attaine there- D unto. That it concerned the Common-weale to extinguiſh and root out the ſubtill inſinuations of ſuch men, leſt of priuate, they ſhould at laſt grow publique enemies. For what reaſon (ſaid he) can Moſes yeeld, why he hath beſtowed the Prieſthood on Aaron and his ſonnes? For, if that God had decreed, that this honour ſhould be beſtowed on one of the Tribe of Leui, there were more reaſon that I ſhould haue it, who am of the ſame kindred with Moſes, and who ſurpaſſe him both in riches and age. And if this honour appertained to the moſt ancient of the Tribes, that thoſe of Rubens loynes ought by right to enjoy it, namely, Dathan, and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the moſt ancient of that Tribe, and the moſt powerfull in riches. Theſe things ſpake Chore, vnder colour & pretence of the weale of the Common-weale, but in effect only to raiſe a tumult amongſt the multitude, and intrude into the Office of the high Prieſt. This diſcourſe of his paſſing by E little and little from one eare to another amongſt the multitude, and multiplyed by the enuious, and ſuch as maligned Aaron, at laſt brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: ſo that two hundred and fiftie of the chiefeſt Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conſpiracie; and all of theſe enforced themſelues to take away the Prieſthood from Moſes brother, and to transferre it to him. The people likewiſe were in ſuch ſort incenſed, as that they ſought to ſtone Moſes; and ran all of them by confuſed heapes with noyſe and vprore, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, That the Tyrant was to be cut off, and the people deliuered from thraldome, who vnder pretext of Religion, had inſupportable thraldome impoſed on them. For if it were God that had choſen him to be high Prieſt, he would haue preferred ſuch a one to the Dignitie who had beene worthie, and would not haue departed it to thoſe who were farre inferiour to others: F That if he had decreed to beſtow it on Aaron, he had remitted the commiſſion of his election to the people, and not left the diſpoſition thereof to his brother. Moſes, who long before that time had perceiued Chores trecherous ſlander, and ſaw the people very ſore incenſed, was notwithſtanding nothing at all abaſhed thereat: but being reſolued in his conſcience, that he had gouerned the eſtate vprightly, and well aſſured, that his brother obtayned the Prieſthood, not by his fauour, but Gods election, he came into the Congregation; where he vttered no one word againſt the people, but addreſſing himſelfe to Chore, he expoſtulated with him, and accuſed him, in as much much as was for him possible; being(besides his other qualities) fashioned and composed by nature eloquently to speake in publique assemblies. I thinke (sayth he) Chore, that both thou and euery one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundred and fiftie men of his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemne not the rest of this assembly, although they are not to be compared with you in riches,and other indowments. For neyther doth Aaron therefore possesse the Priesthood,because he is richer,(for thou hast more ample possessions then eyther of vs)neyther becauſe he is more noble,(for God hath equally imparted the same vnto vs all,hauing giuen vs one and the same Grandfather) neyther haue I been mooued thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due vnto others. For had I not respected God, and right, in disposing of this Dignitie,I had not forgotten my selfe,to further & preferre another; since there is no man more neere my selfe, then my selfe, or whom I had rather wish well to, then to my selfe. For what wisedome had it beene for me, to expose my selfe to those dangers which they incurre, who make breach of Lawes,to suffer another man reape the fruits of my impietie? But God forbid,that my conscience should be stayned with any such sinne: neyther, were the fault mine also, would God leaue it vnpunished, neyther in me,who should contemne him, neyther in you,for that you were ignorant of that you ought to doe, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He himselfe it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this meanes hath acquitted me of that accusation, that in this respect might be objected against me. For,although Aaron hath obtained this degree, (not by my fauour, but by Gods owne appointment) yet notwithstanding he referreth and remitteth the matter to the publique disposition and order of you all; neyther requireth he any prerogatiue, (for that he hath alreadie exercised the charge, or for that at this present it is granted him to intermeddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the greatest good fortune that may befall him,to see your mutinies and seditions cease, although with the losse of that honor,which he hath receiued from your owne election. For neyther haue we injured Gods will in this, that we also wish your assent and allowance; but that which of his owne accord he hath giuen, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe conscience: as reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable,that they which receiue it,should alwayes enjoy it,since God himselfe had giuen them both the assurance and confirmation. God therefore shall once againe determine, who amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice vnto him, and to take charge of those things which appertaine to pietie. For it is a most absurd matter,that Chore should haue power to desire a Dignitie, and that God should be depriued of that authoritie,to dispose the same as best liked him.

Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selues, and to be troubled vpon these occasions; and let euery one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his Censer, with perfumes,and fire from his house. But thou,O Chore,giue place vnto God, and expect his election,neyther arrogate to thy selfe a greater authoritie then God hath,but come thou also amongst the rest thy competitors in this honour,to heare his judgement. Neyther see I cause,why Aaron should not be there also present,to be judged with thee, in that hitherto he hath vertuously and vprightly behaued himselfe in the execution of that Office,and is likewise of the same Tribe and Race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer incense in the presence of all the people;and when the perfume shall be past, let him whose Sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high Priest: so shall I be acquit of that slander which is wrongfully vrged against me,whereby I am charged to haue (vpon my particular grace and fauour)bestowed the Office of the Priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gaue ouer murmuring, and forbare to suspect Moses; allowing in themselues all that which had beene spoken, as being profitable for the Common-weale. So that hereupon they dismissed the assembly.

CHAP. III.

How the authors of the Sedition were slaine by Gods judgement,and the Priesthood confirmed to AARON and his sonnes.

Ruffin. cap. 1. Num. 16.

THE next day the people re-assembled themselues together, to assist the Sacrifice, and to heare the strife decided amongst the Competitors; neyther was this assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in suspence,in expectation of the euent; and some of them were desirous,that Moses might be conuicted of deceit.But such as were of the wiser sort amongst them,desired an end of the Sedition; for they feared lest the Common-weale should be vtterly ruinated, if the tumult should proceed any further. The multitude likewise (being naturally

A rally desirous of noueltie, and prone to speake euill of their Magistrates) were diuersly disposed vpon euery occurrent. Moses also sent his seruants to Abiram and Dathan, to summon them to appeare (according to the couenants and accord) to attend the issue of the sacrifice. But their answer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moses by his subtill and siniſter deuices, should signiorize ouer the people. Which when Moses vnderstood, he tooke diuers of the Elders amongst the people with him: and being no waies mooued with Dathan and his contumacie, he came vnto him (being willingly attended by those who were drawne to accompanie him.) Now when Dathan and his friends vnderstood that Moses with the Nobles came vnto them, both they, their wiues and children assembled themselues before the Tabernacle, expecting that which would ensue. They came likewise guarded
B with their seruants, who were armed to oppose themselues against Moses, if so be he should offer them any violence: But no sooner drew he neere vnto them, but that lifting vp his hands vnto heauen, he cried out with a loud voice in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this maner: O God (said he) thou Lord ouer all that which either heauen, earth, or sea containeth, thou art a sufficient witnesse with me of all mine actions: for that I haue managed all things by thy will; and thou art he who hast giuen me power to execute my purposes: thou that alwaies in commiseration of the Hebrewes hast beene my perpetuall helpe and assistance, heare this my prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee: for which cause I hope thou wilt not disdaine to testifie and iustifie my truth, and manifest the ingratitude of these men. Thou doest exactly know the antiquitie of my race, not for that thou hast heard it, but for that
C thou hast seene and assisted it; in effect, now also testifie the truth for me in those things which these men (although they know the contrarie) are not ashamed to impute vnto me. At such time as I led a peaceable life, and that by my vertue and thy counsell, and my father in law Raguels fauour, I had sufficient to liue vpon; I forsooke the possession of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, to ingage my selfe in these miseries, which I haue suffered for these men: and first of all for their libertie, and now likewise for their safetie, I haue most readily vndertaken grieuous trauels. Now therefore since I am growne into suspition among those men, who by my care and prouidence haue escaped so many mischiefes and miseries; thou that appearedst vnto me in that fire on the mountaine of Sinai, and vouchsafedst both to speake vnto me, and to confirme me by the sight of miracles; that in thy name sentst me a messenger into Ægypt; that hast abated the great fortunes of the Ægyptians, and hast giuen me meanes to escape from their seruitude; and hast made Pharaoes power and armie inferiour to my fortunes; that when we were ignorant of our way, gauest vs a passage thorow the sea, in whose bottome and wombe afterward the Ægyptians were drowned; that gauest vs armes, when we were vnweaponed; that madest the bitter water sauoury and fit to be drunke of; and in our scarcitie of water enforcedst drinke for vs out of the bowels of the hard rocke, when we found no meat on the land, didst send it vs from the sea; Moreouer (as a thing neuer before heard of) affoordedst vs meat from heauen, and hast establisshed our estate with lawes and customes: Be thou, O Lord, my Iudge in all things, and my vnpartiall witnesse, that neither I haue beene corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, to fauour iniustice, neither that I haue suffered a poore man in his iust cause to lose his right
E against a rich aduersarie. And now hauing administred the Common weale with all sinceritie, I am called in question for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltlesse, as if I had bestowed thy Priesthood on my brother for priuate affection, and not for thy command sake: make it knowne that all things are dispensed by thy prouidence, and that nothing is brought to effect by casualtie, but by thy especiall ordinance: And to expresse that thou hast care of the Hebrewes, testifie the same by thy iust punishment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuse thee to be insensible, and boast that thou art circumuented by my subtilties. But thou shalt make thy reuenge more notorious against the vnbridled detractours of thy glorie, if they perish after no common manner, lest any man should suspect that they suffer nothing inhumane: but let the earth, which they vnworthily tread vpon, open it selfe and swallow them vp both with their families and fa-
F culties. By this meanes both thy power will manifestly appeare vnto all men, and thou shalt leaue an example to posteritie, that no man hereafter shall dare to thinke otherwise of thy maiesty then becommeth him, and my ministery shall be approued to proceed from thy direction. But if those crimes be truely vrged which are inforced against me, then let the curses returne and light on mine owne head, and let those whom I haue cursed, liue in safetie. And thus exacting a punishment from those that disturbe thy people, keepe the rest of the multitude in peace, concord, and obseruation of thy commandements, secure and voide of that punishment which is due vnto wicked wicked men, for that it is contrarie to thy iustice, that the innocent multitude of the Israelites should answer their misdeeds, and suffer their punishments. Whileſt he spake these words, and intermixed them with teares, the earth instantly trembled, and shaking began to remoue (after such a manner, as when by the violence of the wind a great billow of the sea floateth and waltreth.) Hereat were al the people amazed. But after that, a horrible and shattering noise was made about their tents, the earth opened, and swallowed vp both them and all that which they esteemed deare, which was after a maner so exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld. Wherupon in a moment the earth closed againe, and the vast gaping was fast shut, so as there appeared not any signe of that which had hapned. Thus perished they all, leauing behind them an example of Gods power and iudgements. And this accident was the more miserable, in that there were no one, no not of their kinsfolk or allies that had compassion of them: so that all the people whatsoeuer, forgetting those things which were past, did allow Gods iustice with ioyfull acclamations, esteeming them vnworthie to be bemoned, but to be held as the plague and peruerters of the people. After that Dathan with his family was extinguished, Moses assembled all those that contended for the Priesthood together, committing againe the election of the priesthood vnto God, concluding that the estate should bee ratified to him, whose sacrifice was most acceptable in Gods sight. For which cause the two hundred and fiftie men assembled themselues, who were both honoured for the vertue of their ancestors, and for their owne abilities farre greater then theirs: with these also stood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their censers before the Tabernacle, with perfumes such as they brought with them; when sodainly so great a fire shone, as neither the like was euer kindled by mans hand, nor vsually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was euer quickned in the woods, split and borne downe in the summer time by a southerne brize, but such a one as seemed to be kindled in heauē most brightsome and flaming: by force and power whereof those two hundreth and fiftie (together with Chore) were so consumed, that there scarce appeared any reliques of their carcasses; Only Aaron remained vntouched, to the end it might appeare that this fire came from heauen. These things thus brought to passe, Moses (intending to leaue a perpetuall memory to posteritie of that punishment) to the end they should not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the sonne of Aaron to consecrate their censers affixed to the brazen Altar, that by reason of this monument, all men might be terrified, who thinke that the diuine power can be circumuented by humane policy.

CHAP. IV.

What things hapned in 38. yeeres space to the Hebrewes in the desart.

AFTER that by so euident an argument it appeared very sufficiently, that Aaron neither by sinister insinuations, neither by the fauour of his brother, but onely by Gods election had obtained the Priesthood; he euer afterwards held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the sedition was not sufficiently ceased, but that it brake out with a more vrgent furie then at first: for it tooke his originall from such causes, that it might easily appeare that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perswasion had once taken roote in the hearts of men, that nothing is brought to passe without Gods will, they imagined that God wrought these things in fauor of Moses; to him therfore imputed they al these things, as if God had not punished those men through the hate he bare against their sins, but only on Moses solicitation: & they were sore aggrieued that Moses (hauing giuen this mayme vnto the people, by the losse of so many noble men, that onely perished through the zeale they bare to Gods seruice) not onely had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had assured the Priesthood to his brother after such a manner, that thereafter no man durst oppose himselfe to purchase the same; seeing how vnfortunately those others were ouerthrowne by a violent death. Moreouer the kinsmen of those that were slaine, sollicited and stirred the people, praying them to restraine the pride and ouergreat power of Moses, in that it lay in their power easily to performe the same. But Moses perceiuing that the people was incensed, and fearing lest once more they should bethinke them on some innouation, wherby some great misfortune might succeed, he assembled them together, and gaue audience to their accusations: & without replying any waies (for feare he might the more incense them) hee onely commanded the heads of the tribes, that each of them should bring a rod, wherein the name of each tribe should bee written, promising that the Priesthood should remaine with them, in whose rod God should shew any signe. Which iudgement of his being allowed

A lowed by all men,both they,and Aaron brought their rods with their inſcriptions;and Aaron had written in his,the tribe of Leui. Theſe Moſes tooke from them,and laide them in Gods Tabernacle:the next day he brought them forth euery one of them (which were eaſily knowne to bee thoſe which the Princes brought,& the reſt of the people had marked) & they ſaw that al theirs remained in the ſame forme which the day before they retained, when Moſes tooke them; but out of Aarons rod there grew branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kinde of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amated at the noueltie of this ſpectacle (diſmiſſing their hatreds wherewith they both proſecuted Moſes & Aaron)became wholly amazed and drawne into admiratiõ of Gods iudgement,and forbare any more to repugne againſt God, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt Aarons B Prieſthood. And thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God,by all mens conſent he became hie Prieſt;and the people of the Hebrewes turmoyled with long ſeditions,at laſt by this meanes grew ſetled in peace and quietnes. But after that Moſes had made the tribe of Leui(which was dedicate to Gods ſeruice) free and exempt from warfare (for feare leſt being occupied in prouiding themſelues neceſſaries for their maintenance,they ſhould grow negligent in executing their duties in ſacrifice) he ordained that after the land of Chanaan was conquered by their forces and Gods fauour, that of the Cities they ſhould conquer, they ſhould diſtribute fortie eight of the beſt & faireſt on the Leuites,& certen lands abutting on their Cities,to the quantity and ſpace of two thouſand cubits. Moreouer, hee commanded that the tenths of all the yeerely fruit that was gathered by the whole people, ſhould bee giuen and beſtowed on the Leuites and C Prieſts; and euer after this tribe had their ſolemne reuenues. Now muſt I declare what things are proper to the Prieſts. Of the fortie eight Cities which were granted to the Leuites, he commanded them to grant thirteene to the Prieſts; and that of thoſe tenthes which they receiued of the people, they ſhould pay vnto them a tenth ſhare. Beſides, he gaue charge that the people ſhould offer vp vnto God all the firſt fruits of whatſoeuer the earth yeeldeth them:and that the firſt borne of foure footed beaſts dedicated for ſacrifice, if it were a male, ſhould bee deliuered to the Prieſts to ſacrifice,to the end they might be nouriſhed with all their family in the ſacred Citie of Ieruſalem;and that they which are not fit to bee ſacrificed to God, ſhould bee eaten by them according to the vſe and cuſtome of the countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firſtling a ſicle and a halfe,and for the firſt borne of a man,fiue ſicles. Hee allotted them likewiſe the firſt D fruits of ſheep-ſhearing,and ordered that the bakers ſhould offer them ſome cakes. But they that conſecrate themſelues by vow,and are called Nazarites (nouriſhing their haire, and taſting no wine)when as they conſecrate their haire,were bound to offer it vnto the Prieſts. They likewiſe who call themſelues Corban,which is called the gift of God,if they deſire to be diſmiſſed from that miniſterie(whereunto by voluntarie vow they bound themſelues) muſt pay money to the Prieſts, for a woman thirtie ſicles, for a man fiftie; and that thoſe that had not ſo much money, ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the Prieſts. And if any man ſhould kill (for his priuate feaſt) any beaſt,and not for Gods ſeruice, yet that he ought to offer vnto the Prieſt the breſt and legge of the beaſt. This is that allowance which Moſes ratified to the Prieſts, and beſides this, whatſoeuer the people offered for ſinnes (as we declared in the next precedent volume.) And what- E ſoeuer was contributed by the people to the order of the Prieſts, hee commaunded that both their wiues, children and ſeruants ſhould bee made partakers of the ſame (onely except thoſe things which were offered for ſinne offerings, for theſe things the Prieſts onely themſelues eate vp in the Tẽple the ſame day.)After that this policy was in this ſort ratified by Moſes,& that the mutinie was appeaſed,he remooued his campe, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumæa,where he ſent Embaſſadors to the King therof, requiring him to grant him and his free F paſſage(and offering him ſuch and ſo ſufficient pledges, as hee ſhould eſteeme and recken of, to aſſure him that no violence or iniurie ſhould bee offered; aſſuring him to make payment for whatſoeuer victuall or drinke,eyther he or his army ſhould receiue.)But he ſetting light by their Embaſſage,denied them paſſage, and with a well furniſhed army marched foorth againſt Moſes to withſtand him, if contrary to his will hee ſhould attempt to paſſe thorow his countrey. And for that God had not counſelled Moſes to begin the combate,if hee were inforced by the enemie, hee retired backe againe, determining to ſeeke his paſſage athwart the deſart. At that time died his ſiſter Mary,the fortieth yeere after their departure out of Ægypt, & the firſt Moone of the moneth Xantique: ſhee was magnifically entombed at the common charge, on a certaine mountaine called Sein: and after the people had mourned for her fortie daies, hee purified them after this manner: The Prieſt taking a yong heifer(which had neuer as yet borne yoake

A man that is cleansed, putteth it in a cleane place; and they that are vncleane, by meanes of one that is dead, put a little of these ashes into a Fountaine, with Hysope, and after they haue mixed the ashes in the Fountaine, they besprinkle themselues three times, and on the seuenth day, and after that, they are purified. He likewise ordained, that the like purification should be vsed, when a man should take possession of his inheritance.

Num.20.

But after the Armie (that had so long mourned the dead sister of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Desart, into Arabia: and arriuing in a place (which the Arabians H account for their Metropolitane Citie, in times past called Arce, and at this present, Petra) which is enuironed with a high mountaine, Aaron ascended the said mountaine; and Moses shewed him the place where he should yeeld vp his soule vnto God: and in the sight of all the Armie, standing on a high place, he put off his Stoale, and gaue it to his sonne Eleazar, to whom by eldership the succession appertained. And thus (in the sight of the people) he died in that very yeere wherein he lost his sister, and in the hundreth twentie and third yeere of his age. He departed on the new Moone, in the moneth of August, (called by the Athenians, Hecatombeon; by the Macedonians, Ioue; and Sabba, by the Hebrewes. The people mourned for him for the space of fortie dayes, and then desisted. Moses displaced his Campe from thence, and pitched his Tents neere vnto a Riuer called Arnon (which springeth from the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth along I the Desart, and then entreth into the Asphaltique Lake, separating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The countrey is fertile, and sufficient to yeeld fruit to all the inhabitants in great foison. To Sehon, King of this countrey, Moses sent Embassadors, requiring passage thorow his Kingdome, vnder such assurance as should best please him, that no wrong should be offered, neyther to his countrey, nor the inhabitants thereof; assuring him to pay the price of whatsoeuer his souldiers tooke, eyther in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refused him, and arming his people, pitched his Tents on the bankes of Arnon, being readie to repulse the Hebrewes, if they presumed to passe the Riuer.

CHAP. V. K

MOSES ouercommeth SEHON and OG, Kings of the Amorites, and distributeth their countrey by Lot, vnto two Tribes and a halfe of the Hebrewes.

Num.21. The Hebrews addresse themselues to fight against the Amorites.

BVT when Moses perceiued, that the Amorites were disposed to hostilitie; for which cause, supposing that the injurie and contempt was not to be endured, and seeing the Hebrewes were an intractable kind of men, (and such, as eyther by idlenesse, or want, might be easily perswaded to renue their former seditions & tumults, and being willing to preuent all these occasions) he asked counsell at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his passage by the sword. Now when God had allowed his purpose, and besides that, promised him the victory, L he was greatly confirmed in hope, and animated and encouraged his souldiers; telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprise their long desired Warre with Gods fauour, and his approbation and encouragement: who rejoycing at this libertie that was granted them, suddenly tooke Armes, and in a set battaile hasted to charge the enemie. On the other side, the Amorite (as soone as he saw them march forward, and begin the onset) forgetting his former fierceneſſe, was both himselfe terrified, and his souldiers likewise (who before the sight of their enemies, were as cruell and bloudie as Lyons) now waxed as fearefull and as meeke as Lambes. So that they scarcely had endured the first assault, but that they fled; reposing the whole hope of their prosperitie, in their retreat. They trusted likewise to their walled Townes (which notwithstanding did nought at all auaile them.) For no sooner did the Hebrewes perceiue, that their ene- M mies began to trust their feet, & that their ranks were broken, but they more freshly pursued them, and brought them into extreme feare. So that being vtterly put to flight, and dispersed vpon the field, they were enforced to flye vnto their Cities. Yet ceased not the Hebrewes to pursue them more fiercely, but began more and more to molest them with those kind of Weapons wherein they were exercised beforetime. For being expert & well trained in the Sling and Bow, and perfect in casting the Dart, and nimble in body, (by reason of their light Armors) they ran after their enemies, enemies, and with their ſhafts and bowes ſhot at thoſe wich were afarre off, and might not bee ouertaken. So that there followed a moſt huge ſlaughter, and they that eſcaped, were grieuouſly wounded: yet were they more afflicted with thirſt then any other hoſtilitie (in that it was ſummer time) ſo that all thoſe that went to refreſh and coole their thirſt at the riuer (beſides all thoſe that had turned their backs to flie) were purſued with all kindes of miſſile weapons and darts vntill they were all ſlaine. The king Sehon himſelfe alſo was ſlaine in this fight. And the Hebrewes ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlaine, & carried away great ſtore of pillage. They had likewiſe great foyſon and abundance of all kindes of fruites (in that the harueſt was not as yet gathered.) Thus paſſed the Armie through the whole countrey, forraging and ſpoyling the ſame without any reſiſtance; by reaſon that the enemie was diſcomfited, & that all his forces in warre were defeated. This was the deſtruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither vſed their counſell prudently, nor managed their warre valiantly. But the Hebrewes occupied their countrey (ſituate betweene three riuers, after the manner of an Iland.) For the banks of Arnon doe terminate the Southerne coaſts therof, and Iobacchus the Northerne, which flowing into Iordan, leeſeth his name: now the Weſterne coaſt is watered by the riuer of Iordan. Amidſt this proſperous eſtate of the Iſraelites, there aroſe a new enemy againſt them, called Og, king of Galadine, & of the coũtries of Gaulanitis, who came as a friend and companion to aſſiſt Sehon; who ſeeing his fortunes and eſtate ſo deſolate and deſperate, yet in hope to obtaine the victorie, determined to make triall both of his owne mens vertue, and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for hee both died in the battaile, and his whole hoſt was likewiſe diſcomfited. But Moſes no ſooner ouerpaſſed the flood of Iobacchus, but that entring Ogs kingdome, hee ouerthrew one citie after another, and deſtroyed all the inhabitants thereof (who for riches and fruitfull paſtures exceeded all other men of that countrey.) Og alſo was a man of a moſt heroicke and high ſtature, and nothing inferiour thereunto either in ſtrength or vertue; the argument of whoſe ſtrength and ſtature was extant in the ſacke of the chiefe citie & palace of the country of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron bed found of foure cubits breadth, and nine in length. The fal of this man did not only further the preſẽt felicity of the Hebrews, but alſo became the cauſe of many their future and more fortunate ſucceſſes: for they took ſixtie well fortified cities which were vnder his gouernment; and what with their priuie preyes and publike pillage, they were all enriched. After this, Moſes remooued his campe toward Iordan, and pitched it in a broade plaine neere vnto the Citie of Iericho (which is rich and fruitfull, and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the minds of the Iſraelites in ſuch ſort confirmed, as they deſired nothing more then warre, and battell; and Moſes thinking good to make vſe of this their forwardneſſe, (hauing ſacrificed to God in way of thankſgiuing, and feaſted the people) he ſent part of them armed to deſtroy the countrey of the Madianites, and to ſpoile the cities of that region: the cauſe of which warre had this originall.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Prophet BALAAM.

WHEN Balac King of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites) ſaw the Iſraelites increaſe to ſuch greatnes, he began to ſuſpect the ſecuritie of his owne fortune and eſtate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrewes to couet to poſſeſſe any other Counttey but the land of Canaan, and therefore more raſhly then prudently he bethought him of new matters; and for that he durſt not aſſaile them in battell, whom he knew to be puffed vp with the ſucceſſe of many victories (yet deſirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he ſendeth Embaſſadors to the Madianites to conſult with them, as concerning their common profit. They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous Diuine called Balaam (who was their eſpeciall friend) ſent ſome of their moſt honourable princes together with Balacks Embaſſadors, beſeeching him that he would come vnto them and curſe the Iſraelites. The Prophet intertaining the Embaſſadors with great humanitie, and feaſting them at his owne table, asked counſaile of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands: but ſeeing that God forbad him to obey them, hee returned vnto them, and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withſtood him; to whoſe mercie he aſcribed the glory which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies: for that armie which they deſired ſhould be curſed, was dearly beloued of God. For which cauſe he gaue them counſell, that ſeeking out the Iſraelites, they ſhould make peace with them them vnder whatsoeuer conditions: which said, he dismissed the Embassadors. But the Madianites (being instantly requested by Balac) once more sent their Embassadors vnto Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to satisfie them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadors: & he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadors. But as he trauelled vpon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certaine narrow way, betweene two mounds or wals made of stones; which when the Asse perceiued whereon Balaam was mounted, hee started out of the way, and thrust Balaã, and crushed him against one of the wals; and neither by the strokes which his rider gaue him (beeing sore grieued by his bruise) nor by any other meanes might he be drawn forward. And when as neither the Angell forsooke the way, neither the Prophet gaue ouer tormenting the Asse, at length the beast falling downe by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice; blaming him, for that hauing neuer before that time receiued domage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten him; considering that he vnderstood not that God did prohibit him from the performance of that which hee desired. Whilest thus hee was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Asse, an Angell appeared vnto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Asse was not in the fault, but that hee hindered his iourney, by reason hee attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the Prophet terrified, addressed himselfe to returne backe againe: but God commanded him to prosecute that iourney which he had intended, charging him to declare and doe that which hee should aduise and instruct him in.

Balaam commeth to Balac

After that God had giuen him this charge, he went vnto Balaac, who entertained him honourably, and caused him to be brought to a certaine mountaine, from whence he might behold the Hebrewes campe. Balac also himselfe being royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him honourably vnto a certaine mountaine, which ouerhung the Israelites, being threescore furlongs from their campe. Which when he perceiued, he caused the king to build seuen Altars, on which he laid seuen Buls, and seuen Rams. All which being readily executed by the king; he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end hee might presage and fore-prophecie the victorie: which done, he spake after this manner: Happy are you, on whom God bestoweth so large a blessing and abundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his prouidence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. Because there is not any sort of men, before whom in innocencie of maners and studie of honestie and vertue, you are not to be preferred: your successours also shall haue a more famous posteritie, because amongst men God onely fauoureth you, and taketh care that no nation vnder the Sunne shall either exceede or equall you in happinesse. You shall likewise possesse that land whereto he hath sent you: and your posteritie shall bee perpetuall Lords thereof; and the glory of your name shall fulfill both the whole earth, and sea; and so shall your nation bee multiplied, that there shall bee no nation of the world that shall not bee intermixed with your blood and line. Blessed are you (most worthy army) and deseruing great admiration, hauing your increase thus multiplied by the meanes of one parent. For the land of Canaan at this present shall entertaine you, but in little number; but know that hereafter the whole world is destinated for your inhabitation: so that, both in the Ilands, and in the continent you shall liue in so great number, that you shall equall the starres of the firmament. And whereas you are like to growe so innumerable, yet notwithstanding he shall not suffer you to want the vtmost of plentie and abundance; neither in warre shall hee cease to animate and leade you against your enemies. Let your enemies resolue to take armes and to assault you, yet shall there no one returne from them to beare message of the victorie, or to bring glad tidings to their wiues and children. This prudence and proweesse is giuen you by Gods prouidence, who onely can and may abase the power of greatnesse, and repaire the weakenesse of obscuritie. Thus spake the Wizard in his propheticall spirit, being transported beyond himselfe, and rauished with a supernaturall furie. But Balac was sore incensed against him, exclaiming that hee had not kept couenant, although by great rewards he had been by his Confederate drawne thither to curse them, vrging it against him, that in stead of execratiõs against them, he had published their pietie and praises. To whom the Prophet made this answer: Thinkest thou (said he) that it lieth in our power, as often as destinies are to be discouerd, to speake or conceale what we list, at such time as God speaketh in our mouthes? No, he himselfe vttereth those words which him listeth, & publisheth those oracles by vs, which neither we know, nor euer thought vpon. Verily I sufficiently remẽber wherunto I was perswaded by the solicitation of the Madianites, and for that cause came I hither, to execute that which they extorted from my hands; but God is more powerfull then my will, who contrarie to the will

A will of God,and for the particular fauour of men,had purpoſed to ſpeake otherwiſe:but as ſoone as he entreth into our hearts,there remaineth no more of our ſelues in our ſelues.Truly I had determined in my ſelf to ſpeak nothing in their praiſes,neither was it in my mind to reckō vp what God had decreed to beſtow vpon that nation,but the fauorable power which befriendeth them, and ſtudieth nothing more then the felicity & glory of that natiō,hath in his preſcience put theſe words into my mouth: now therefore (ſince it is my deſire to gratifie both thee, & the Madianits,whoſe praiers I ought not but admit)go to,let vs erect new Altars,& prepare freſh ſacrifice & make trial if perhaps God wil be moued to grant me licence to curſe theſe kind of men. Hereunto Balac gaue his conſent,yet did not God ratifie thoſe his imprecatiōs made againſt the Iſraelites,notwithſtanding he had ſacrificed twice;ſo that falling on his face,he declared the occurrēces of their kingdomes & common-weales,of moſt eſteeme (of which ſome one was not as yet built) & ſuch things likewiſe as ſhould thereafter happen to thoſe men both by land and ſea, euen to our daies: out of all which things (accompliſhed according to his predictions) we may gather moſt aſſuredly that,which of his prophecie is to be fulfilled,will ſurely take effect. Balac being ſore diſpleaſed,becauſe the Iſraelites could not be curſed,ſent Balaam backe again without honour:who returning homewards(at ſuch time as he came vnto Euphrates) called Balac & the Princes of the Madianites,and ſpake thus vnto them:Balac and you Princes of Madian,it behoueth me to gratifie you(although it be againſt the will of God) for which cauſe giue eare vnto me: All the ſorts of death that may be to the vttermoſt, cannot extinguiſh the race of the Hebrewes:neither by warre or peſtilence,or famine,or any other chance may they be ruinated: for C God hath care to preſerue that nation from all euill, ſo that no ſlaughter can fall vpon them, whereby the whole multitude ſhall be extinguiſhed: yet in the meane while ſome things may not be auoyded,whereby afflicted for a time,they may preſently flouriſh more then they did before, being by ſuch a chaſticement reduced to better health. For which cauſe if you ſeeke to obtaine ſome ſhort victorie ouer them, by this my counſell you ſhall bring your wiſhes to effect. Send me the faireſt of your daughters, as trimly decked and beautified as is poſſible, who by their beautie may conquer,and by their loue allure their hearts; let theſe wander about their campe, and offer themſelues to entertaine a familiar embrace, if by the yong men they ſhall be ſollicited thereunto: and as ſoone as they ſhall eſpie them to be ſurprized with deſire, let them ſodainly breake from them; and when as they ſhall be required by them to ſtay, let them not yeeld,except they will be perſwaded to forſake their countrey lawes,and the ſeruice of God from whom D they receiued them,and honour the gods of the Madianites, and Moabites. For by this meanes ſhal they incenſe Gods wrath againſt themſelues.Which when he had certified and admoniſhed them of,he departed.Now whē the Madianits(according as they were counſelled)ſent out their daughters,the yonger ſort of the Hebrewes were intangled with the beautie of the damſels: and growing in talke with them,they prayed them that they would not enuy them the opportunity to reape the pleaſure and inioyment of their beautie, neither that they would diſdaine their intercourſe: they willingly both admit the words, and the embraces of the yong men, and hauing well hette them with dalliance,they addreſſed themſelues to leaue them in the heat of their deſires.Whereupon they diſcomforted at the womens departure,did inſtantly intreat them,that E they ſhould not in that ſort forſake them, but that in hope of future marriage and poſſeſſion of their greateſt goods,they ſhould remaine and dwell with them. Theſe promiſes they confirmed with oathes,and ſealed with teares,calling God to witnes (the rather to perſwade and confirme them vnto mercie)whereupon they (after they perceiued that they were ſurprized,and beſotted with their companie) anſwered after this manner: Valiant yong men; we want not at home neither ample faculties,or the affections of our parents, and domeſticall friends; neither come we hither vnto you for want of theſe things; neither admit we your prayers, in that we meane to make ſale of our beauties: but being perſwaded that you are honeſt men, we haue not diſdained to entertaine you with this gracious hoſpitalitie, in that we ſee ye had need thereof, and for that cauſe haue we ſhewed our ſelues courteous vnto you: now therefore becauſe you ſay you F loue vs, and that you are ſore aggrieued at this our departure, we haue thought good not to gainſay your intreaties: if therefore you will plight your faith, and promiſe vs marriage (which thing onely is that which muſt ſatisfie vs)we will willingly liue with you as your lawfull wiues; but we feare leſt when your luſts are ſatisfied, you ſhould with iniurie and contumely, ſend vs backe againe to our parents: to which ſuſpect of ours it becommeth you(if you ſo pleaſe)to giue a lawfull pardon.But they promiſed to giue their faith in what maner ſoeuer,and refuſed no cō-dition(by reaſon of their extreme loue.) Well then(ſaid the virgins)ſince that you are ſo pleaſed, and that you haue manners so different from others, that you also vse your proper meates according to your peculiar manner, neither can you endure that your drinke be common with other mens; it behoooueth you, if you will liue with vs, to adore our gods. For by no other argument may you perswade vs that your loue is vnfained, except you honour as we doe the same gods: neither shall you be blamed if you honour the gods of that countrey, into which you are come, considering that our gods are common vnto all nations, whereas your God is adored by none other but your selues. The daughters of Madian allure the Israelites to Idolatrie.

The Hebrews blinded with the loue which they bare vnto the virgins, conceiued wel of their words, & cõsented to that which they said, suffering themselues to be seduced according as they were inuited; so that they transgressed the ordinances of their fathers, in following strange gods; to whom they purposed to do sacrifice according to the maner of the country. They took pleasure also to eat strange kinds of meats which were prohibited thẽ by the law, & addicted themselues to all kinds of pleasure, according as the women perswaded them, so that the whole army was infected with a dissolute disorder (amongst the yonger sort) & a worse mutiny arose therby then the precedent, wherethrough it was to be suspected, lest the whole course of law & gouernment should be peruerted. For the youth hauing once had a touch of these forrain & lasciuious fashions, were vnsatiably transported with the same: and if there were any more excellent then others in nobility, they together (with the rest of the multitude) were retchlesly corrupted. Zambrias also of the tribe of Simeon (& one of the Princes among thẽ, marrying Cosby the Madianite, daughter vnto Vri a gouernour of that countrey) at the cõmandement of his wife, & in contẽpt of Moses lawes, for her sake did sacrifice after a forrain maner, & contrary to the law disported with his forrain wife which was a stranger. During this estate of affaires, Moses being afraid lest some more grieuous mischiefe should succeed, called the people together, accusing no man in particular (for that he was vnwilling to draw them into desperation, who whilst they thinke they lie hidden, may be reduced to a better mind) but he told them that it was a thing vnworthy & ill-beseeming themselues or their elders, that they should set more by their pleasures, then by God and their religion. That it behooued them whilest they had time, to repent themselues, and that they shewed themselues to be valiant men, not by contẽpt of lawes, but by appeasing their disordinate desires. Besides he told thẽ that it was an absurd thing, that wheras in the desart they liued modestly, they should now in a plentifull countrey grow so dissolute & disordinate, as to lose that by affluence which they had got by tẽperance. In such like speeches he indeuoured to correct the youth, & to reduce them to a better mind: whereupon Zambrias rising vp, spake after this manner: Moses (saith he) vse thou thine owne lawes (whereunto by long vse thou hast added strength and confirmation) which hadst thou not done, oft times ere this hadst thou suffered punishment, and learnt to thine owne miserie) that the Hebrewes were not to be deluded: for my selfe, thou shalt neuer tie me to thy tyrannicall decrees, for hitherto hast thou indeuoured nought else, but vnder pretext of law and religion, to bring vs into seruitude and subiection; and thy selfe by thy subtile and sinister meanes, to honour and soueraignty; taking from vs the pleasures & libertie of our liues (things that belong to free men, and such as appertaine or liue not vnder any mans gouernment.) For this should be worse then an Ægyptian thraldome, to punish euery man by thy lawes, according to thine owne pleasure; whereas thou thy selfe art more worthy to be punished, in that thou disannullest that thing which is approued by all mens consent: and desirest that thy decrees should be of more force, then all the resolutions of all other mortall men whatsoeuer. But I (as touching that which I doe) in that I suppose it to be well done, am not afraid to confesse in this assembly, namely, that I haue taken a stranger to wife: thou heerest mine actions from mine owne mouth, as from a free and resolute man, neither doe I desire that they should be hidden. I likewise sacrifice to the gods contrarie to our custome, because I suppose it to be both iust and necessarie, that from many I seeke the truth, and not (depending as it were vpon a tyranny, or liuing thereunder) to build my faith vpon one only: for no man shall please me that will haue more interest in mine actions then my selfe. Whilest Zambrias alledged this both for himselfe and other of his faction; the people silently expected the issue of this audacious boldnesse, especially for that they saw their Law-maker would not contend any longer, lest he should make an insolent man more outragious; for he feared lest diuers such in imitation of him growing impudent in their speeches, should stirre vp tumults amongst the people: so that the assembly for this time was after this maner dissolued, and perhaps this mischiefe had taken further head head,except Zambrias had beene ſuddenly cut off,by ſuch a meanes as enſueth. Phinees (both in reſpect of other things, as alſo the dignitie of his father, the chiefeſt among the youths, and the ſonne of Eleazar the high Prieſt,whoſe great Vncle Moſes was)was grieuouſly diſcontented with Zambrias contumacie;and leſt by his impunitie the Law might grow into contempt,he reſolued to be reuenged vpon the tranſgreſſors, being well aſſured how much the example of great men preuaileth on both parts: and whereas he was of ſo much ſtrength of mind and of body,as that he would not attempt any thing raſhly,which he would not bring to iſſue; he repaired to Zambrias Tent,and at one ſtroke ſlue both him and Chosbi,his Wife. By whoſe example, the reſt of the youth(being exaſperated by this his worthie act)enforced themſelues to doe juſtice on thoſe that had committed the like offence;ſo that they ſlew a great part of them by the Sword,and the reſt by the Peſtilence (which was inflicted by Gods judgement on them) were vtterly rooted out. Neyther ſpared he thoſe,who though by reaſon of conſanguinitie they ought to haue reſtrained and diſſwaded their kinſmen from lewdneſſe, yet had rather eyther diſſemble, or kindle their luſt in them, then counſaile them; neyther intermitted he from puniſhing thoſe men, till foureteene thouſand of them were done to death by ſickneſſe. For which cauſe, Moſes (being incenſed againſt the Madianites) ſent out an Armie to deſtroy that Nation (of which Expedition we will preſently diſcourſe,after that we haue annexed that which was omitted in this Hiſtorie.) For reaſon would, that we ſhould not pretermit to prayſe the deſigne of our Law-maker in this behalfe. For in regard of Balaam, (ſought out by the Madianites, vnder the intent to curſe the Hebrewes,although he could not doe it,being hindred therefro by the prouidence of God,who notwithſtanding gaue that counſaile to the enemie, by meanes whereof, within a little ſpace a great multitude of the Hebrewes were corrupted in their courſe of life, and diuers haue beene grieuouſly plagued with ſickneſſe) in regard I ſay of this Balaam,he hath greatly honoured him, in chronicling his predictions in his Writings. And although it had beene eaſie for him to haue depriued him of the glorie,and to haue appropriated it to himſelfe,by reaſon that there was not any witneſſe that might contradict him; yet neglected he not to giue teſtimonie of him, and to make mention of him in his Writings: Yet let euery one thinke of this, according as it ſhall ſeeme good vnto him. But Moſes (as I began to ſay) ſent an Armie of twelue thouſand men againſt the Madianites,chuſing out of euery Tribe one thouſand ſouldiers,and appointed Phinees Captaine ouer theſe Forces,by whoſe induſtrie(as a little before I haue declared)both the Lawes were ſatisfied,and Zambri (that brake the ſame) was puniſhed.

BVT the Madianites (hauing intelligence that their enemies drew neere vnto them,and that they were not farre off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and beſet all thoſe paſſages of their countrey, by which they thought their enemie might breake in,addreſſing themſelues to repulſe them with force and valour. But no ſooner did Phinees with his forces charge them,and ſet vpon them, but that(vpon the firſt encounter) ſo great a multitude of the Madianites was ſlaine, that the number of the carcaſſes might not be accounted. Neyther were their Kings in like ſort ſaued from the Sword: theſe were Og,Sures,Robeas,Vbes,and the fift Recemus (from whom the chiefeſt Citie of the Arabians deriueth his name,and at this day retaineth the ſame,and is called Receme,which the Græcians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrewes hauing thus put their enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and carried and droue away with them a great prey; and killing all the inhabitants thereof,both men and women,they onely ſpared the Virgins,(for this command had Phinees receiued from Moſes hands:) who returning home with his Armie in ſafetie,brought with him a memorable and mightie prey;of Oxen,fiftie and two thouſand,ſixtie and ſeuen; of Aſſes,ſixtie thouſand; of Golden and Siluer Veſſels a great number(which thoſe of that countrey were wont to vſe in their domeſticall affaires.) For by reaſon of their great riches,they liued very delicately.There were alſo led captiue from thence about thirtie thouſand Virgins. But Moſes (diuiding the prey) gaue the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Prieſts, and to the Leuites another fiftie: as for the remainder, he diſtributed it amongſt the people. Whence it came to paſſe, that euer afterwards they liued in great ſecuritie, hauing gotten riches by their vertue, and peace alſo to enjoy the ſame. Now for that Moſes was well

ſtricken in yeeres,he appointed Ieſus (who,if need were,might ſucceed him in the Offices, both of a Prophet and a Prince and Gouernour; for God had ſo commanded that hee ſhould make choice of him) to be his ſucceſſor in the principalitie. For he was moſt expert in all diuine and humane knowledge; being therein inſtructed by his maſter Moſes. About that time, the two tribes of Gad and Ruben, with the halfe tribe of Manaſſes (being abundantly ſtored with cattell, and all other manner of riches) by common conſent beſought Moſes that he would giue and aſſigne to them in particular the countrey of the Amorites, which not long ſince they had conquered by the ſword, for that it was full of rich paſtures. But he (ſuſpecting leſt ſurprized with feare, they did detract and withdraw themſelues from the battell of the Chanaanites, and that vnder the pretext of the care of their cattell, they couered their ſloth) highly taunted and controuled them, ſaying that they were fearefull diſſemblers: He accuſed them likewiſe, that their deſire was to poſſeſſe that land, which was conquered by the common valour of the people, to the end they might lead their liues in idleneſſe and pleaſure; and that bearing armes with the reſt of the hoſt, they would not helpe to poſſeſſe the land beyond Iordan, which God had promiſed them, by ouercomming thoſe nations which he commanded them to account for their enemies. Who perceiuing that he was diſpleaſed (leſt he ſhould ſeeme to be deſeruedly incenſed againſt them) anſwered, that neither through feare they fled danger, neither by reaſon of ſloth ſhunned labour, but onely ſhot at this, that leauing their prey in commodious places,they might be more fit to enter conflict: ſaying, that they were ready (if ſo be they might receiue Cities for the defence and receit of their wiues,children,and ſubſtance) to follow the reſt of the army whither-ſoeuer they were conducted; and to aduenture their liues with them for the common ſucceſſe. Whereupon Moſes (allowing their forwardneſſe, and aſſembling Eleazar the High Prieſt, and Ieſus, with the reſt of the Magiſtrates)granted them the land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the people ioyned vnto them in conſanguinitie) they ſhould warfare againſt their common enemie, till all things were accompliſhed according to their deſires: and by this meanes hauing receiued that which they demanded,and building them walled Cities,they left their children, wiues and ſubſtance in the ſame. Moſes alſo builded ten Cities in that Region(which are to be reckoned in the number of thoſe fortie and eight)in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries and places of refuge,which they onely might take benefit of, who fled thither for chance-meddly; and he appointed them their terme of exile till ſuch time as the High Prieſt died,vnder whom the man-ſlaughter was committed:at ſuch time they might ſafely returne into their Countrey. And during the time of their exile,it was lawfull for any of the kinne to take reuenge againſt the offender by his death, onely at ſuch time as he found him without the Citie of refuge: and that right he onely ratified to thoſe that were a kinne, but not vnto others. Now the Cities of refuge were theſe: in the confines of Arabia, Boſora: in the Region of Galadena, Arimanum: in the countrey of Bataneades, Gauladeaman: And after the conqueſt of Chanaan ſo many Cities of the Leuites (by the commandement of Moſes) were appointed to that end that they might giue refuge and habitation to ſuch ſort of offenders. At that time when one of the Magiſtrates called Salpades, of the tribe of Manaſſes, was dead (and had onely left behind him children of the worſer ſexe) the Gouernours of the tribe came vnto Moſes, and asked his counſell,whether in the diſtribution of the lands,they ſhould leuie out any part or portion for them? Who anſwered them,That if they married within their tribe, they ſhould haue their dowrie; but if they made choiſe to handfaſt themſelues in another tribe, that then they ſhould leeſe their patrimonie in their owne: and for this cauſe made he this ordinance, to the end that euery tribe ſhould continually poſſeſſe his proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but thirty daies onely, to fulfill the number of thoſe forty yeeres ſince their departure out of Ægypt, he (ſummoning an aſſembly in that place neere to Iordan, where now the Citie of Abila is ſituate, enuironed with a field beſet with Palme trees) as ſoone as he ſaw the people addreſſed to heare him, ſpake vnto them after this manner.

MOSES Lawes, and how he was taken out of this world from the companie of men.

The yeere of the world, 2493. before Christs Nativity, 1471.

MY deare friends and fellow ſoldiers, companions in my long trauell, ſince it is ſo thought requiſite by God, and mine age (attaining to the full number of one hundreth and twentie yeeres) requireth no leſſe, but that I muſt depart out of this life; and ſince it ſeemeth not good in Gods ſight, that either I ſhould bee agent, or aſſiſtant in your affaires beyond Iordan: I haue thought it requiſite that (in as much as appertaineth to your felicitie) I ſhould not now alſo faile or default in my duty towards you; but that according to the grace that is giuen me, I ſhould prouide that by laying open the way vnto you that leadeth to the ſame, I may ſeeme worthy amongſt you to merit eternall glory & memorie. Giue therfore eare vnto me, that when as I haue firſt declared vnto you, wherein both your felicitie, and the happines of your poſterity conſiſteth, and haue left this perpetual teſtimony and monument of my entire loue towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: for well I know that I deſerue to be credited by you, both for that beforetimes I haue inceſſantly (in ſtudying for your profites) neuer deceiued you, as alſo for that the ſoule (being ready to bee ſeparated from the body) becõmeth more accompliſhed in all vertue and veritie. Ye ſonnes of Iſrael, there is but one onely cauſe whereby mẽ attaine vnto felicitie, to wit, the fauour of God, which he is onely able to giue to thoſe that deſerue it, & to withdraw it from thoſe that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutifull (according as he requireth, and in ſuch manner as I according to his direction, doe inſtitute you) you ſhall neuer faile to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happines: and that which is more, thoſe goods which you haue now obtained, ſhall be perpetuall, and that which you want, ſhall ſhortly be plentifully beſtowed on you. Onely indeuour you your ſelues to be ſubiect to Gods will, and obedient to his cõmandements: and neither purpoſe vnto your ſelues any other lawes then thoſe I haue giuen you, neither through contempt innouate any thing in your religion. Which if you ſhall performe, you ſhall excell all other Natiõs in warre, and grow inuincible againſt your enemies: for by Gods aſſiſtance all threats are eaſily contemned. Moreouer, there are great rewards (in all the courſe of life) propoſed vnto vertue, and ſhe her ſelfe to her ſelfe is a chiefe & eſpeciall reward: beſides, by her all other bleſſings ar e eaſily obtayned, which if you intertaine among your ſelues, you ſhall both leade a bleſſed life, & obtaine immortall glory, not onely amongſt ſtrangers, but alſo in all poſterities. Theſe things are you to hope vpon, if neither you your ſelues violate thoſe lawes (which by Gods command, and mine induſtry) are ſet downe vnto you, neither ſuffer any other to violate the ſame, but in your ſelues cõtinually meditate vpon the vnderſtanding and vſe thereof. As for my ſelfe, I depart this life in fulnes of ioy, reioycing at theſe your good fortunes, & commending you all to the lawes of pietie and prudence, and the vertue of your guides and magiſtrates, who hereafter are to take care of your ſafetie & felicitie. God likewiſe, vnder whoſe conduct you haue liued (and to whoſe fauour you owe whatſoeuer you haue receiued by mee) will not faile to take care of you, but as long as you ſhall honour both him and pietie, ſo long ſhall you remaine in ſecuritie vnder his protection: neither ſhall you want ſuch men, who ſhall giue you ghoſtly inſtructions, whoſe counſels if you obey, you ſhall be fortunate (namely, Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Ieſus, with the Senat and Magiſtrates of the tribes) towards whom beware leſt you grow ſtifnecked, knowing and remembring this, that he that is inſtructed to obey well (when hee ſhall attaine vnto dignitie) will gouerne well. Neither ſuppoſe you that libertie conſiſteth herein, if you mutine againſt the commandements of your Princes: for hitherto haue you repoſed your libertie in your contumacie towards your benefactors; from which ſinne if hereafter you ſhall bleſſe your ſelues, you ſhall ſee your eſtate waxe ſtill more flouriſhing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you ſhould euer be ſo exaſperated againſt theſe, as you haue beene ſometimes incenſed againſt mee. For if you remember your ſelues, I haue beene more oftentimes in hazzard of my life by your meanes, then by the enemie: Which I ſpeake not therefore vnto you to vpbraid you therewith, for I would not leaue you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the houre of my death, (who euen at that time entertained the iniurie with a quiet minde) but to the end that beeing by mee admoniſhed, you ſhould henceforward bee wiſer in thoſe things which hereafter ſhall concerne you; and leſt you ſhould grow contumelious againſt your gouernours, beeing made proude with affluence of your riches, which you ſhall enioy at ſuch time as you haue ouerpaſſed Iordan, and conquered Chanaan. Otherwiſe if made more inſolent

by these blessings you fall into contumacie, and contempt of vertue, Gods fauour will neuer bee extended towards you; whom if by your sinnes you shall incense against your selues, you shall both lose the land which you haue conquered by your courage, by beeing shamefully oppressed by your enemies, and beeing dispersed ouer the face of the whole earth, you shall fill both the land and sea with your seruitude; which if it should come to passe, then were it too late to repent you, that you haue not obserued the lawes of your nation. Wherefore (to the intent to auoid this danger, and for feare you violate the same) suffer not any of your enemies, after your victorie is once gotten, to liue; and thinke it more conducible for your affaires, for feare lest liuing with them, and intangled in the like studies and delights, you corrupt and depraue your Countrey lawes & institutions. Moreouer, I cõmand you to destroy their woods, their altars, and temples, as many soeuer as you shall meete with, and so to raze them both with fire and flame, as there may not remaine any token or memorie of them any more: For so shall you more safely maintaine your estates. But lest through ignorance of better things your nature be depraued by the worser, by Gods cõmandement I haue written you lawes, and a forme of administration, both of the Common-weale, and your priuate estates; from which if you shall no waies diuert, or wander, you shall prooue the most fortunate people of the earth. When he had spoken these things, hee deliuered them a booke, containing in writing their lawes, and customes of good life: which when they had heard and receiued, they melted in teares, and now lamented they both for the losse of their Captaine, as also for that they remembred them how many perils hee had suffered, and how diligently he had procured their safetie and securitie: and they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recouer so good a Prince: and they suspected likewise that God would not hereafter bee so fauourable vnto them, in that they had not a Moses to pray for them. Besides, they repented them of those things which (through furie) they committed against him in the desart, and were grieuously sorrie: so that all the people (breaking out into teares) would admit no consolation. But Moses recomforted them, and prayed them to giue ouer weeping, & incouraged them to receiue their lawes: and so for this time dissolued the assembly. But now before I addresse my selfe to manifest the rest, I haue thought it meete to insert in this place the lawe of this law-giuer, worthy both his maiestie and vertue: whereby the Reader may know what our lawes haue beene, euen from the first time, and institution of our common-weale. For all those things are extant which this man wrote, so that we neede not faine or affixe any thing in way of ornament: we haue onely renewed the order, and those lawes which he scatteringly set downe according as he receiued them from God, we haue generally digested into their places: whereof I thought good to admonish the Reader, for feare lest hereafter any of our Tribes comming to the view hereof, should rashly accuse me, for that I had not scarce faithfully deliuered the writings and institutions of Moses. Now will I reckon vp those lawes in especiall, which appertaine to the publike institution and rites of our Nation: but those things that concerne priuate customes and contracts, either betwixt our selues or forraine nations, I haue deferred to be discoursed of in that commentarie, wherein (by Gods assistance) I intend to debate of our manners, and method in sacred causes.

After that you haue gotten the land of Chanaan, built your Cities, and haue begun in securitie to reape the fruit thereof; in obseruation of these commandements, you shall gratifie God highly, and establish you atchieued felicitie. Let there be one sacred citie in the region of Chanaan, situate in a famous and fertile place, which God shall make choise of for himselfe, and his Prophets: In the same let there be one onely Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and vnpolished stones, and such as are gathered here and there, which shall be conueniently placed and finished with decencie, as touching the outward ornament: and let not the ascent of the same be made by degrees, but let the earth be easily and fitly raised. But in any other Citie let there be neither Altar, nor Temple: for God is one, and the Hebrew nation is one. Whosoeuer shall blaspheme God, let him be stoned to death, and hanged for a day, and be afterwards ignominiously and obscurely buried.

Item, the Israelites shall liue in the land of Canaan.

Let all the Hebrewes from their seuerall prouinces, assemble themselues thrice in the yeere in the sacred Citie and Temple; that they may giue thankes vnto God for the benefits they haue receiued, and that they may by their prayers demerit his graces in future time; and that by their conuersation and mutuall intertainments, they may increase their beneuolence and loue the one towards the other. For it is behouefull that they should know one another, who are of the same stocke, and are delighted in the same studies. And this very fitly falleth out by their meetings after this kind of maner, whilest both the countenance and discourse as yet taketh deepe

Euery ſeuenth yeere, when the people ſhall be aſſembled together in the ſacred Citie to ſacrifice vpon the feaſt of Tabernacles, at ſuch time as the feaſt approcheth, the high Prieſt from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) ſhall reade the law vnto all of them: ſo that neither women nor children ſhall be exempted from the hearing of the ſame, no not the very ſlaues and bondmen. For it is requiſite that they retaine the perpetuall memorie thereof, alwaies imprinted in their minds: for ſo ſhall they ſinne the leſſe, in that they vnderſtand
C what is decreed in the law. The lawes likewiſe ſhall be of more force in the conſciences of thoſe that ſhall offend, whileſt they infixe in the midſt of thoſe that heare them, their doctrines intermingled with menaces: ſo that the will to performe the law ſhall neuer be inwardly extinguiſhed: & beſides that the remembrance will liue in thē, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children in eſpeciall learne the lawes, then which diſcipline there is not any more honeſt; neither more conducible vnto felicitie. Twice in the day, in the morning and in the euening about bed time, let God be honoured for his benefit of our deliuerance out of Ægypt. For it is a thing in nature reaſonable, to giue thankes vnto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we haue beforetime receiued, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chiefe of theſe alſo are to be written ouer our doores, and worne on our armes: and thoſe things
D which declare his power and beneficence, are to be borne about, written on the head and armes, that euery way Gods bountie may be ſeene towards his people. In euery Citie or townſhip let there be ſeuen gouernours, ſuch as are approoued in vertue, and famous for their iuſtice: let each one of theſe Magiſtrates haue two Miniſters of the tribe of Leui. Let thoſe that are appointed Iudges in the Cities be held in high reputation: ſo that in their preſence no man preſume either to vrge contumelies, or iniurious ſpeeches: for ſo ſhall it come to paſſe, that men accuſtomed to doe reuerence, ſhall alſo exerciſe themſelues in pietie, and grow ſo much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatſoeuer ſeemeth good to the Iudges to decree, let that be held inuiolable; except it be apparant that they be corrupted with money, or that they may be manifeſtly conuicted of a wrongfull iudgement. They ought likewiſe to iudge without reſpect
E of lucre or dignitie, and preferre iuſtice before all other things: for this iniurie ſorteth out to Gods contumely, as if it were to be ſuppoſed, that he is to be ſuſpected to be weaker then they, for whoſe ſake they wreſt the law contrarie to equitie: for Gods power is iuſtice; he therefore that giueth iudgement in fauour and partialitie of great men, maketh them greater then God himſelfe. And if the Iudges cannot determine of the matter in queſtion (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them referre the cauſe to the ſacred Citie, and then ſhall the high Prieſt and the Prophet, with the aſſiſtance of the Senate, determine that which ſhall be conuenient.

The teſtimonie of one witneſſe ſhall not be receiued, but of three, or at leaſtwiſe of two whoſe teſtimonie ſhall be made good by the examination of their behauiour and life. As for women, it is not lawfull for them to beare any witneſſe; by reaſon of the leuitie and temeritie of that ſexe.

F Neither is it lawfull for a man-ſeruant to bring in teſtimonie, by reaſon of his degenerate and ignoble minde: for it is to be ſuſpected, that either for lucre ſake, or for feare, he will depoſe an vntrue teſtimonie. And if any falſe witneſſe ſhall fortune to be beleeued, and he afterwards bee conuicted of periurie, let him be ſubiect to that penaltie, which hee ſhould haue endured that ſhould haue beene caſt by his falſe accuſation. If man-ſlaughter be committed in any place, and the offender may not be found out, neither there appeare any likelihood, that the man is ſlaine of malice, let there be a diligent and carefull inquiſition made (with rewards prefixed to the diſcouerer) uerer) but if no probabilities or coniectures may be gathered, then let the Magistrates of the next Cities (that adioyne the place where the slaughter is committed) and the ancients of the same, assemble together, and measure from the place where the dead bodie lyeth: and let the township that is found to be neerest, and the inhabitants thereof, buy a Heyfer; which they shall bring into a place vnlaboured and vnplanted, where they shall (after they haue cut the nerues of the necke) kill it, and the Priests, the Leuites and ancients of the Citie shall wash their hands in the blood: then shall they lift vp their hands ouer the head of the said Heifer, and cry out with a loude voice, that they haue their hands cleane from that homicide, the which they haue not done, neither were they present at such time as it was perpetrated; and they shall call vpon the mercie of God, beseeching him not to permit that any such grieuous accident euer fall out in their countrey.

Aristocracie the best kinde of gouernment. Deut. 17.

The gouernment of the Peeres is the best kinde of regiment of all other sorts of gouernment: take you therefore heede that you desire no other forme of policie, but retaine and continue the same, hauing no other superiours but the lawes; and managing your affaires by your selues. For it sufficeth you that God is your Prince.

Of the election of a King.

Yet notwithstanding, if you shall grow in desire to haue a King, see that yee elect one of your owne nation, that he in all things be studious to procure iustice, and all other vertues, perswading himselfe that God and the lawes are most vpright: Let him not vndertake any thing without the aduice of the high Priest, and the counsell of the Elders. Let him not haue diuers wiues, neither let him hunt after huge treasures, nor multitudes of horse: for feare lest possessing them, he become so insolent, as that he raise his power and will aboue the lawes: and if you see him affectioned vnto these things, beware lest he grow more puissant then is expedient for you.

Deut. 19. The bounds of lands are not to be remooued.

It is not lawfull for any man to remooue the land-markes, neither of his owne land, or any other mans whatsoeuer; for by this meanes is the peace conserued: Let each one therefore forbeare to remooue them, because they are as the voice of God, assured for euer. For warres and souldiers are raised thereby, when such as would augment their inheritance, striue alwaies to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: And they that are so hardie to remooue the same, are not farre from contempt of the lawes.

Leuit. 25. The plants that are not of foure yeers growth are prohibited.

He that shall plant a piece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth yeere, the first fruits thereof shall not be offered vnto God, neither shall any man eate thereof, by reason that the time is inconuenient, and permitteth not that the trees should fructifie as yet; and nature her selfe is as it were inforced before her time, whereby the fruit is neither conuenable for God, nor conuenient for the vse of man. But all that fruit that shall grow in the fourth yeere (for then is the time that the trees should beare) shall be gathered and brought into the holy Citie (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they shall be eaten during the feast which the Lord thereof maketh to his friends, and with Orphanes and Widdowes: But in the fift yeere it shall be lawfull for him to gather the fruit for himselfe.

Vines to be planted. The law of the plough.

Sow not a field that is planted with vines, for it sufficeth that it nourisheth one sort of plants: so that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to be plowed with Oxen: neither are any other sorts of beasts to be yoaked with them, but the tillage must alwaies be performed by beasts of the same kinde.

The seeds also ought to be cleane and without any mixture; so that two or three sorts ought not to be sowed together: for nature alloweth not a commixtion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull also to couer the female with a male of another kinde: for it is to be feared that this filthinesse should draw men to forget themselues; and grow in contempt of that sexe which is appropriate vnto them: for it often falleth out, that from small beginning, things waxe worser and worser. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chance to grow any maime in policie: for which cause the lawes dissemble not (no not the lightest) things, to the end they may no way seeme to be deficient in their nature.

They that mow and reape corne, ought not to gleane, but to leaue some eares for those that are in necessitie, to the end to succour them. They likewise that plant vines, ought to leaue some clusters for the poore, and some fruit on the Oliue trees, to the intent that they that haue none of these, may gather some little thing for their reliefe: for the owners of the field shall not reape so much profit by the sparing inning of their corne, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poore shall reape by their gleaning: for God will bring to passe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but shall haue care of the nourishment of those that are in necessitie) shall be farre more fat and fertile to bring forth and nourish her fruit.

Neyther

A Neyther is the mouth of the Oxe to be muzzled,at ſuch time as he treadeth the Corne in the Mow: For it ſtandeth not with reaſon, that they who haue beene partakers of the labour, and haue trauailed for the encreaſe of the fruits, ſhould be bridled from the vſe and benefit thereof. The yeere of the world, 2493. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1571.

Neyther ought the Trauailer alſo in his journey to be denyed to gather and taſte the fruits of Autumne,but he is to be permitted to take his fill,as if they were his owne,whether he be of the countrey,or a ſtranger;who ſhall depart joyfully,in that they haue beene made partakers of ſuch fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carrie any away with them. Oxen treading or grinding. Trauellers are not to be driuen away from ripe fruits.

They likewiſe that gather Grapes,ought not to forbid any man to taſte of them,as they beare them to the Preſſe: for it is an vnjuſt thing, that the goods which are giuen by the will of God B for the ſuſtenance of man,ſhould be denyed them,that deſire to taſte the fruit which God giueth in due ſeaſon,and muſt ſuddenly paſſe away.

They likewiſe are to be inuited, that through ſhame make nice to touch the ſame, yea,and to be entreated to take part (if they be Iſraelites) for ſuch are companions and maſters, in that they are of the ſame Race; and if they trauaile into any place, they ought to be entreated to take part of thoſe benefits which God preſented vnto them,according to the ſeaſon. For it is not to be ſuppoſed,that that is ill imployed,which in way of courteſie a man permitteth another man to take, ſince it is God that furniſheth and giueth the abundance and foiſon of all things; not to the end to enjoy them in priuate, but alſo to beſtow them willingly. And he it is, that by this meanes would declare vnto other people the good will he beareth to the people of Iſrael,and the felicitie C whereof he maketh them partakers; by reaſon, that in that abundance which they haue,his will is,that other men ſhould haue part thereof. But whoſoeuer ſhall do the contrarie,let him be chaſtiſed for this his diſhoneſtie, and in publique receiue thirtie nine ſtripes (if he be a free man) for that making himſelfe vnto his gaine,he hath diſhonoured his excellent qualitie. Thirtie nine ſtripes.

It ſhall very well become you (ſaid Moſes) ſince you haue taſted miſeries both in Ægypt,and the Deſart,that you haue care of thoſe who are in like eſtate; and for that you are made rich by Gods mercie and prouidence,it behoooueth and becommeth you to impart ſomewhat to the indigent,who at the preſent are in that eſtate in which you were.

Beſides the two Tenths which I commanded you yeerely to pay, (the one to the Leuites,and the other for your Feſtiuals)you ſhall for euery yeere annexe a third,to be diſtributed among the D poore,to Women,Widowes,and Orphanes. The Tenth for the poore.

Incontinently after a man hath gathered his firſt fruits,he ſhall bring them to the Temple;and after he hath giuen thanks vnto God, (for that the Land which he hath giuen him in poſſeſſion, hath brought forth fruit) and as ſoone as he hath accompliſhed that Sacrifice, (which the Law commandeth him to make) he ſhall giue the firſt portion to the Prieſts. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do,(as well the Tenths of the Leuites,as alſo thoſe other things which were ordained for the Feaſts and firſt fruits)being readie to returne vnto his home,let him ſtand vpright neere vnto the Temple, and aboue all things giue thankes vnto God, That hauing deliuered them from the grieuous ſeruitude of Ægypt, he hath giuen them a plentifull & ample Land to enjoy: and making proteſtation,that he hath payd the Tenths according to Moſes Law, E let him beſeech God,that he will be fauorable both to himſelfe in priuate,and the Hebrewes in publique; and that he will continue thoſe goods vnto him which hitherto he hath beſtowed vpon him,and of his great goodneſſe and mercie vouchſafe to encreaſe them. The firſt fruits. Deut. 26.

Let thoſe that are of full yeeres to be married,match themſelues with vertuous Virgins, and ſuch as are borne of honeſt parents. And he that will not take a Virgin to Wife,let him not abuſe himſelfe with one that is married to another man, leſt he breed diſcontent and ſorrow in her firſt Husband. Let not free-men match themſelues with ſuch as are ſeruants;no,not although they be thereunto mooued by loue: for it is a thing worthie, and befitting honour, to ſurmount a mans affections. Let no man meddle with an Harlot (whoſe ſacrifice God refuſeth, by reaſon of the filthineſſe of her bodie.) For the children ſhall be of a free heart, and addreſſed in vertue, not if F they be engendred in villanous and vnlawfull concupiſcence, but if they be begotten and borne by a free father and mother. If any one that is married for a Virgin,be afterwards found to the contrarie,let her be brought before the Iudge,and let him produce all the ſignes that he can,and let the new-married Wiues cauſe be defended by her father, or brother, or by them who next vnto them, ſhall ſeeme to be her next in bloud; and if the Damoſell be found to haue committed no Crime, let her returne and dwell with him that hath accuſed her, who cannot any more refuſe her, except ſhe giue him great occaſions, whereunto ſhe cannot contradict. without cauſe,and raſhly ſhall accuſe and ſlander his Wife, he ſhall be puniſhed with thirtie nine ſtripes; and in way of amends,ſhall pay fiftie Sicles to her father. But if it be prooued that ſhe hath beene deflowred, and hath beene common, then ſhall ſhe be ſtoned to death, for that ſhe hath not chaſtly conſerued her Virginitie, till the time of her lawfull Marriage; and if ſhe be of the Race of the Prieſts, ſhe ſhall be burned aliue.

If any man haue two Wiues, the one of which he holdeth in great honour and amitie, eyther for loue,or by reaſon of her beautie, and that the other be not in the like condition,and eſtimate; if the ſonne of her that is borne beloued,demandeth to haue the prerogatiue of the elder, which is two portions of that which commeth to all the reſt by his fathers patrimonie, (for ſo much import our Ordinances) and challengeth the ſame,by reaſon that his father more dearely loueth his mother then the other, let it not be granted him. For it is an act againſt juſtice, that the eldeſt ſhould be depriued of that which appertaineth vnto him, becauſe his mothers condition is inferior to that of the others,by reaſon of his fathers affection.

The puniſhment of adulterie,or rather rauiſhing. *Deut.*22.

Whoſoeuer ſhall violate a Maiden, being betrothed to another man, (if by perſwaſion ſhe hath conſented to lye with him) let her dye with him; for they are both of them equally guiltie of ſinne: the Man,becauſe he hath perſwaded the Maiden to ſuffer an inſufferable diſhonour,and to preferre her Luſt before an honeſt Marriage; and the Maid, for ſuffering her ſelfe to be ouercome, and abandoning her bodie to villanie, eyther for Luſt,or lucres ſake. But if meeting her alone,he enforce her,and ſhe haue none to ſuccour her hard by; let him dye alone.

The deflowring of a Virgin.

He that ſhall deflowre the Virgin that is vnmarried,he ſhall take her to Wife: but if he condiſcend not to the father,to entertaine her in Wedlocke, he ſhall pay fiftie Sicles, for amends of the injurie.

If any man pretend to ſeparate himſelfe from his Wife for certaine cauſes, ſuch as ordinarily happen amongſt married couples, let him confirme it in writing,That he will neuer more entertaine her againe; and ſo may ſhe marry againe vnto another,and refuſe the former Husband: and if it happened that ſhe were euill entreated by the ſecond, or that he being dead, the firſt would take her againe in marriage, it is not lawfull for the Wife to returne vnto him.

*Leuit.*25. The Wife of the dead brother married.

If the brother of him that is deceaſed without iſſue,take to Wife her whom his deceaſed brother had married, and that the ſonne which was borne by this ſecond Wedlocke, beareth his name,let him be brought vp as the ſucceſſor of his inheritance,(which thing is granted for publique profit ſake, to the end that Families ſhould not come to ruine, and that the goods ſhould remaine to thoſe of the ſame kindred.) Furthermore, it is allowed for the comfort of afflicted women, that they may be joyned in marriage with the next akinne of their firſt Husbands. But if the brother will not take her to Wife,ſhe ſhall repaire vnto the Senate,and make this proteſtation,That the brother of her deceaſed Husband will not entertaine her,(although ſhe had deſired to remaine in that Line, and bring forth infants vnto him) proteſting,that by him onely the memorie of her deceaſed Husband was diſhonoured. And when the Senate ſhall haue examined the cauſe, why he eſtrangeth himſelfe from this Marriage, his excuſe ſhall be allowed of, how great or ſlight conſequence ſoeuer it be; and then ſhall the Widow vnlooſe his ſhooe, and ſpit in his face, and tell him,that he hath deſeruedly ſuffered theſe things,in that he hath injuried the memorie of his dead brother. And thus ſhall he depart out of the Court,being defamed for his whole life time, and the woman may marrie whomſoeuer ſhe liſt.

Marriage with a bondwoman. *Deut.*21.

If any man take a Virgin priſoner, or ſuch a one as hath beene alreadie married, and be deſirous to take her to his Wife,it is not lawfull for him to touch or approach her, before ſuch time as ſhe hath beene ſhauen, and (hauing put on her mourning apparell) hath bewayled her parents, or friends ſlaine in battaile: but after ſhe hath in this ſort aſſwaged her ſorrow, ſhe may afterwards addict her ſelfe to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honeſt and juſt, that hee that entertaineth her, to haue iſſue by her, ſhould condiſcend vnto her will, in all that wherein he might gratifie her,and that he ſhould not onely addict himſelfe to the purſuit of his pleaſure.

The lamentation & mourning of thirtie dayes.

When as then the thirtie dayes of mourning ſhall be expired, (for that time is ſufficient for the Wife to bewayle her friends in) then may ſhe hearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleaſure with her, it fortune that he miſlike her,and will not accept her for his Wife, he can no more make her his ſlaue, but ſhe may goe whither-ſoeuer ſhe pleaſeth, for that ſhe beareth with her, her libertie.

*Deut.*21. Diſobedience.

All thoſe young men that ſhall make no reckoning of their fathers and mothers,and that ſhall not doe them that honour which belongeth vnto them, (whether the ſame proceed of ſhame,or ſpring from folly, by which meanes they grow to neglect their dutie) theſe firſt of all ſhall be admo-admoniſhed by diſcreet counſell of their parents,(who are by nature appointed ſufficient Iudges in that behalfe) who ſhall ſignifie vnto them,That they were matched together in Matrimonie, not for their pleaſures ſake, neyther that by vniting their poſſeſſions, they might become the more richer,but to the end they might beget children,who might nouriſh them in their age,and miniſter vnto them in their neceſſities. That they had receiued them at Gods hands with great thankſgiuing and infinite joy, and brought them vp with great care & diligence,ſparing nothing that might appertaine to their ſuſtenance or inſtruction. Now therefore ſhal they ſay,Surely the follies of youth are to be pardoned; let this ſuffice you, that hitherto you haue forgotten your dutie: for which cauſe,remember your ſelfe,and grow wiſe; thinking with your ſelfe,that God is grieuouſly offended againſt thoſe who diſobey or diſdaine their parents, by reaſon that he himſelfe is the Father of all mankind;who ſeemeth to be prejudiced in himſelfe,in that diſhonor which is done vnto thoſe that beare his name, at ſuch time as they receiue not ſuch dutie from their childrens hands,as he commandeth. The Law likewiſe inflicted an ineuitable puniſhment againſt ſuch; which thou oughteſt with all prouidence to preuent, and not incurre. If by theſe medicines the vnbridled irregard of youth may be healed,let no man eyther impute or reproach him in his ſubmiſſion: for in ſo doing, the Law-maker ſhall be accounted mercifull,and the parents ſhall be held to be happie, when as they ſee that their ſonne or daughter is exempt from puniſhment. But if ſuch ſpeeches and inſtructions of the father are ſet light by the ſonne, let the Lawes be irreconciliable enemies againſt ſuch continuall outrages committed by the children againſt their parents, and let them drag them out of the Citie,in the ſight and preſence of all the people, and there let him be ſtoned to death: and after the offender hath lyen there a whole day, in the ſight of the people,let him be interred and buried by night. In like manner ought they to be buried,who for any occaſion whatſoeuer are condemned and executed by juſtice.

The yeere of the world, 2493. before Chriſts Nativity, 1471.

Let the enemie alſo be interred after the ſame manner, and let no dead man lye vnburied after ſuch time as he hath beene judged, and hath ſatisfied the Lawes.

Enemie to be buried. Deut.23.

It is not lawfull for any Hebrew to lend vpon Vſurie, whether it be meat or drinke; for it is an vnjuſt thing to make profit of the fortunes of the Tribes: but it is better to ſuccour their neceſſities,and impute their thankſgiuing,and Gods retribution,to be a gaine vnto them,which are wont to follow ſuch kind of benefits. But they that haue borrowed eyther money,or any fruit, eyther drie or moiſt; when as by the fauour and aſſiſtance of God, they ſhall reape their owne Harueſt,and gather their fruit,let them make a willing reſtitution to thoſe that haue lent them,as if they had layd them vp for themſelues,to poſſeſſe them at ſuch time as they had need of them. But if there be any ſo impudent, as they will not make ſatisfaction, let no man enter into their houſes,to take a Pawne,before the Iudges haue giuen order,that the Pledge ſhould be demanded before their doore; and the Debter without contradiction ſhall bring it vnto him, being aſſiſted by the majeſtie of the Law. If he of whom the Pledge is taken,haue ſufficient abilitie,the Creditor may retaine the Gage,till ſuch time as he be payd: but if he be poore,he ſhall reſtore him his Pawne before the Sunne-ſet, and eſpecially, if it be any Garment whereon he is accuſtomed to ſleepe; for God doth naturally beſtow his mercie on thoſe that are poore. It is not lawfull to receiue in way of Gage, eyther a Mill, or ought elſe that belongeth thereunto, leſt any Debter ſhould be depriued of the neceſſary Inſtruments to prouide his Victuals with,& he ſhould endure any euill through pouertie. Let him that committeth any Theft,be puniſhed with death; but he that hath ſtolne eyther Gold or Siluer,let him reſtore it two-fold. If any man kill ſuch as breake into their houſes, to rob them, or they that breake their walls, let not ſuch a one be puniſhed. Whoſo ſhall ſteale a beaſt,ſhall reſtore foure for it,except it be an Oxe,for which one ſhal ſatisfie fiue-fold: and if the Thiefe want meanes to pay this penaltie,let him be their ſlaue againſt whom they haue treſpaſſed, and at whoſe ſuit they are condemned. If any one be ſold vnto one of his owne Tribe,let him ſerue him ſeuen yeeres;and at the ſeuen yeeres end,he ſhal depart with libertie.But if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer,he beget any child vpon a female fellow ſlaue,and that he be willing to ſerue,by reaſon of the good affection and great amitie that he beareth vnto the houſe;in the yeere of Iubile(which hapneth euery fiftieth yeere)let him be ſet at libertie,leading away with him his children,& wife,with their freedome. If any man find Money or Gold by the way,let him ſeeke out him that hath loſt it,and make knowne the place where he found it,to the intent he may reſtore it;knowing,that the profit is not good which commeth and accrueth by another mans injurie. The like is to be done with beaſts: for if any man find them ſtrayed in the Deſart,if he find not out the owner,let him preſently keepe it by him,taking God to witneſſe, that he will not detaine with him another mans goods. If any man find another

Deut. 22. The Law of violence.

Let each man direct the ignorant trauailer in his way, and set him in the right path, if he wander, without deluding him, or hindering him in his necessities, or mis-leading him in his journey. Let no man speake ill of him that is eyther absent, or deafe. If any man be strucken in a quarrell, and it be not with a weapon, let him that strucke him be presently punished, in receiuing the like outrage as he hath offered him. But if he be carryed into his house, and lye sicke vpon it diuers dayes, and in the end die thereof, he shall be exempt of the penaltie. But if he escapeth, and during the time of his sickenesse hath beene greatly hindred and charged; then let him that strucke him, pay all the charges he hath beene at during the time he kept his bed, and satisfie the Physi- H cians. He that with his foot shall strike a woman with child, if the woman miscarry, he shall be by the Iudges amerced in a summe of money, for that he hath lessened the number of the people, by the losse of him that is dead in his mothers wombe. Let him likewise be condemned to pay a summe of money vnto the Husband. But if the woman die of the stroke, he that offered the violence, must dye the death also; by reason that the Law justly ordaineth, that Life should be satisfied with Life.

Eunuchs.

God graunt, that you may enjoy the Countrey (which he hath giuen you) in contempt of trauailes, and in exerciſe of vertues: and that you may poſſeſſe the ſame in ſecuritie and peace; and that ſtrangers may not leuie Armies, to ouerthrow you: and that no ciuill mutinie may be rayſed amongſt you, which may bring to paſſe, that that which hath beene well ordered and decreed C by your anceſtors, doe come to nought, when you ſhall happen to commit the contrarie. Liue therefore, and perſiſt you to conforme your ſelues to thoſe Lawes, which both God hath approoued for good, and hath alſo giuen you. But if perhaps your ſelues at this preſent, or your ſucceſſors hereafter, ſhall fortune to entertaine & vndertake a Warre, God graunt it may happen without the confines of your countrey: but if the matter muſt needs be tryed out by the Sword, you ſhall ſend certaine Heraulds to your deſtinated enemies. For before you enter battaile, it ſhall be requiſite firſt of all to parley with them, and to declare vnto them, that you haue a great Armie, and Horſes, and Weapons, and (beſides all theſe) that you haue Gods fauour & aſſiſtance; who ſhall require them therefore, that you may not be enforced to warre againſt them, nor to make bootie of their goods, and to carrie them away, in ſpight of their reſiſt. If they condiſcend D vnto any reaſonable conditions, then entertaine peace; making your account, that they are ſtronger then you be: but if they will needs offer you injurie, you ſhall lead forth your Armie againſt them, hauing God for your Generall, and ſoueraigne Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your ſelues haue choſen, ſurpaſſing all the reſt in valour. For whereas there are diuers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought neceſſarily and readily to be executed, is hindered; and commonly the iſſue is vnfortunate, where there are diuers Commanders. Let your Armie be generally leuied of men that are ſtrong in body, and hardie in courage; and ſequeſter from your Armie him that is fearefull, leſt ſuch men hapning to flye when they ought to fight, doe giue your enemies the aduantage. Let them alſo be free from Warre, who hauing built them a new houſe, haue not enjoyed the ſame for a yeeres ſpace; as alſo he that hath planted a Vineyard, and hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and beſides theſe, he that hath wedded a Wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his houſe: leſt being tranſported with the deſire of theſe things, and reſeruing themſelues to their forſaken pleaſures, in the behalfe of their Wiues, they fight but faintly and coldly.

The Lawes of Warre. Deut. 20. Heraulds to be ſent.

But when you haue brought your Armie into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you ſhall aſſault any Cities, if you fortune to haue any need of matter to make Engines of, grub not the Land, neyther ſee you cut downe the fruitfull Trees, but ſpare them; remembring you, that they are planted for the good of men, and that if they could ſpeake, they would accuſe you, alledging, that without cauſe of warre they are ill entreated, againſt all right; and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would diſlodge, and remoue into another countrey.

Fruitfull trees are not to be cut downe.

But when the battaile is ended, and the day is yours, kill all thoſe enemies that reſiſted you in the skirmiſh, the reſt reſerue as your tributaries (except the people of the Land of Chanaan, for they, with all their families, are to be ruinated.) Beware alſo (but eſpecially in warre) that neither a woman vſe a mans apparell, neither a man a womans rayment. Theſe are the Lawes which Moſes left. He gaue them likewiſe certaine Inſtitutions, (which he had written fortie yeeres before that time) whereof we will ſpeake in another Treatiſe. Some few dayes after (for he aſſembled the people ſixe dayes, one after the other) he gaue them his bleſſing, and pronounced his maledictions againſt thoſe which ſhould not liue according to his lawes, but ſhould tranſgreſſe the determinations thereof: Hee read alſo vnto them a Poeme of ſixe meaſures (which he had enregiſtred in the holy booke) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things haue and doe fall out, without varying any waies from the truth and veritie. Theſe volumes and the Arke, gaue he vnto the Prieſts; in which he alſo placed the ten commandements written in the two tables. Hee committed alſo vnto them the cuſtodie of the Tabernacle. He likewiſe exhorted the people that (at ſuch time as by force they had conquered the promiſed countrey, and were planted therein) they ſhould not forget the iniurie which the Amalechites had done vnto them, but that they ſhould lead forth their army againſt them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at ſuch time, as they were in the deſart. And commanded them that as ſoone as they had taken the countrey of Chanaan, they ſhould exterminate and extinguiſh all the people.

The Amalechites to be puniſhed.

He willed them alſo to erect an Altar toward the riſing of the ſunne (not far from the Citie of Sichem, betweene two mountaines, the one Garizim, on the right hand; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that diſtributing the people into two parts (ſixe tribes in euery part) they ſhould plant them on the mountaines. And he commanded that the Leuites, and Prieſts ſhould be with them, to the intent that they firſt of all that were vpon the mountaine of Garizim, ſhould beſeech God that hee would multiply his bleſſings vpon them that ſhould be zealous of his ſeruice, and carefull of the conſeruation of his lawes, without diuerting from that which Moſes had commanded. The ſixe other alſo were appointed to anſwer the like: and when as likewiſe theſe ſixe laſt had praied, the ſixe firſt were to anſwer them, and confirme that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions againſt the tranſgreſſors (each one anſwering other (in ratification of that which had beene ſpoken. He reduced alſo vnder writing theſe bleſſings and curſes, to the intent that the memorie thereof might neuer be ſuppreſſed or extinguiſhed by time: which he alſo (being neere vnto his death) cauſed to be written in the Altar on the one ſide thereof, in that part which extended it ſelfe toward the place where the people ſtood, at ſuch time as they ſacrificed and offered burnt offerings. Since which day there were no more ſacrifices offered in that place: becauſe it was contrary to law. Thus did Moſes eſtabliſh, and theſe the Hebrew nation obſerue continually and inuiolably, euen vnto this day.

Deut. 29.

Moſes bindeth the Hebrewes by an oath to keepe the law.

On the next morrow, he reaſſembled all the people, themſelues, their wiues, and children: he likewiſe commanded that the ſlaues ſhould be there preſent, binding them by an oath that they ſhould maintaine and keepe the lawes, and that diligently tying themſelues to the will of God, they ſhould not ſo much eſteeme either their kinred, or means, or perils, or any other cauſe whatſoeuer, as that thereby they ſhould be driuen to neglect their lawes, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether it were any one of their kindred, or any City whatſoeuer, that would ſeeke to alter and diſturbe the ſame, or ſtriue to weaken the eſtate thereof, that both in particular and in publike, they ſhould expoſe themſelues and endeuour to puniſh them: and if they ſhould fortune to take ſuch a City, that they ſhould raze and vtterly deface the ſame; and if it were poſſible, not to leaue one ſtone vpon another, but to deſtroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take ſuch a reuenge, yet that they ſhould make it knowne that they were not conſenting to their impietie. Hereunto the whole people ſubſcribed and ſealed it with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people ſhould know when the ſacrifices were agreeable vnto God, and how they ought to march out to battell, taking a ſigne of the ſtones of which I haue foreſpoken.

Moſes exhorteth Ioſuah.

Ioſuah likewiſe, during the life and in the preſence of Moſes, foreprophecied whatſoeuer he intended to performe for the profit of the people, either abroad in the adminiſtration of war, or at home in preſcribing lawes; and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly preſcribed them) he told them, that by inſtructions from God he foreprophecied, that if they violated their country religion, they ſhould not eſcape their deſtruction; for that both their countrey ſhould be filled with forraine armes, and their Cities ſackt, and their Temple burnt, and that they themſelues ſhould be ſold vnder the ſpeare, and that they ſhould ſerue a nation which would not be mooued or touched with commiſeration of their afflictions and miſeries; and that at length they ſhould too lately and vnprofitably repent them of their errour: yet that God their eſtabliſher ſhould reſtore Cities to the Citizens, and a Temple to his people: And that it ſhould come to paſſe, that they ſhould not loſe this only one time, but alſo very many times. Then did Moſes alſo exhort Ieſus that he ſhould lead his army againſt the Chanaanites, promiſing him that God would be aſſiſtant in his actions, prophecying beſides much good hap vnto the people.

Since

A Since that (ſaith he) I goe vnto mine anceſtors, and that God hath prefixed this day and time of my departure, I proteſt before you, that liuing as yet and ſtanding in your preſence, I giue him thanks for the care and prouidence, which he hath hitherto had of your affaires; not onely in propulſing your aduerſaries, but alſo in largely imparting his bleſſings vnto you, and for that he hath alwaies fauourably helpt me, whilſt I endeuoured by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better ſtate: And that which is more, it is he which hath giuen both the entrance & the iſſue; making vſe of me but as his committee and ſeruant in all that good, which hee would ſhould be done vnto his people. For all which things I haue thought it requiſite, that (in departing from you) I ſhould bleſſe the power of God, who in time to come ſhall haue the care and charge of you: and to acquit my ſelfe of that debt, I leaue you this in remembrance, which is, B that you ought to ſerue and honour him, and reuerence the ordinances which he hath giuen you, whereby (continuing his fauour towards you) hee will grant you grace to conſerue and keepe this excellent gift. Truely that law-maker (that were no more then a man) would be greatly diſpleaſed and highly diſcontented with thoſe men, who ſhould violate his ordinances, and ſhould ſet them at noughts: doe not you therefore tempt God, who is prouoked vnto anger, when thoſe lawes which he himſelfe hath eſtabliſhed and giuen you, ſhall be contemned and neglected.

Whileſt Moſes pronounced theſe his laſt words, and diſcourſed vnto the tribes their ſeuerall deſtinies, the whole multitude brake into teares; and the women beating their breſts, ſhewed and expreſſed the ſorrow they had conceiued at his death. The children likewiſe lamented, making it knowne that they could not bee maſters of their owne ſorrow, becauſe that in their ten- C der yeeres they had vnderſtood the vertue and famous acts of Moſes; and betwixt the elder and younger ſort, there was as it were a conflict who ſhould weepe more bitterly: for the one vnderſtanding of how worthy a Gouernour they were depriued, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, becauſe they ſhould then forſake him, before they had ſufficiently taſted and made triall how great his vertue was. But how great the compaſſion and complaint of the people was, a man may make coniecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For, although he were aſſuredly perſwaded, that a man was not to lament vpon the inſtant of his death (in that it chanced vnto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and reſtraine himſelfe from teares: And whileſt he was borne thither where he vaniſhed out of their ſight, all of them followed him, wetting their D faces and boſomes with flowing teares. Then did Moſes (beckening with his hand) warne them from a far off, that they ſhould ſtand ſtil and keep their places, and exhorted thē that were neereſt him, by word of mouth, that they ſhould not follow nor proſecute him any further with teares, for feare leſt they ſhould make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth, and Eleazar the high Prieſt, and the chiefetaine Ieſus. And when hee was arriued vpon the mountaine called Abarim (which is very high, and ſituate neere vnto Iericho, and from whence he might diſcouer the greater part of the land of Chanaan) hee diſmiſſed the elders, and whileſt with mutuall embraces he tooke his laſt leaue of Eleazar and Ieſus, and diſcourſed with them, a cloud ſodainly enuironed him, and hee was taken away into a certaine valley: but in the ſcripture he writeth that he died, fearing leſt for the excellency of his vertue, they E might report that he was rauiſhed and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundreth and twenty yeeres, the third part whereof he ſpent in gouernment (one month onely exempted.) He died the laſt month of the yeere, and the firſt day of that month which the Macedonians call Dyſtrus; and our countrimen Adar. Of all men the wiſeſt that euer was, and who in execution of his good counſels had no man to equall him. Moreouer in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertaine and perſwade the people, he had no ſecond: and ſo were his affections alwaies leuelled and limitted by his wiſedome, that hee ſeemed vtterly to want them, and that onely he knew the names of thoſe paſſions which hee perceiued to be too actiue in other men. In his gouernment he was matchleſſe, in his prophecies peereleſſe, ſo that all the orations that he made ſeemed to be Oracles. For which cauſe the whole multitude mour- F ned for him during the terme of thirty daies: neither were the Hebrewes euer ſeized with ſo extreme griefe, as they were at that time when the Prophet died; neither did he only leaue behind him a preſent deſire of him, but a great eſtimation amongſt all men, who haue euer chanced to reade and examine his writings, whilſt by them they make eſtimate of his vertues. And theſe are thoſe things which I thought good to be ſpoken of the death of Moſes.

Amongſt the Hebrewes, Adar is the 12. month, but amongſt vs it is called March.

Moſes was a good gouernour, and a great Prophet.

CHAP. I.

How IESVS, Generall of the Hebrewes, hauing ouercome and ſlaine the Chanaanites, diuided their Land amongſt the Tribes by Lot.

The yeere of the world, 2494. before the Natiuitie of Chriſt. 1470.

AFTER that Moſes had beene taken from amongſt men (after the manner as I haue declared) and that all whatſoeuer he had ordained, was duly performed, and his funerall obſequies were at an end; Ieſus commanded the people to prepare themſelues, and to march forward into battaile. He ſent eſpyals likewiſe into Iericho, who might both ſound their minds, and diſcouer their forces. Preſently after he diſlodged, and encamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to paſſe the Riuer of Iordan, as ſoone as any opportunitie offered it ſelfe. Then aſſembled he together the Princes of the Tribes of Ruben and Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manaſſes, (for to this halfe Tribe the countrey of the Amorites was giuen for an habitation, which was the ſeuenth part of Chanaan) and remembred them of that which they had promiſed vnto Moſes, entreating them (in memorie and fauour of him, who in the laſt period of his life, was not wearied to take care of their Common-weale & publique profit) ſpeedily and willingly to performe that which they had promiſed vnto him. Who ſhewing themſelues readie and willing to performe that which he commanded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thouſand men, that were his followers; and afterwards (departing from the Citie of Abila) he drew towards Iordan, and marched forward ſome ſixtie furlongs. As ſoone as he was encamped, the Spyes returned againe, and preſented themſelues vnto him, certifying him of the whole eſtate of the Chanaanites. For being vnknowne and vnſuſpected, vpon the firſt arriuall they obſerued and viewed the walls and ſtrength of the Citie at their pleaſure, ſearching which of them were more or leſſe defenced, and which of the Gates were eaſieſt or hardeſt to aſſault; neyther did any of thoſe that met them, offer any offence vnto them: whileſt they thus pryed into, and viewed euery place,

The Spyes ſuruey Iericho.

A place, the Citizens interpreted their diligence to bee rather an accuſtomed curioſity of ſtrangers, then ſuſpected them that they intended any hoſtile ſtratageme. The yeere of the world, 2494. before Chriſts birth, 1470.

About the ſhutting in of the euening, they retyred themſelues into a certaine hoſtrie that adioyned the walles, into which they had beene directed to take their repaſt; and whileſt after ſupper time they conſulted vpon their returne, the king was giuen to vnderſtand (as he ſate at his ſupper) that certaine Spies ſent out of the Hebrewes campe, had ſuruayed the Citie, and taken vp their lodging in Rahabs houſe, where they ſuppoſed to conceale themſelues till they might gaine them opportunity to depart. Whereupon the King ſent a ſpeedy commandement and officers to apprehend them, to the end that beeing brought before him, hee might by torture extort from them the cauſe and reaſon why they came into his Citie. Of whoſe approach, when
B Rahab had gotten ſome priuate intelligence, ſhee hid the Spies vnder certaine packes of linnen, which ſhee dryed neere vnto the walles, and told them that were ſent by the King, that certaine ſtrange gueſts a little before Sunne-ſet had ſupt in her houſe, but that they were departed; who if they were ſuſpected by the King, as ſuch as intended any detriment to the Common-weale, they might with little labour and purſuite be eaſily ſurprized in their way. They hearing the woman ſpeake after this manner, and imagining no ſubtilty or deceit in her, returned backe againe without ſearching the hoſtrie. But after they were buſied and trauelled in the purſuit and ſearch after them euery way, and tracting of euery path, whereby they might bee ſuſpected to trauell towards Iordan, and perceiuing no ſigne of their flight, they deſiſted any further to purſue them. No ſooner was the tumult appeaſed, but Rahab calleth forth the Spies, and told them the dangers
C to which ſhe had expoſed her ſelfe for their ſecurity ſake (for had ſhe bin conuinced to haue concealed them, ſhe might by no meanes haue eſcaped the puniſhment of the King, but that both ſhe and all her family had miſerably periſhed:) She therfore required them, that at ſuch time as they ſhould bee Lords of the countrey of Chanaan, and had both the occaſion and power to requite her courteſies, that they would haue her in remembrance. This ſaid, ſhee diſmiſſed them (to the end they might returne home againe.) But before their departure ſhe tooke an oath of them, to warrantize both her ſelfe and all that which appertained vnto her, at ſuch time as they ſhould become maſters of the Citie, and had deſtroyed all the Citizens thereof, according to the arreſt and ſentence giuen againſt them; which ſhee knew ſhould come to paſſe, hauing certaine apprehenſion of the ſame, by certaine ſignes and tokens from God: whereupon for the preſent with D many thankeſgiuings they proteſted, and for the future avowed and ſwore vnto her, to acknowledge her kindneſſe not in words, but in deedes. At ſuch time therefore as ſhee ſhould perceiue that the Citie was ready to bee ſurprized, they counſelled her that ſhee ſhould retyre all her ſubſtance, and all thoſe that appertained vnto her, into her houſe; and that before the doore thereof, ſhee ſhould ſpread ſome crimſen garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiuing the ſame, might inhibite the ſouldiours from pillaging and ſpoiling her houſe: For (ſaid they) wee will giue him notice herof (by reaſon of that willing forwardnes that hath bin in thee to ſaue our liues) and if by misfortune any of thy friends die in the combate, doe not impute the fault vnto vs; and wee beſeech God (by whom wee haue ſworne) that hee be not diſpleaſed againſt any of vs; except againſt ſuch as falſifie their oathes. Hauing after this manner accorded vpon the coue-
E nant, they let downe one another from the wall; and when they were arriued in ſafety among their nation, they recounted vnto them all that which had happened ſince their arriuall in the Citie. Ioſuah hereupon declared vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt and the reſt of the Elders, what oath his Spies had ſworne vnto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promiſe they had made. But the Generall was penſiue and ſore troubled, for that he knewe not which way he might paſſe the riuer of Iordan, by reaſon that for the preſent it was very deepe and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon; and if they would haue built one, the enemy would haue interrupted them: and further beſides that, there were not any places conuenient to ſtay in. But God made him a promiſe that hee would make the waters fall, and giue them paſſage there-through. Ioſuah therefore encamped his hoſte for the terme of two daies (to F the end hee might paſſe ouer his whole Armie, and the reſt of the people, after this manner following.) The Prieſts marched before with the Arke. After them went the Leuites bearing the Tabernacle, and thoſe veſſels which were deſtinated for ſacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, diſtinguiſhed in their Tribes, hauing incloſed within their battels the women and children whereby they might bee the more ſecure from the force of the flood. But when as the Prieſts had marched formoſt, and found the riuer paſſable, and that the water was decreaſed, and that the current thereof was not ſo violent, neither the billowes ſo incenſed, but that in the bottome there was good footing (for that the grauell and ſand was not quicke but ſettled) then G all of them without feare paſſed ouer the foord, finding al things aſſuredly performed vnto them, which God had forepropheſied, and promiſed vnto them: but the Prieſts kept them in the midſt of the channell vntill the multitude were paſt ouer, and were in ſecuritie; and when as euery one had gotten the other banke, the Prieſts iſſued out, permitting the riuer to flow according to his free and ordinary courſe: which pleaſantly flowing, grew to that greatneſſe and ſwiftneſſe which it retained at the firſt. Now when the Hebrewes had marched fiftie furlongs, they incamped themſelues ſome tenne furlongs from Iericho. But Ieſus builded an altar of ſtones (which euery one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Iordan, according as the Prophet had commanded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigious reſtrainment of the floud, and on the ſame he ſacrificed vnto God, and the ſolemnitie of the H Paſchal was celebrated in that place; and at that time they, who in times paſt were in great neceſſitie, were largely furniſhed with all plentie and aboundance: for they did reape the corne of the Canaanites (which at that time was ripe) and carried away the reſt for a prey. In the ſame ſeaſon likewiſe their nouriſhment of Manna failed them, wheron they had fed for the ſpace of 40. yeers. And whereas the Iſraelites did all theſe things with ſecuritie and freely, and the Chanaanites neuer ſallied out againſt them, but appauled with feare, ſhut themſelues vp within their wals; Ieſus decreed & reſolued to beſiege them in their Cities: ſo that on the firſt day of the feaſt, the Prieſts bearing the Arke, and guarded on euery ſide with troups of armed men, drew neere vnto the Citie, ſounding their ſeuen hornes: and exhorting their ſouldiers to behaue themſelues manfully, they walked about and inuironed the wals round about, being attended both by the Senate and I Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their hornes, and ſo returned backe into their campe. Which when they had done for the ſpace of ſixe dayes, on the ſeuenth Ioſuah aſſembled the armie and all the people, bringing them ioyfull newes of the Citie, which that day ſhould be ſurprized without labour (the wals falling downe of their owne accord, and without mans hand, and yeelding them free paſſage and entrance into the Citie) and he encouraged them to kill all thoſe whom they met withall, and not to giue ouer the ſlaughter of their enemies, although they were wearie, neither to be mooued with compaſſion, nor allured from the ſlaughter and execution by deſire of prey, or to permit the enemie in any ſort to flie, but that they ſhould extinguiſh and roote out all that which breathed and had life, reſeruing nothing for prey or priuate profit. He commanded likewiſe that all that which was found (either of golde or ſiluer) ſhould bee K brought into one place, & reſerued to be the firſt fruits of the happy works of God; and after the ſurprizall firſt of the Citie, that onely Rahab with her kindred ſhould be ſaued, by reaſon of the othes which the ſpies had ſworn vnto her. This ſaid, he arranged his hoſt, & made them approch the City, then did they once more walke round about the City, the Arke marching before thē, and encouraging the army to valour by the ſound of their Cornets. And after they had enuironed the wals ſeuen times, and had a little repoſed themſelues, the walles fell (wheras then neither the Hebrewes had enforced any engine againſt them, or vſed any other violence.) So that they entring into the City, ſlue all thoſe that were therein, who were already diſcomforted by the ſodaine and vnexpected ouerthrow of their walles, and thorow their ſodaine feare made vnapt to fight, ſo that they were ſlaine amidſt their ſtreets, finding neither refuge nor reliefe to ſuccour L them: yea ſo were they fleſhed in the ſlaughter, that they neither ſpared women nor children, but filled the City with dead carcaſſes, which at length being ſet on fire, ſerued them for a funerall flame to conſume them in, and with equall furie rauaged and burnt the fields. Only Rahab & her houſhold (who kept themſelues within her hoſtrie) were ſaued by the ſpies: who brought to Ioſuahs preſence, he gaue her thankes for ſauing his ſpies, and promiſed her that he would reward her courteſies, and anon after gaue her poſſeſſions, and euer after held her in great honour. All that of the City which the fire ſpared, the ſword conſumed. And Ioſuah pronounced curſes againſt thoſe, who ſhould afterward endeuour to erect that which he had ruinated: namely, that he that ſhould lay the firſt foundation, ſhould be depriued of his firſt begotten ſonne, and he that ſhould finiſh the worke, might loſe his yongeſt ſonne; neither pleaſed it God that this imprecation ſhould be fruſtrate, as hereafter it ſhall bee ſpoken. At the ſurprize and ſacke of this ci- M tie, there was gathered an infinite quantitie of gold, ſiluer, and braſſe; ſo that no man brake the Edict, or ſought any prey or lucre thereby for himſelfe. Theſe ſpoiles Ieſus deliuered vnto the Prieſts, to be laid vp in the treaſurie, and after this manner was the Citie of Iericho deſtroied. But Achar the ſonne of Zebel of the tribe of Iuda, hauing gotten a royall pall altogether embrodered with gold, with an ingot of gold of three hundreth ſicles in waight, and thinking in himſelfe that

Iericho is taken, the men ſlaine, and the citie deſtroyed, and burnt: Rahab and hers reſerued.

A that it were a very fond thing, that the profit he had made by the hazzard of his life, ſhould be taken from him and preſented vnto God, who had no neede thereof, digged a deepe pit in his tent, and buried his ſpoiles therein, thinking by this meanes to defraud God, & deceiue his cõpanions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal (which ſignifieth Enfranchized, becauſe that hauing paſt the riuer Iordan, they knew that they ſhould be deliuered from the affliction of Ægypt, and the penurie of the deſart.) But ſome few daies after the deſtruction of Iericho, Ioſuah ſent out three thouſand armed men againſt Ainan (a Citie ſituate a little aboue Iericho) who encountering with the Ainites in battel, and by thẽ put to flight, loſt thirty and ſixe of their company. The newes of which diſaſter beeing brought into the campe, the Iſraelites were ſeized with exceeding griefe, not onely for the men they had loſt (which were all
B of them valiant men and worthy of honour) but alſo by reaſon of the deſpaire they conceiued of their future ſucceſſe. For being already perſwaded that they were maſters of the field, and that their army ſhould be alwaies warranted and ſafe at ſuch time as they ſhould fight (according as before times God had promiſed them) they ſaw (contrary to their opinion) that their aduerſaries had taken heart; inſomuch as clothing themſelues in ſackloth vpon their raiments, they ſpent all the day in teares & lamentatiõs without taſting any meat; ſo grieuouſly were they afflicted with the inconuenient that had hapned. But Ioſuah perceiuing the army diſcomfited after this maner,
C and conceiuing ſome ſiniſter hope of their eſtates, boldly addreſſed himſelfe vnto God, ſaying: We haue not beene induced by our own temerity to attempt the conqueſt of this land by force, but we haue beene hereunto incouraged by thy ſeruant Moſes, to whom thou haſt promiſed by diuers ſignes, that thou wouldſt giue vs this country to inhabit in, & that our army ſhould haue alwaies the vpper hand in battell, and of theſe thy promiſes wee haue oftentimes experimented the euent. But now beyond all expectation (hauing receiued an ouerthrow and loſt ſome of our ſoldiers) being terrified by this accident, and ſuſpicious of thy promiſes to Moſes, we both abſtain from war, and (after ſo many enterprizes and entrances of war) we cannot hope of any fortunate or ſucceſsfull proceedings. Be thou therfore aſſiſtant vnto vs, O Lord (for it lieth in thy power) & by thy mercy relieue our preſent ſorrow with a largeſſe of victory, & take frõ vs the thought of deſpaire wherein wee are too farre plunged. Ioſuah lying proſtrate on his face, made this praier vnto God, who preſently anſwered him, that he ſhould ariſe; cõmanding him to purge the armie
D of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude, who was ſo hardy as to violate and conceale thoſe things which were conſecrated vnto him, aſſuring him that that cauſe was the meanes of the preſent calamitie: but that as ſoone as he had ſearched out, and puniſhed the ſacriledge, the Iſraelites ſhould become fortunate and obtaine the victorie. This Oracle Ioſuah declared vnto the people, and calling for the high Prieſt and the Magiſtrates, he caſt lots vpon the tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Iuda, it was againe caſt by kinreds; and when againe the ſacriledge was found to bee committed in Zacharias kinred, they examined the ſame once more man by man, and found out Achar: who ha-
E uing no meanes to deny the ſame, and being diſcouered by God himſelfe, confeſſed the fact, and brought forth thoſe things, which he had concealed: Whereupon being preſently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deſerued it. But Ioſuah hauing purified the people; led them foorth againſt Ainan, and laying an Ambuſcado by night time aboue the Citie, early in the morning hee drew the enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being incouraged by their former victory) but Ioſuah making a ſhew of retreat, drew them farther off from their Citie (forming in them an imaginarie hope that the Iſraelites fled, and that they ſhould gaine a ſecond victory ouer them.) But when Ioſuah ſodainly made a ſtand, and freſhly charged them, and gaue a ſignall vnto thoſe that lay in ambuſh, they were incontinently ad-
F dreſſed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entred the gates of the Citie, on the walles whereof there ſtood diuers of the inhabitants, beeing eye-witneſſes (as they thought) of their atchieued victorie. In this manner was the Citie taken, and all they that were therein; were ſlaine: and Ioſuah on the other ſide inforced thoſe in ſuch manner (with whom he maintained skirmiſh) that they turned their backs, and fled towards the Citie, as if it had beene in the ſame eſtate as they left it: but when they perceiued that it was ſurprized, & ſaw both it, their wiues, and children conſumed with fire, they ſcattered themſelues about the fieldes, not beeing able to rally themſelues, by reaſon of their diſturbance and diſorder. After this ouerthrow of the Ainites, there were a great number of women, children, and bondſlaues taken captiue, and ſtore of all ſorts of moueables. The Hebrewes alſo became Lords of much cattell, and gathered a great quantitie of ſiluer (for the countrey was rich.) All which Ioſuah (vpon his returne to Galgal)

Galgal) distributed amongst the soldiers. But the Gabeonites (who dwelt not farre off from Ierusalem) vnderstanding what had hapned to them of Hiericho (and seeing the estate of the Ainites, and fearing lest the like misfortune might fall vpon them) thought it not good to offer treaties of peace to Iosuah, supposing they should find no tolerable conditions at his hands, because they knew that he warred vnder that resolution, vtterly to roote out and extinguish the nation of the Chanaanites from off the earth. They therefore made a league with the Cepherites, and Cathierimites their neighbours, telling them that they should not escape the danger, if so bee it so fell out that the Gabeonites were first taken by the Israelites: but that if they were vnited together, they might both resist the greatnesse, and auoide the danger of them. Which counsell of theirs being accepted, they sent Embassadors vnto Iosuah (such men as they thought to be both most capable and wisest amongst them in the affaires of Cõmon-weale (to the intent to entreate a peace betwixt them and the Israelites: who knowing that it would bee very dangerous for them, if they should say that they were Canaanites; and that on the cõtrary side, they should auoid the danger, if they protested that they had no communitie or alliance with them, but that they dwelled far off from them; told Iosuah, that (being incited by his fame) they had vndertaken a long iourney, the truth whereof hee might coniecture by their habits: for vpon their setting forth their garments were new, and now by their long iourney quite worne (for they had purposely put vpon them old raiment, to the end it might be sutable to their subtile insinuation.) Standing vp therefore in the middest of the multitude (attired after this maner) they told them that they were sent by the Gabeonites, and the neighbouring Cities thereabouts (farre disioyned from that countrey) to articulate and ratifie a peace betweene them, according as they haue been accustomed to proceed in their accords: For knowing well that the countrey of Canaan was giuen vnto them by the grace and gratuitie of God (to the end they should bee masters and possessours thereof) they were much reioyced thereat, and required them to bee receiued as their confederates. By these words, and tokens of their garments, and intimation of their long iourney, they perswaded the Hebrewes to enter an accord and amitie with them. And the high Priest Eleazar with the councell of the Elders sware vnto them, that they should be reputed for friends and allies, and that no vniust action should bee enterprized against them; the people likewise approoued their oathes. But Iosuah encamping with his Army vpon their confines, and vnderstanding that the Gabeonites dwelt not farre off from Ierusalem, and that they likewise were of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principall and princes among them, and complained and vpbraided them of their deceit: wherunto they answered, that they had no other meanes to procure their safetie and securitie, and for that cause (and their necessitie sake) that they had sought their refuge thereby. Whereupon hee called vnto him Eleazar the high Priest and the councell of the Elders, who tolde him that he might not infringe the oath which they had made vnto them, but that he might depute them to serue the publike ministeries. Whereupon they were adiudged to attend on these seruices: and by this meanes deliuered they themselues from their imminent perill. But for that the King of Ierusalem was sore incensed against the Gabeonites (for that they had reuolted and submitted to Iesus) hee assembled together the kings of his neighbour nations, to make warre against them. The Gabeonites perceiuing the danger they were in, and how the enemy was prepared to assault them (and how to that intent they had pitched their tents neere vnto a certaine fountaine not farre off from the Citie) they required Iesus to assist and defend them. For their affaires were in that estate, that they expected death from the hands of their friends: and contrariwise hoped for helpe to be warranted by those Hebrews, with whom they had cõtracted amity (notwithstãding that they arriued in that country to destroy the whole nation of the Canaanites.) Iosuah therfore (hastning onward with his whole army to giue them assistance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the enemy (at such time as he intended his assault) and hauing put them to flight, he pursued them by a steepie tract, which place is called Bethora, where hee knew that God had fought for him (as it appeared manifestly by the thunder, lightning and haile that fell at that time, far bigger then was accustomed.) The day likewise (the like wherof was neuer heard of before) was lengthened, lest by the speedy approch of the night the enemy should escape from the victor: whereupon it came to passe that Iesus tooke all those fiue Kings in a certaine caue neere Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to the death. And that the day at that time encreased aboue common custome, it is extant and registred in the sacred volumes, which are reserued in the Tẽple. When after this manner the Kings that inuaded the Gabeonites were slaine and conquered, Iesus led his Armie into the mountaines of Chanaan, where hauing made a great slaugh-

A ter of men, and taken a rich bootie, he brought backe his Armie into Galgal. Now, when the renowne of the Hebrewes valiant acts, and the admirable number of thoſe that were ſlaughtered, were bruited and ſcattered farre and neere amongſt the neighbour Nations, they were ſurprized with a ſudden feare: ſo that the Kings of the Chanaanites, that bordered vpon Libanus, and they alſo of the Plaine of Chanaan, joyned themſelues confederates with the Paleſtines, and all of them were incenſed againſt them, and incamped neere vnto Berotha, (a Citie of the higher Galilee, not farre from Cedeſa, which is alſo ſituate in the Land of Chanaan.) The whole Armie of them conſiſted of three hundreth thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſemen, and twentie thouſand Chariots. This great multitude of the enemie aſtoniſhed Ioſuah, and the Iſraelites, and (by reaſon of the aſſured feare wherewith they were ſeized) they conceiued but little hope of obtai-

B ning the vpper hand: but God reproached him, and vpbraided him of that his timiditie; and for that they ſuſpected themſelues to be ſcarcely ſecured vnder his protection, hee promiſed them likewiſe, that he would ouercome their enemies, and make their Horſes vnprofitable, and would conſume their Chariots by fire. Ioſuah therefore was emboldened by theſe promiſes from God, and marched out againſt his enemies; whom he ſurprized on the fifth day. The encounter was ſtrong, and the ſlaughter ſo great, that they who ſhould but heare the ſame, would ſcarcely beleeue it. Many alſo were ſlaine in the purſuit; ſo that (a few onely excepted) the whole Armie was put to the ſword. The Kings alſo were all of them ſlaine; and of their men, there remained not any one aliue. Ioſuah alſo commanded, that their Horſes ſhould be ſlaine, and he burned their Chariots, and ſecurely marched thorow the whole countrey; ſo that no man durſt ſally out, or

C make head againſt him. He beſieged likewiſe their ſtrong places, and killed all thoſe whom hee might apprehend. Now, when the fifth yeere was fully finiſhed, and not any one of the Chanaanites were left aliue, (except ſuch as were fled into their Cities and Forts of defences) Ioſuah once more retyred his Campe toward the mountaines, and placed the ſacred Tabernacle in the Citie of Siloe, which ſeemed to be a very conuenient place, by reaſon of the beautie of the ſame; where the Arke might remaine, till ſuch time as their affaires of eſtate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he departed with all the people, to repaire vnto Sichem; and there builded he an Altar in that place, (according as before-time Moſes had commanded and enjoyned) and hauing diuided his Armie, he planted the halfe of them on the mountaine of Garizim, and the other halfe on the mountaine of Gebal (on which alſo there is an Altar) with the Leuites and the

D Prieſts: and after they had ſacrificed and done their execrations, and ingrauen them on the Altars, they returned into Siloe. Now, inſomuch as Ioſuah was well ſtrucken in yeeres, and very well perceiued, that the Cities of the Chanaanites were hardly to be aſſaulted, both in reſpect of the places wherein they were ſituate, as alſo for the munitions wherewith (beſides other aduantages of nature) their walls were ſtrengthened & fortified: (for the Chanaanites hauing intelligence of the departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt, and how they haſtened thither-ward, to the intent vtterly to extinguiſh & ouerthrow that Nation, ſpent all that time in defencing & fortifying their Cities) he aſſembled all the people in Siloe; where, when (with mutuall and frequent concourſe) they were aſſembled, he declared vnto them the happie ſucceſſe which (till that time) had befallen them, and the braue executions, worthie (in their euents) to challenge God for their Au-

E thor; furthermore, the excellencie of the Ordinances vnder which they liued: alledging, that the thirtie one Kings, which had beene ſo hardie as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them been ouercome; that all the Armie that had vndertaken to ouerthrow them in battell, was wholly diſcomfited, ſo that there remained not any memorie of them. But for that certaine of the Cities were taken, and the reſt better defenced (and for this cauſe more obſtinate) had need of a longer aſſault & expugnation, he thought good, that they (who had been drawne from out the countrey, ſituate beyond Iordan, to be aſſociates in this common cauſe of conqueſt, & by reaſon of affinitie had made themſelues copartners and companions in their perils) ſhould be ſent backe into their own countrey, with all complement of thankes, and gratuitie. Afterwards, that ſome one of each Tribe, of approued vprightneſſe and loyaltie, ſhould be pickt out, who leuying out and ſurueying

F the countrey, might faithfully, and without fraud, report the greatneſſe thereof. This ſentence was approued by the whole multitude; and thereupon diuers men were ſent (accompanied with ſuch as were skilfull in Geometrie, who in reſpect of their Science, could neyther erre, nor be deceiued) to meaſure out the Land, according to the goodneſſe thereof. For the nature of the Land of Chanaan is ſuch, that there are great Plaines very fruitfull, and which (being compared with other places) might be eſteemed happie and fruitfull in all ſorts of fruit: but if they be compared with the other countries of Iericho, and the Land about Ieruſalem, they ſeeme to be nothing worth:

worth: for although in generalitie the whole countrey bee small, and for the greater part mountainous, yet in respect of the aboundance, bountie, and incredible beauty of the fruits thereof, it is second to no other whatsoeuer. For this cause he thought good that the portions should rather bee estimated according to their value, then their measure; by reason that oftentimes one plow land was worth one thousand other. Those which were sent were ten in number, who (hauing trauailed ouer the whole country and suruaied the same) returned againe to Siloe, at the end of sixe moneths, where the Arke was kept.

Iosuah diuideth the Region of Chanaan to the nine tribes and the halfe tribe of Manasses. Ios. 16.17,18.

Then Iosuah (taking vnto him Eleazar with the Elders, and Princes of the tribes) diuided the Region amongst nine tribes, and the halfe part of the tribe of Manasses (hauing an vnpartiall respect of the greatnesse of euery tribe) & when as each mans lot was cast, there fell to Iudahs part all the higher Iudæa (which extendeth it selfe in length euen vnto Ierusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; to which likewise were annexed the cities of Ascalon & Gaza.) The tribe of Simeon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumæa, confining vpon Ægypt and Arabia. The Beniamites had that countrey which extendeth from Iordan vnto the sea in length, and in breadth vnto Ierusalem and Bethel: and this portion was very small (by reason that the countrey was good) for it contained the Cities of Iericho and Ierusalem. The tribe of Ephraim was alloted his portion in length, from Iordan vnto Gadera; and in bredth from Bethel vnto the great plaine. The halfe tribe of the Manassites was valued frō Iordan to the city of Dor in length, and in breadth vnto Bethsan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Isachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Iordan, for the limits and termes of his length, & the mountaine Itobir for the bounds of his bredth. The Zabulonites were allowed that countrey, which stretcheth out as farre as Genazereth, and that abutteth on the mountaine Carmel, and the sea. The countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adiudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprized the Citie of Arce, which is also called Actipus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth out from the East vnto the Citie of Damascus, and the lower Galilee as farre as the mountaine of Libanus, and the head of Iordan, that issueth from the same, on that side where are the borders of the Citie of Arce on the North side. To them of Dan was assigned the valley that is extended to the Westward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the countrey of Iamnia and Gitta, from Abaron euen vnto that mountaine where beginneth the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did Iesus diuide the countrey of the sixe nations (bearing the name of Chanaan) and gaue it in possession to nine tribes and a halfe. For Ammorrhæa (so called by one of the sonnes of Chanaan) had beene already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two tribes and a halfe, as I haue already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Aritheans were not comprized in this diuision, neither was it tilled. But Iesus (seeing himselfe ouerburdened with yeeres, and vnfit to execute in his owne person those counsels, which hee had concluded vpon; & foreseeing that the Gouernours of the people which should succeed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commanded euery seuerall tribe in particular, that (when they should possesse the countrey thus distributed amongst them) they should not suffer any one of the race of the Chanaanites to liue. For Moses had before time told and perswaded them, that their securitie and the maintenance of the customes of their forefathers consisted in that one point) which he had likewise learned by his owne experience. Further, that they should deliuer vnto the Leuites thirty and eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the land of Amorrhea: three of which were ordained for cities of refuge to those that fled: (for hee aduised them with all consideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them) of the tribe of Iuda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nepthali, Cedesa: which is a place in higher Galilee. Moreouer he distributed vnto them the surplusage of the prey which was very great: so that not onely in publike, but in priuate, they got no small quantity of substance, for there was so much gold and rayment, and housholdstuffe, and so great store of cattell and horses, as the number may not bee comprehended. After which hee assembled the whole armie, and to those that were planted on the other side of Iordan (who had borne armes with the rest, and were in number no lesse then fiftie thousand) hee spake after this manner:

A is requiſite at this preſent (ſince there remaines not any further matter wherein we haue need to imploy you) that we diſmiſſe you, and abuſe not your forwardneſſe and readineſſe any further; by reaſon we are aſſured, that if hereafter we ſhall haue need of you, you will with no leſſe endeuour & willingneſſe be as induſtrious to doe vs kindneſſe. We therefore yeeld you heartie thanks, for that you haue vouchſafed to be companions in our perils: and we require you, that you will perſeuere in this your mutuall beneuolence, remembring you of your friends, and how you haue gotten your poſſeſſions by our helpe, as we (by Gods fauour and your aſſiſtance) haue attained to this our preſent felicitie. Neyther haue you aduentured, without ſome reward of your trauailes: for in this your warfare you are enriched, and ſhall beare away with you a great prey both of Gold and Siluer; and beſides all theſe, our beneuolence and loue, tyed vnto you with all alacritie
B and readineſſe, whenſoeuer you ſhall haue cauſe to vſe vs. For we haue neyther forgot, nor ſet light by Moſes command, before he departed out of this life, and haue ſpared no endeuour, whereby you might allye and tye our affections to you. We therefore diſmiſſe you to your owne poſſeſſions, in complete fulneſſe of your delight; praying you to remember your ſelues only of theſe things, that you will ſuppoſe that no terme can terminate our kindred: neyther (by reaſon of the entercourſe of the Riuer Iordan betwixt you and vs) ſuppoſe you vs to be any others then Hebrewes. For all of vs (both thoſe that dwell on this ſide, and on the other ſide of Iordan) are the poſteritie of Abraham; and one and the ſame God hath brought to light both yours and our progenitors; whoſe Lawes and Religion (inſtituted by Moſes) are diligently to be obſerued: for by this meanes, he will become our helper and fauourer; as on the contrarie ſide (if we ſhall degene-
C rate from his Statutes) he will be an enemie againſt vs. After hee had ſpoken vnto them after this manner, he embraced in particular all thoſe that were in dignitie, and in generall, the whole people. This done, he ſtayed in that place; but the reſt of the whole people conueyed them onward with teares, and they departed the one from the other with great griefe and remorſe. But after that the Tribe of Ruben and of Gad, and the reſt of the Manaſſites had paſſed ouer Iordan, they builded an Altar vpon the banke of the Riuer, that might ſerue for a memoriall to poſteritie, and a token for the preſent, of the conjunction which they had with thoſe that dwelt on the other ſide of Iordan. But when the tidings hereof came vnto their eares that dwelt on the further ſide of the Riuer, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar, but notwithſtanding were ignorant of the reſpect and cauſe they had in building it; they ſuppoſed, that ſeeking to in-
D nouate their Religion, they would introduce the ſeruice of forraine and falſe gods. And being raſhly ſtirred vp with this ſuſpition of the violation of their Religion, they put themſelues in Armes, with this reſolution, to reuenge themſelues of thoſe who had builded that Altar, and to take puniſhment of them, for that they had forſaken the Lawes and Ordinances of their fore-fathers. For they ſuppoſed, that they were not ſo farre to reſpect their parentage, or dignitie, (who were accuſed) as to forget the will of God, and that ſeruice which was agreeable in his ſight. For which cauſe (being in this manner incenſed) they prepared themſelues to the expedition. But Ioſuah, and the high Prieſt Eleazar, with the reſt of the Elders, reſtrained them; counſailing them firſt of all to ſound their deliberation, and afterward (if it ſhould be apparant vnto them, that they did it vnder a ſiniſter intent) at that time they might lawfully inuade them by the Sword.
E Hereupon they ſent Phinees, the ſonne of Eleazar, and ten other of the moſt nobleſt among the Hebrewes, as Embaſſadours vnto them, to know what the intent and reaſon was, why they had builded that Altar on the banke of Iordan.

in your owne patrimonie(which you haue obtained by lot by the means of his grace,and peaceably enioy by the power of his prouidence)ſhould forget him, ſo ſoone as to forſake the Tabernacle, Arke, and Altar,which we haue by hereditarie right receiued from our progenitours,and introduce ſtrange gods, to the intent to be partakers of the impieties of the Chanaanites. But if you repent your miſdeedes,and plunge your ſelues no further in ſo great madneſſe, but reclaime your thoughts,and reuerence your domeſticall and ancient lawes,the pardon is granted you:but if you obſtinately perſiſt in your wickedneſſe, we will refuſe no trauell for the maintenance of our lawes, but paſſing the riuer in defence both of them(or to ſpeake more fitly)of our God,and accounting you no leſſe hatefull and impious then Chanaanites, we will vtterly roote out and race both their memorie, and your poſteritie together. For doe not ſuppoſe this, that becauſe you haue paſt the riuer, you are exempt from Gods power, becauſe in what place ſoeuer you be, you are numbred amongſt them that appertaine vnto him; and it is impoſſible for you to auoide either his power, or his vengeance: And if you thinke that the place is an impediment and let vnto you from following the better courſe, it were better for you to make a new diuiſion of lands, and leaue this region to be conuerted into paſtures. It behoueth you therefore to grow better aduiſed, and that changing your purpoſe, you deſiſt from innouation: Whereunto we exhort you by that loue which you beare to your children and wiues, and beſeech you by the reſpect you hold of that which is moſt deare vnto you, that you inforce vs not to wage war againſt you, who are wholly vnwilling to liſten to your iniuries. Reſolue your ſelues therefore in this preſent matter, aſſuring your ſelues that therein conſiſteth the iſſue, whether you had rather perpetually enioy your peace and affections by our perſwaſion, or expoſe both you and yours to the perill of a bloody warre.

The Rubenites anſwer.

After that Phinees had finiſhed this his oration, they that were the Peeres and principals of the Aſſembly, gaue this anſwer in defence of the common cauſe: Men and brethren, neither will we neglect our kinred,neither innouate any thing in that religion, of which we make a reuerend account: we know,that there is one God common vnto all the nation of the Hebrews,and acknowledge alſo his brazen Altar which is before the Tabernacle,& no other but that ſhall receiue our ſacrifices. As for that which we haue now erected,and that breedeth in you at this preſent a cauſe of ſuſpition,we built it not to the intent to pacifie God by ſacrifices,but that it might remaine as a perpetuall argument of our friendſhip, and might admoniſh vs of our countrey Religion; not to the end you ſhould ſuſpect it were an induction toward the violating of Religion. And that this was the onely cauſe which allured and induced vs to build the ſame,we only challenge God for our faithfull witneſſe,(for which cauſe,hereafter conceiue a better opinion of vs) and God forbid you ſhould ſuppoſe vs to be ſo beſotted in that ſinne; of which, whoſoeuer of Abrahams poſteritie is guiltie,and whoſoeuer ſhall degenerate from the manners and cuſtomes of his forefathers, may not expiate that Crime, without a capitall puniſhment. As ſoone as Phinees had heard theſe things,and prayſed their conſtancie, he returned vnto Ieſus,and declared all thoſe things vnto the people: who rejoycing (in that they had no occaſion to leuie men, nor cauſe of ciuill warre,or bloudſhed) offered vnto God their ſacrifices of thankſgiuing; and preſently diſſoluing the aſſembly,each man returned vnto his owne home: but Ieſus choſe his habitation in Sichama. Twentie yeeres after,Ioſuah being extremely old,(calling vnto him the moſt honourable of euery Citie, and both the Elders and Magiſtrates, and as many of the people as might commodiouſly be aſſiſtant) ſpake vnto them after this manner: Firſt,he called vnto their remembrance the diuers benefits which God had beſtowed vpon them; by meanes whereof, from their poore and afflicted eſtates,they had attained to ſo great riches and glorie. Then exhorted he them,that they ſhould endeuour themſelues hereafter in ſuch ſort,as God might hold and continue his mercifull hand ouer them; ſince they knew,that his beneuolence could be allyed vnto them by no other meanes,but by their good endeuours. He further alledged,that it was his dutie,before he departed out of this life,to admoniſh them of their dutie. Laſt of all,he required them,that they ſhould accept of that his good admonition, and ſhould be perpetually mindfull of the ſame. After this his Oration,he payd the due of nature, and died in the hundreth and tenth yeere of his life; whereof he ſpent fortie,as miniſter vnder Moſes,their Magiſtrate; and after his death,gouerned the Common-weale twentie fiue yeeres. After their deaths Phinees being demanded by the people what Gods pleaſure was, and to whoſe charge the affaires and warres againſt the Chanaanites ſhould be committed, anſwered them that God commanded them to giue the gouernment to the tribe of Iuda, which by election chuſing Simeon and his, they for their aſſociates vndertooke the warre vnder this condition, that when they had vtterly rooted out the remnant of the Chanaanites out of their owne nation, they ſhould likewiſe employ themſelues to extinguiſh all the reliques of that race amongſt the other tribes.

CHAP. II.

How the Iſraelites, after the death of their Emperour, forgetting the religion of their forefathers, fell into extreme calamities: and how through a ciuill warre raiſed amongſt them, there were onely 600. of the tribe of BENIAMIN left aliue.

BVT the Chanaanites (whoſe eſtate at that time was in ſufficient ſecurity) expected them with a great hoſt about the Citie of Bezeca, hauing their army conducted by the King of that place called Adoni-Bezec, which name ſignifieth Lord of the Bezecenites: (for, Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to ſay as Lord) now theſe men promiſed vnto themſelues the vpper hand, by reaſon that Ioſuah was deceaſed. Againſt theſe (of whom I haue foreſpoken) the two tribes fought very valiantly, and ſlaying tenne thouſand of them (whileſt they purſued the reſt) they tooke Adoni-Bezec captiue, who hauing his hands and feete cut off, acknowledged the diuine iuſtice: for he confeſſed that he had vſed ſeuentie and two Kings beforetimes after the ſame manner. In this plight they conducted him neere vnto Ieruſalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then ouerranne they the conntry, ſacking & taking the Cities, and after they had diuers of them in their poſſeſſion, they beſieged Ieruſalem, and entring the lower Citie thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the ſword. But the higher towne was very hard to be aſſaulted (by reaſon of the fortreſſes and ſtrength of the walles, and the naturall and ſtrong ſituation of the place) which was the cauſe that they leuied their campe to goe and beſiege Hebron, which they tooke, and ſlew all thoſe that were therein. In that time there were ſome remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in ſtature, and vnlike vnto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be ſeene as yet at this day, which for their hugeneſſe ſurpaſſe all credulity or conceit. This Citie was giuen in way of honour to the Leuites with two thouſand cubits of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the reſt of the countrey it was freely giuen to Caleb, according as Moſes had commanded it (this was one of thoſe ſpies which Moſes ſent to ouerlooke the land of Chanaan.) They gaue lands and poſſeſſions likewiſe to Iethro the Madianites poſterity (who was father in law to Moſes) for that they had forſaken their owne territories, and annexed themſelues to the Iſraelites, and had beene with them in the deſart. The tribe of Iuda and Simeon tooke thoſe Cities of the mountaynous countrey of Chanaan, and thoſe that were in the Plaine neere vnto the ſea-coaſt (namely Aſcalon and Azoth.) But as touching Gaza and Accaron, they eſcaped: for theſe Cities being in the Plaine, & defenced with a great number of charriots, repulſed thoſe that aſſaulted the ſame to their diſaduantage. So theſe two tribes hauing had good ſucceſſe in warres, retired themſelues into their Cities, and laid aſide their weapons.

As touching the Beniamites to whom Ieruſalem appertained, they receiued the inhabitants thereof as their tributaries, ſo that all of them being in peace, and the one ceaſing from ſlaughter, and the other aſſured from danger, both of them imployed themſelues in manuring the countrey. The reſt of the tribes did the like, conforming themſelues according to the example of the Beniamites, and contenting themſelues to receiue their tributes, they ſuffred the Chanaanites to liue in peace. The tribe of Ephraim (beſieging the Citie of Bethel) could not ſee ſuch an end of their deſſeigne, as the length of time and the trauels they had taken in the ſiege required: and although they were very much toyled and wearied with the ſame, yet deſiſted they not the continuance of the ſiege. At laſt they tooke one of the City (who iſſued forth to find out certaine neceſſary things that he wanted) whom they aſſured that if he would deliuer them the Citie, they would ſaue him, and grant life and libertie likewiſe to all them that were of his linage; who ſware vnto them that he would deliuer the Citie into their hand: which when he had performed, both he and his were wholly warranted; but all the reſt of the inhabitants were put to the ſword. From that time forward the Iſraelites behaued themſelues more mildly towards the enemie, and imployed ployed them in tillage of their lands, and husbanding their fruits : and being growne in riches, they followed the delights and pleasures of the world, yea in such sort grew they dissolute, that they had no minde neither of their policy, nor the lawes of their forefathers. Whereupon God was grieuously incensed against them, who gaue them to vnderstand first of all, that contrary to his command they had spared the Chanaanites: and afterwards, that those Chanaanites in time to come should exercise great cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at that which was declared vnto them, yet notwithstanding they took no pleasure in feats of armes, both for that they had receiued many profits by the Chanaanits, as also for that (being effeminate thorow delights) they were vnapt for labour. It hapned thē at such time as their Aristocraticall gouernment was corrupted, & that they respected not their elders, or any other magistrates beforetime ordained, & were extremely addicted vnto gaine, and infinitely tooke pleasure therein; that amidst their greatest security, a grieuous mutiny and commotion was once more raised amongst them, so that at length they fell at oddes one with another, on that occasion which ensueth.

The history of the Leuites wife.

A certaine Leuite and one of them of the common sort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephraimites, tooke a wife that was borne in the Citie of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Iuda, whom (by reason of her incomparable beautie) he most intirely loued; and found himselfe much aggrieued, for that he found not her affection answerable to his loue : at last his passion so much preuailed with him, as they grewe at oddes, and fell into contentious mislikes, whence at last it fell out that the woman (tired with disquiet) forsooke her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband sore aggrieued thereat (by reason of the loue which he bare her) came vnto her fathers house and appeased the differents, and was reconciled vnto her: There abode hee for the space of foure dayes, being friendly intreated and intertained by his wiues father and mother. On the fift day, he thought good to returne to his owne dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reason that the father and the mother gaue them a loth farewell, and consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a seruant which followed them, and an asse likewise, on which the woman was mounted. Now when they had trauelled the space of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew neere the Citie of Ierusalem: their seruant counselled them to take vp their lodging in some place, for feare lest by their late trauell they might fall into some disaster, the rather for that they were not farre frō the enemies countrey, and that the present time was such, as might make those things that were most assured, suspected. But this opinion of his pleased not his master, who would not lodge amongst those of a forraine nation (for the Citie pertained to the Chanaanites) but his intent was to passe further, and trauell yet twenty furlongs more, to take vp his lodging in one of their cities. This aduice of his beeing allowed, they came to Gaba of the Tribe of Beniamin, when it was late: and whereas they found no man in the market place that might lodge them; at length a certaine old man, returning out of the countrey to his house (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting with him, asked him what he was, and for what cause so late as it was hee sought for his supper? He answered, that he was a Leuite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, & was returning to his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man hauing regard vnto his parentage (by reason that he was of the same tribe, and that by good hap they had after that manner met the one with the other) lodged him in his owne house. But certaine yong men amongst the Gabeonites, perceiuing the woman in that place, were rauished in admiration of her beauty and good graces, and getting some notice afterwards that shee had beene brought thither as a guest, they set light by him (by reason of his weaknes and age, and the small retinue that he had in his house) & came and knockt at his doore. The old man required them to depart, and that they should offer him no violence, nor to her, outrage. But contrariwise they importuned him to deliuer them his guest, and that done, they promised him in no sort to procure his further molestation. But although that the olde man alleadged that shee was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Leuite, and that they should commit an hainous offence, in sinning for their corrupt pleasures sake against the lawes: yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, menacing him likewise to murther him, because he hindred them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driuen to that exigent, that (to the intent they should not offer violence to his guest, and a stranger) he abandoned and prostituted vnto them his owne daughter, supposing it to be a lesse inconuenient to let them satisfie their vnbridled concupiscence on her, then that his guest should suffer any villany; at leastwise he made this account, that by this meanes he should not be guilty of any iniury done vnto them. Notwithstanding all this, they intermitted not to sollicite and vrge the deliuery of the woman (being incensed incenſed in vnbridled luſt towards her.) Contrariwiſe he beſought them that they would not be ſo audacious as to violate the lawes: but they ſeconded their diſordinate deſires with extreme violence, and rauiſhed her perforce, and led her to their owne lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lewdly appeaſed their luſts on her) they thruſt her out of doores from them vpon the breake of day. But ſhe being wholly deſolate, & diſcomforted by this diſaſter, returned to her lodging, and both by reaſon of the agonie which ſhee had ſuffered, as alſo for the ſhame that hindered her from appearing before her husband, who would be incredibly and extremely tormented with that accident, ſhe fell downe and gaue vp the Ghoſt. Her husband ſuppoſing that ſhee was onely ſeized with ſome ſound ſleepe (not ſuſpecting any other inconuenient) thought to awake her, with that deliberation to confort her, becauſe ſhee had not willingly condeſcended to their violences and luſts, but maugre her reſiſt was rauiſhed by them, and taken out of his lodging. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued that ſhee was dead, he moderated his affections, conſidering the extremitie of his euils, and laying the dead body vpon his Aſſe, he carried it to his houſe; where he no ſooner arriued, but that he diuided and cut the ſame into twelue pieces, which he ſent to the twelue tribes of Iſrael; commanding them that bare the ſame, to tell euery tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife, and that villany they had practiſed againſt her. The tribes were very much diſcontented at that which they both ſaw, and heard (hauing neuer before that time heard of any the like aduenture) and incenſed with extreme diſpleaſure (and yet iuſt) they aſſembled themſelues in Siloe: and being arranged before the Arke, they reſolued ſodainly to take armes, and to aſſaile the Gabeonites as their capitall and mortall enemies. But the elders with-held them, declaring vnto them that they ought not after that manner enterprize a headlong warre againſt their brethren, before they had conferred and debated the cauſe with them, and examined the crimes whereof they were accuſed; the rather, for that the law permitteth not any warre (no not amongſt ſtrangers) before an enterparle and embaſſage, which might reclaim thoſe that were held culpable & reduce them to reaſon. For which cauſe they told them that they ſhould conforme themſelues, both according to the letter of the law, and the bond of brotherhood, to ſend certaine meſſengers to the Gabeonites, to demand at their hands the authors of that villany, to the end that when they were deliuered, they might take their ſatisfaction by their puniſhment: but if they ſhould not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to aſſaile them with open warre. Hereupon they ſent certaine meſſengers to the Gabeonites to accuſe thoſe yong men that had perpetrated that indignity againſt the woman, to demand them at their hands, to the intent they might ſuffer condigne puniſhment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yeeld vp the yong men, ſuppoſing it to be an indignity for them for feare of war to be obedient to other mens commandements, by reaſon that they thought themſelues no waies inferiour vnto others in feates of warre, both in reſpect of their number, and the courage both in the one and the other. The reſt of the tribe alſo made great preparation, by reaſon they were all of them reſolued, & vnited together, mutually to defend thēſelues againſt whoſoeuer ſhould aſſaile them. After that the report of the Gabeonites anſwer was brought vnto the Iſraelites, they ſware an oth the one vnto the other, that none of them would giue their daughters in marriage to a Beniamite, promiſing each of them to iſſue & make war againſt them: againſt whō they were more incenſed, then our predeceſſors haue bin animated againſt the Chanaanites, as we haue bin giuen to vnderſtand. They ſpeedily therefore leuied and led into the field an army of 400000. men againſt them. The Beniamites hoſts conſiſted of 26000. armed men, & 600. others, 50. of which were expert in ſhooting, and fighting with the left hand. The field was fought neere to Gaba, wherein the Beniamites put the Iſraelites to flight, who were ſlaine to the number of 22000. & more of them had beene ſlaughtered that day, had not the night ſodainly ouertaken them and ended the skirmiſh. Thus did the Beniamites ioyfully returne vnto their Cities, & the Iſraelites were diſcomforted thorow their vnexpected calamitie. The next day they once more renewed the battell, and the Beniamites had the vpper hand once again: ſo that the Iſraelites loſt eighteene thouſand men more, and by that meane forſooke their campe thorow feare, & retired to Bethel, which was not farre off from the place. The day after they faſted, and beſought God (by the mediation of Phinees the high Prieſt) that it would pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath againſt thē, and that contenting himſelfe with the two ouerthrowes which he had ſent them, he would now at laſt both giue them victory and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promiſed them by the prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they diuided their army into two parts, and laid the one thereof in ambuſh neere vnto the Citie. In the meane time (whileſt the other halfe that made head against the Beniamites, retired themselues, to the intent their enemies should assault them) the Beniamites sodainly issued, and set vpon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (vnder purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemy insisted: so that all they likewise, who through age and weaknes were left in the City, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawne far enough from the City, the Hebrewes staied, made head, and fought against them. Then gaue they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who sodainly issuing out together, rushed in vpon their enemies with a huge crie. Who seeing themselues so sodainly surprized, knew not what to doe, but retiring thēselues into certaine Baricadoes, they defended themselues with arrowes, but all of them were slaine, except it were sixe hundreth: who making head, and closely filletted and embattelled together, thrust themselues desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this meanes escaped they into the mountaines hard by, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of twenty fiue thousand or thereabouts were slaine. And the Israelites burned Gaba vtterly, and slew both the women and children. They exercised no lesse iustice on the other cities of Beniamin (so much were they fleshed and transported with fury.) And for that Iabes (a Citie of Galaad) would not ioyne with them in battell against the Beniamites, they sent twelue thousand chosen men out of their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might beare armes, with their wiues and children, except foure hundreth virgins. So much griefe and fury had they conceiued through the accident that chanced to this woman, and the despight they had conceiued against the Beniamites for prouoking them vnto armes: which furie when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselues, reputing themselues to be depriued of one tribe: And although they thought them iustly oppressed in battell (by reason they had offended against the lawes of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalfe of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and reuoked those sixe hundreth that were fled, and held a certaine rocke in the desart which is called Rhoa. The Embassadors complained not onely for that the warre had extinguished them, but also for the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they preuailed so much, that they bare their crosse and losse with lesse griefe, and they came vnto them and besought them that they would not giue sentence of the totall extinctiō of the tribe of Beniamin. We grant you (said they) the reuenues of your whole tribe, and as much bootie as you may driue away. But they acknowledging their iniustice, and that they were condemned by the iust iudgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe, and the Israelites gaue them in marriage those foure hundreth virgins of Iabes: and for the rest (which were two hundreth) they deliberated with themselues how they might prouide them of wiues, to the intent they might haue issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their warre it was decreed by an oath, that none of them might match his daughter with any of the tribe of Beniamin; there were some of them that thought good that the oath might be suspensed withall (by reason it was grounded vpon wrath, and not on iudgement) alleadging further, that they should doe nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might saue a tribe which was in danger vtterly to be extinct: That periuries were dangerous and noysome, not at such time as they are inforced by constraint, but when they are practized with an intent to doe euill. But when as the Elders reclaimed here-against (abhorring the mention of periury) there arose vp a certaine man amongst them, that said he had a policie, whereby without breach of oath the Beniamites might light vpon wiues. And being commanded by the Senate to expresse the same, we haue a custome euery yeere (said he) to assemble and keepe a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we haue both our wiues and daughters: as many of these as they can rauish, let the Beniamites lay hold of, without reproofe (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by vs) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require reuenge, we will say that they are in the fault who haue negligently kept their daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Beniamites, for that we had too much already vsed and abused the same towards them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Beniamites to rauish and violently take to themselues wiues amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Beniamites (of whom we haue spoken (came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush neere vnto the Citie (amongst the vines and other thickets, and close places, in which they might hide themselues to surprize the Damsels.) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wantoned on their way: but the yong mē breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (beeing scattered and diuided here and there) and after they had married them, they departed home to labour their land, and began to studie anew

Thus the tribe of Beniamin (which was wel-nigh vtterly exterminated) was reſtored to his former dignity after this manner, by the wiſedome of the Iſraelites: and it incontinently flouriſhed and encreaſed in a little time, as well in number of men as in all other things. The Iſraelites about this time hauing forgotten the exerciſe of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Chanaanites (in contempt of that nation) raiſed forces, not for that they were affraide of their owne eſtates, but to the intent that ouerlopping the Hebrewes with ſome memorable ouerthrow, they might more ſecurely inhabit their Cities thereafter: and conſpiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and ioyning to them certaine chariots) they drew Aſcalon and Acharon (two cities within the lot of Iuda) into their confederacie, and diuers other Cities of the champaine countrey: ſo as they of Dan were driuen into the mountaines, hauing no place in the champaine where they might peaceably inhabit; who (for that neither in warre they were able to confront them, neither had ſufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) ſent fiue men of their tribe into the champaine countrey and Midland, to ſpie if they could finde any place that were fit and conuenient for them to eſtabliſh and fixe their colonies in. Theſe trauelled a daies iourney not farre from the mountaine of Libanus, and more lower then are the ſources of Iordan, bordering vpon the great plaine of the citie of Sidon. For hauing once forſaken the obſeruation of their ordinances, they ſuffered themſelues to be deuoured in pleaſures, liuing according to their owne appetites: ſo that they gorged and glutted themſelues with thoſe vices, which were moſt of all accuſtomed and vſuall amongſt the Chanaanites. Iudg. 18. The tribe of Dan oppreſſed by the Chanaanites. How the people of Iſrael by reaſon of their wickedneſſe, were by God deliuered to the ſeruitude of the Aſſyrians.

FOR this cauſe the wrath of God was kindled againſt them, in ſuch ſort, as (through their negligence) they loſt the good which they had gotten by infinite trauell. For Schiſart king of the Aſſyrians leuied an army againſt them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or compoſition, tooke diuers of them priſoners; and brought their city vnder his ſubiection. Diuers alſo willingly ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, (through the feare they had conceiued) and they payed tributes exceeding their powers, enduring all kinde of outrage for the ſpace of eight yeeres, after which they were deliuered by theſe means following. Iudg. 3. The Iſraelites oppreſſed by Schiſart.

Their liberty reſtored by CENIZVS.

A Certaine man of the tribe of Iuda called Cenizus, a man of execution and of braue courage, was aduertiſed by a voice from heauen, that he ſhould not permit the Iſraelites in that ſort to be reduced into ſo extreme neceſſity, without taking care for them, but that he ought to aduenture himſelfe to ſet them at liberty. For which cauſe, calling vnto him ſome few companions of his perils, who were diſcontented with their preſent eſtate, and deſired a change, he firſt of all diſcomfited the garriſon which Schiſart had placed ouer them: and ſo much was he furthered with his firſt ſucceſſe, that the number of his followers increaſed more & more, ſo that they ſeemed ſufficient to equall the enemy in open field: whereupon encountring him in one battaile, they ouercame him, and recouered their libertie; and the reſt of the ſcattered and confuſed army retired themſelues toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect giuen proofe of his valour, he receiued the gouernment at the peoples hands, and exerciſed the office of Iudge fortie yeeres, at the end whereof he died. Ibidem. Cenizus or as the holy Scripture ſpeakes, his ſonne Athniel raigned eight yeeres.

How the people were againe made ſubiect to the Moabites, and how by IODES they were exempt from ſeruitude.

The yeere of the world, 2526. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1438.

AFTER whoſe death (the gouernment and ſeat being void) the affaires of the Iſraelites began again to fall to ruine, and the rather for that they neither yeelded due honor vnto God, neither obedience to the lawes: whence it came to paſſe, that Eglon king of the Moabites (ſeeing the diſorder of their policy) ſet thē at nought, ſo that he waged war againſt them, and ouercame them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater forecaſt then any of his predeceſſors, he fought againſt them and weakned their forces, and conſtrained them to pay tribute.

Hedio & Ruſſinus, chap. 8. Iudg. 3. Eglon king of the Moabites conquereth the Iſraelites.

The yeere of the world, 2534. before Chriſts birth, 1430.

This man (tranſlating his court to Iericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no meanes whereby he might vexe and moleſt the people: ſo that they liued for the ſpace of 18. yeeres in great miſerie. But God (being mooued with their calamities, and ſupplications) deliuered them from their intolerable thraldome after this manner: Iodes the ſonne of Gera of the tribe of Beniamin (a yong man, both addreſſed by valour of minde, and ſtrength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Iericho. This man inſinuated himſelfe into Eglons familiaritie, and by preſents and gifts entertained and courted him in ſuch ſort, as he was well beloued and eſteemed amongſt all thoſe courtiers that were neereſt about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certaine preſents vnto the King (attended by two of his houſhold ſeruants) he ſecretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at ſuch time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid-ſummer and mid-day likewiſe; whereby the watch was growne the more careleſſe and ſlothfull, partly by reaſon of the heate, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The yong man therefore offering his preſents vnto Eglō (who at that time diſported himſelfe in a certaine ſummer chamber) began to diſcourſe with him. Now they were both alone (by reaſon that the king reſoluing to talke familiarly with Iodes, had ſent away his guard, and ſate him downe in a ſeate:) but Iodes fearing, leſt falling to ſtab home enough, he ſhould not giue him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to riſe, telling him that he had a dreame to report vnto him by the commandement of God. Whereat he reioycing very much, leapt from his ſeate; whereupon Iodes ſtabd him to the heart: and leauing the poynard ſticking in his wound, he eſcaped and locked the doore after him; the guard making no noiſe at all, ſuppoſing that the king had laid him downe to reſt. But Iodes giuing priuate notice hereof to them of Iericho, offered himſelfe to be their leader in the recouery of their former liberty: who (willingly accepting thereof) preſently tooke armes, & ſent trumpets to publiſh the ſame thorow the whole country: (for after that maner were they wont to aſſemble the people.) They that were about Eglon, were wholly ignorant of that which hapned: but about the euen-tide (fearing leſt ſome miſhap had befalne him) they entred into the place where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly aſtoniſhed, ſo as they knew not what to doe. For before they had aſſembled their forces together, the Iſraelites fiercely charged them, and ſome they killed inſtantly; the reſt that were ten thouſand in number, betooke themſelues to flie, vnder hope to recouer their countrey of Moab: but the Iſraelites (hauing before that, laide and fortified the paſſages of Iordan) purſued them and ſlew them: ſo that diuers of them periſhed in the Ferry, and not one of them remained that eſcaped their hands. By this meanes the Iſraelites were deliuered from the ſeruitude of the Moabites: and for this cauſe Iodes was aduanced to the gouernment of the people. Finally, after he had liued for the ſpace of foureſcore yeeres, he died. A man (beſides the act of late rehearſed) worthy of praiſe in all other things. How the Iſraelites were brought vnder the ſubiection of the Chanaanites, and ranſommed from ſeruitude by BARAC.

BVT the Iſraelites (in no ſort reclaimed or reconciled by their forepaſſed calamities) fell againe into their former impietie and diſobedience: and before they had ſufficiently ſhaken off the ſeruitude of the Moabites, were ſubiected vnto Iabin king of the Chanaanites. This man kept his reſidence imperiall at Aſor (a Citie ſituate on the lake of Sachonites) he

A he had in pay thirtie thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe: and beſides theſe, he had three thouſand warlike Chariots. Ouer all this huge Armie commanded Siſares, (an eſpeciall man amongſt the Kings fauourites) who encountring with the Iſraelites, brought their affaires into ſo deſperate an eſtate, that they willingly (for their owne ſecuritie ſake) accepted ſeruitude, and payed tribute, (whereunto they were enforced, through the auſteritie of their ſubjection, almoſt for the ſpace of twentie yeeres, not daring to lift vp their heads) all which fell vpon them by the will of God, to the end he might puniſh the too great contumacie and ingratitude of that Nation. Who at length repenting themſelues, and acknowledging the cauſe of their calamities, (namely, that it proceeded from the contempt of their Lawes) they repaired to a certaine Propheteſſe, called Debora, (which name in the Hebrew Tongue ſignifieth a Bee) beſeeching her, that by her prayers B ſhe would endeuour to prouoke God vnto mercie (to the intent, he ſhould not ſuffer them ſo to be oppreſſed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compaſſion on them) granted them helpe, and appointed Barac to be their Gouernour (a man of the Tribe of Nepthali, whoſe name ſignifieth Lightning.) Debora therefore ſending for Barac, commandeth him to pick out and muſter ten thouſand choſen men, and lead them forth againſt the enemie; alledging, that they were ſufficient to obtaine the victorie which God had promiſed by the Oracle. But Barac denying to vndertake the Gouernment, except ſhe alſo would adminiſter the ſame with him; ſhe mooued therewith, ſpake thus: Wilt thou (ſaid ſhe) ſurrender the Dignitie which God hath giuen thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuſe it. Whereupon leuying ten thouſand men, they pitched their Tents neere to the mountaine of Itabyr. Siſara at that time (according as the King C had commanded him) preſently marched out to meet them, and encamped himſelfe not farre from the enemie. But Barac and the reſt of the Iſraelites (being terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Debora, who commanded them, that very day to enter and vndertake the battaile; aſſuring them, that the victorie ſhould be theirs, and that God would both aſſiſt and helpe them. Whereupon they charged the enemie, and there ſuddenly fell a ſtorme of Raine, mixed with Haile, which the Winde droue againſt the faces of the Chanaanites, and tooke away their ſight, making thoſe that carried Darts, and ſuch as ſerued with the Sling, vnprofitable in their ſeruice; the Targettiers likewiſe hauing their hands benummed with cold, could ſcarcely wield their ſwords. But the Tempeſt beating on the backs of the Iſraelites, not onely wrought them leſſe offence, but made them alſo more forward (being whetted thereunto by the manifeſt D ſigne of Gods fauour and preſence.) Whereupon diſarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battaile, they made a great ſlaughter of them; ſo as part of them fell by the weapons of the Iſraelites, the reſt were ouer-run by their own horſemen and Chariots. Siſara alſo, as ſoone as he ſaw his ſouldiers turne their backs, leaping from his Chariot, fled away haſtily, till at laſt he arriued in the Tent of a woman of Cenetis, called Iael; who being deſired by him to conceale and hide him, entertained him: and whereas he required Drinke, ſhe gaue him ſowre Milke; which when he had ouer-greedily drunke, he fell aſleepe: and whileſt he ſo lay buried in his ſlumbers, Iael tooke a Mallet, and droue an yron Nayle thorow his Temples, and faſtned him to the Pauement. And anon after, when Baracs ſouldiers came vnto her, ſhe ſhewed him vnto them, in ſuch manner as he was nayled. And thus a woman, according as Debora had fore-told, was the author of this E victorie. But Barac leading his Armie to Aſor, ſlew Iabin, that came out againſt him: And hauing ſlaine the King, and leuelled the Citie with the ground, he gouerned the Iſraelites for the ſpace of fortie yeeres.

And when as they continued theſe their incurſions for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres, they compelled the Iſraelites to forſake the Champaine, and flye vnto the Mountaines: who digging them Dennes and Houſes vnder the Earth, kept all that ſecretly hidden, which they had reſerued and conueyed from the furie of the enemie. How GEDEON deliuered the Iſraelites.

ABOVT that time, Gedeon (the ſonne of Ioaſue, one of the chiefeſt of the Tribe of Manaſſes) ground certaine ſheaues of Corne, which he had ſecretly conueyed into his Preſſe: for he durſt not bring them openly, for feare the enemie ſhould haue eſpyed him. To him appeared there a Viſion, in the forme of a young man, which ſaid vnto him, That he was happie, and beloued of God: and that a certaine ſigne of his good hap ſhould be, that he ſhould vſe his Preſſe in ſtead of his Grange; willing him to be of good courage, and to endeauour himſelfe to recouer his Countries libertie. Gedeon anſwered, That it was impoſſible; by reaſon, that the Tribe whereof he was deſcended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and feeble, to thinke on affaires of ſo great conſequence. But God promiſed him to ſupply his neceſſities, in whatſoeuer he held himſelfe deficient; and aſſured him (vnder his conduct) that he would giue the Iſraelites the victorie. Theſe things Gedeon communicated with certaine young men; who willingly beleeuing the Oracle, anſwered, That for the preſent they had ten thouſand ſouldiers in a readineſſe, moſt readie to attempt any thing, in regard of their libertie. But God appeared to Gedeon in a Dreame, and told him, That men naturally were louers of themſelues, and haters of thoſe who were excellent in vertues: ſo that if there grow any queſtion of victorie, they forget God, and appropriate the ſame vnto themſelues, ſaying, That they are many, and all valiant men at Armes. To the end therefore that they may conceiue his handy-worke in their deliuerance, he counſelled him, That about the mid-time of the day, at ſuch time as the heat was moſt vehement, he ſhould conduct his Armie to the Riuer; and that being there, he ſhould diligently obſerue thoſe that bowed themſelues to drinke, which he might eſteeme for men of valour; but all thoſe that dranke haſtily, and with noyſe, ſhould be marked as men fearefull, and afraid of the enemie. Gedeon did according as God had commanded him: and there were found three hundreth men that lifted water to their mouthes with their hands, with feare and trouble. God willed him, that hee ſhould aſſayle the enemie with thoſe three hundreth; promiſing, that hee would giue him the victorie. About this time were they encamped vpon the banke of Iordan, readie to paſſe the Foord the next morrow. But Gedeon was ſore troubled, by reaſon that God had before-times told him, that he ſhould aſſayle the enemie by night. But God willing to deliuer him of his feare, commanded him to take one of his ſouldiers with him, and enter the Camp of the Madianites; aſſuring him, that he ſhould be both aduiſed and encouraged by themſelues. Whereunto hee obeyed; and for his better aſſurance, hee tooke with him one of his ſeruants. Now as hee drew nigh a certaine Tent, hee perceiued, that they that were within the ſame, were awake, and that one of them with a lowd voyce told his companion the Dreame which that night he had had; which Gedeon ouer-heard, and thus it was: Him ſeemed, that he ſaw a Barly Cake (ſo lothſome, as no man would feed vpon the ſame) which rowled thorow the Campe, which firſt ouerthrew the Kings Tent, & afterwards the Tents of all his ſouldiers; alledging, that this Viſion ſignified the loſſe of the whole Armie. Annexing to this his allegation, the reaſons that induced him thereunto; namely, that of all ſorts of Corne, Barly is moſt contemptible: and amongſt all the Nations of Aſia, there were not this day any people to be found more diſgraced and contemned then the Iſraelites; and that in this reſpect, they reſembled Barly. That which at this day ſeemeth to encourage them, is Gedeon, and the Armie that is with him: and whereas this Cake turned to ouerthrow our Tents, I feare me leſt God hath giuen ſome ſigne of victorie vnto Gedeon. Gedeon (hauing ouer-heard all theſe things) conceiued good hope, and tempted with a valiant heart, preſently commanded his domeſticall ſeruants to arme themſelues, diſcourſing vnto them the Viſion which appeared to their enemie. Whereupon they ſpeedily prepared themſelues at his commandement, ruminating and hammering in their mindes vpon that diſcourſe which he had declared vnto them. About the latter Watch of the Night, Gedeon led forth his Armie, and diuided them into three Bands, and in euery Band he put a hundreth men: all of theſe bare in their hands emptie Pots, in which were hidden burning Torches, in ſuch ſort, as the enemie might not diſcouer them, when they ſallyed out. Moreouer, they bare Rams-hornes in their right hands, which they vſed in ſtead of Trumpets. The aduerſe Armie tooke vp much ground (by reaſon

The Hebrewes hauing had inſtructions from their Captaine what they ought to doe, at ſuch time as they approached neere vnto their enemies, and the ſigne of the battaile was giuen, they ſounded their Hornes, and brake their Pots, and with their flaming Lights brake into the enemies Campe, crying, Victorie, Victorie, by the aſſiſtance of God, and the ſtrength of Gedeon. Hereupon ſuch a trouble and feare ſurprized the enemie, as they lay aſleepe, (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue) that few of them fell by the Hebrewes Sword, but they themſelues ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in Language.) For confuſedly encountring one another, they maſſacred all thoſe that encountred them, ſuppoſing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this ſlaughter, and Gedeons victorie, came vnto the eares of the reſt of the Iſraelites, they armed themſelues, and purſued and ouertooke the enemie, (being intangled and circumuented in certaine places, made vnpaſſable through many running brookes) ſo that being enuironed on euery ſide, they were all of them put to the Sword; amongſt which were their two Kings, Oreb and Zeb. The reſt of the Chiefetaines trouping onward with their ſouldiers, to the number of eighteene thouſand, or thereabouts, encamped not farre from the Iſraelites: but Gedeon was no wayes aſtoniſhed hereat, but purſuing them valiantly with his whole Armie, and charging them deſperately, he diſcomfited all the reſt of the enemies, & led away captiues thoſe Chiefetaines which remained, namely, Zeeb, and Ezarbon. There died in this battell of the Madianites, and Arabians, their allyes, to the number almoſt of ſixſcore thouſand: beſides that, the Hebrewes tooke an ineſtimable prey of Gold, Siluer, Apparell, Camels, and other Horſes. But Gedeon returning into his countrey, Ephraim ſlew the reſt of the Kings of the Madianites. Neuertheleſſe, the Tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with his happie execution, reſolued to make warre againſt him; accuſing him, for that he had not made them priuie of his ſtratageme intended againſt the enemie. But Gedeon being a temperate man, and endowed with all kind of vertue, gaue them this modeſt anſwer, That it was not he that by his owne direction had ſet vpon the enemie, but that it was Gods onely handy-worke: notwithſtanding, that the victorie was no leſſe theirs, then his or thoſe his followers, that atchieued the enterprize. And with theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he no leſſe profited the Hebrewes thereby, then by his valiant actions; by reaſon, that he deliuered them from a ciuill warre, whereinto they had fallen, if his diſcretion had not preuented it. This Tribe was puniſhed for this outrage offered to ſo noble a perſonage, as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon labouring to diſmiſſe himſelfe of the Gouernment, was forced to continue the ſame, and ruled the Iſraelites for the ſpace of fortie yeeres, doing juſtice to euery one that required the ſame at his hands, and deciding their controuerſies (ſo irreuocable & certaine was that eſteemed which he had decreed.) Finally, he died when he was very old, and was buried in the countrey of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

GEDEON had ſeuentie lawfull ſonnes, begotten on diuers lawfull Wiues. He had likewiſe one Baſtard by his Concubine Druma, which he called Abimelech: who, after the deceaſe of his father, retyred himſelfe to Sichem, where his mother was borne. There (aſſiſted with money by his mothers kindred, and backed by them who were men reſolute, and addreſſed to all facinorous actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlew all his brethren (except Iothan, who by good hap ſaued himſelfe by flight.) Now, when as Abimelech had once obtained the Tyrannie, he ruled all things according to his luſt, and neglected the Ordinances & preſcript of Law, hating all thoſe that in any ſort were maintainers of equitie. One day therefore, whileſt there was a ſolemne feaſt held at Sichem, (whereunto the whole people were vſually wont to reſort) Iothan his brother (who, as we ſaid, ſaued himſelfe by flight) climbing the mountaine of Garizim, which ouer-hangeth the Citie of Sichem, with a lowd voyce (which might eaſily be ouer-heard by the people, and in a generall ſilence of the whole multitude) hee beſought them, that they would heare him in a few words; and when as they intentiuely liſtned with a greater and more reuerend ſilence, he told them, in times paſt the Trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeake, after the manner of men; and that (in a certaine aſſembly, wherein they were to conſult of their Gouernment) they beſought the Fig-tree to accept the ſoueraigntie ouer them; which when ſhe refuſed, and and pleaded in his owne behalfe, that he was contented with that honor which he reaped by the meanes of the fruit which he bare, and sought not further. The Trees surceased not to seeke another Prince, resoluing with themselues to ascribe that honor to the Vine; which, in as many words as the Fig-tree, refused the same; and no lesse did the Oliue-tree. At last they preferred their humble protestation of election to the great Bramble, (whose Wood is good for firing) he answered, If you doe vnfainedly require me for your King, repose your selues vnder my shadow; but if you intend Treasons against me, there shall a fire issue from me, and consume you. These things (said Iothan) I report vnto you, not to mooue you to laughter, but for that you (hauing receiued many benefits at the hands of Gedeon) suffer Abimelech, who in spirit differeth nothing from the fire, to vsurpe the Princedome, after the slaughter of my brethren. When he had spoken after this manner, he departed, and for three yeeres space liued hidden amongst the mountaines, flying the power of Abimelech. Neyther did there many dayes ouer-passe, but that the Sichemites (being mooued with compassion and just reuenge, in respect of the murther which was committed vpon the sonnes of Gedeon) banished Abimelech out of their Citie, & the whole Tribe. Whereupon he resolued to doe some mischiefe to both the Citie and Citizens. And for that their Vintage was at hand, and they durst not gather the fruit, fearing lest they should receiue some injurie at the hands of Abimelech, by good hap about that time a certaine Prince, called Gaal, retyred thither with a troupe of souldiers, and his kindred: Him did the Sichemites beseech, that he would grant them a Conuoy, whilest they had gathered in their Harueſt. Which requeſt of theirs being accepted by Gaal, they issued out with their forces, being seconded by him and his, and securely brought in their fruits: and feasting one with another in companies, they were so bold as to scoffe at Abimelech, and the chiefest of his followers. And the chiefest of those strangers among them, that came into their Citie to their assistance, surprized by Ambuscado diuers of Abimelechs people, and slew them. But Zebel, one of the Sichemites, and Abimelechs Oast, signified vnto him by a messenger, how Gaal incited the people against him; inuiting him to lye in wait for him neere about the Citie, promising him that he would bring Gaal thither, to the end that he might easily reuenge him of that injurie which his enemie had offred him. Which done, he promised to worke so wisely, that he would reconcile him to the peoples fauour againe. And when as Abimelech had chosen a place fit to lye in ambush, and Gaal, with Zebel, too carelesly liued and walked in the suburbs, at length he suddenly espying certaine armed men, cryed out to Zebel, That he had discouered the enemie; whereunto Zebel replyed, That they were the shadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing more neere vnto them, and perceiuing apparantly who they were, answered Zebel, That they were no shadowes, but ambushes of men. Whereunto Zebel replyed, Doest thou not object cowardize to Abimelech? why therefore shewest thou not thy great valour, in fighting with him? Gaal confusedly amazed, assayled the souldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, certaine of his followers were slaine, and he himselfe fled into the Citie (giuing example vnto the rest to follow him.) Hereupon Zebel labored, that Gaal might be expulsed out of the Citie; accusing him of his cowardly encounter with the souldiers of Abimelech. Now, when as the same Abimelech had afterwards gotten certaine intelligence, that the Sichemites would issue anew to gather their Vintage, he layd an ambush neere vnto the Citie. And no sooner were they issued, but that the third part of his troupes surprized and seized the Gates, to cut them off from their returne, that thought to re-enter; the rest ranne after those that were scattered here and there: so that there was a great slaughter on euery side; and the Citie was ruinated euen vnto the very foundations, (for they could not withstand the siege) and they sowed Salt vpon the ruines thereof. Thus perished all they that were in the Citie of Sichem. But they that escaped thorow the countrey, and had auoided the danger, assembled and fortified themselues vpon a strong Rocke, and there incamped, and began to defence the same. But as soone as Abimelech had notice of their intention, he hasted thither with his forces, and enuironed the place with Faggots of drie Wood, (carrying them thither in his owne person, and encouraging thereby those of his Armie to doe the like) so that the Rocke was incontinently compassed with Wood: whereunto he set fire round about, and in an instant it flamed, and burned vehemently; so as none of them were saued, but all of them perished, with their wiues and children, to the number of fifteene hundred men, besides many other of the weaker sort. This calamitie hapned to the Sichemites (in so grieuous a measure, that there is not any griefe sufficient to deplore it) were it not, that that so horrible misfortune fell vpon them, by reason of their ingratitude they had shewed to so vpright a Iudge, and so gracious a Benefactor. Abimelech allayed the courage of the Israelites, by this encounter & conquest of the Sichemites, and gaue sufficient testimonie that he aspired more higher, and that he would neuer terminate terminate his violence vntill he had vtterly extinguished them. He therefore led forth his army against the Tibeans and their City, which he tooke: but in that towne there was a great tower, whither all the people had retired themselues, and whilest he prepared himselfe to besiege the same, and approached likewise neere vnto the gates, a certaine woman cast a piece of a milstone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cause that Abimelech called at that time for his Squier, commanding him to dispatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that hee died by the hands of a woman. His Squier did according as he had commanded him, and reuenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the cruelty he had committed against his brethren, and the tyranny executed vpon the Sichemites; on whom all these misfortunes fell according as Iothan had foretold them. As soone as Abimelech was slaine, all the armie was dispersed, and euery one returned vnto his dwelling place: and Iair the Galeadite of the tribe of Manasses tooke vpon him the gouernment. Amongst other conditions of this man, these were of the greatest note, that he was rich, and had thirty worthy sonnes, all expert vpon horse-backe, and exercised the magistracie in the countrey of Galaad: hee (after he had gouerned the people for the space of twenty yeers) died, when he was very old, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a city of Galaad. From this time forward the policy and estate of the Hebrewes grew more and more disordered, and the lawes began to be neglected: Whence it came to passe that the Ammonites and Philistines (setting light by them) destroyed all their countrey with a great army, during which time they occupied all the land on this side Iordan, and so much were they heartned, as that they pressed further, and possessed the better part on the other side of the riuer, and conquered the same. Whereupon the Hebrewes being brought to more moderation by these their aduersities, had their recourse vnto God by prayers and sacrifices, requiring him that it might please him to moderate his wrath, and that hauing regard and respect to their supplication, he would be pleased to stay his heauy hand ouer them. This submission of theirs preuailed with God, who inclined himselfe to assist them. Whilest therefore the Ammonites led their armie into Galaad, they of the countrey arose to meete and fight with them, being disfurnished of a Gouernour to conduct them. Now there was a certaine man called Ieptha, of great estimation, as well for the vertue of his ancestors, as his owne particular valour (the rather for that he had beene trained and maintained in warlike seruice.) To him they sent a messenger, requiring him that he would assist them; promising him, that he should continue in the gouernment during the terme of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their request, but reprochfully obiected against them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reason he was not their brother by the same mother, but a stranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his Paramour, they had driuen him out of their family, setting light by him, by reason of his base birth) yet notwithstanding he had liued in Galaad, receiuing all those into wages which came vnto him, of what place soeuer they were. But after they had besought him, and sworne vnto him that he should continue in the gouernment, hee became their Generall in warre, and speedily (prouiding and foreseeing whatsoeuer was necessary) he encamped himselfe neere vnto Maspha, and sent Embassadours to the Ammonites, accusing them for inuading a countrey that belonged not vnto them. They contrariwise blamed the Israelites, for that they were fled like fugitiues from Ægypt, and commanded that the Israelites should depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their ancient patrimony.) Ieptha answered that they had no reason to accuse their ancestors, in respect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to giue them thankes, for that they had permitted them to enioy the country of Ammon, by reason it was in Moses power to haue commanded the same. In a word, they were resolued not to forsake the countrey which God had both giuen and purchased for them, and which they had held in their possession for the space of three hundred yeeres, alledging that he would defend the same against them by dint of sword: with these words dismissed he the Embassadours of the Ammonites. Then besought he God that it might please him to grant him victory: and he made a vow that if he returned vnto his house whole and in safetie, he would offer vp in sacrifice, that of his which he should first meete withall in his returne: whereupon encountring the enemy he defeated him, and pursued him, killing those that fled continually till he came to the City of Maniathen. Then entring the countrey of the Ammonites; he destroyed diuers Cities, and led away a great prey, and deliuered and ransomed diuers slaues of that nation, who had endured that seruitude for the space of eighteene yeeres. But as hee returned homeward, he fell into such an inconuenient, as was no wayes answerable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eighteene yeeres) came out to meete him: whereupon resoluing and melting melting himſelfe into teares, he began to checke her, for that ſo haſtily ſhee had iſſued forth to meet him, by reaſon he had conſecrated the firſt thing he met withall to God. But this accident was no wayes diſpleaſant vnto the Damſell, but that ſhe willingly dyed, both for the victorie of her father, and the deliuerance of her brethren. She therefore beſought her father, that it would pleaſe him to grant her two moneths, before ſhe ſhould be ſacrificed, to the end ſhe might lament her youth, with her companions: and that, after that terme, her father might acquit himſelfe of that Vow which he had made. Ieptha granted her the terme and time ſhe had limitted: which being expired, he ſacrificed his Daughter for a burnt-Offering. The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would haue ſent out men of warre againſt him, (by reaſon he had not communicated his enterprize againſt the Ammonites with them, but had onely reſerued the prey, and vſurped the honour of the execution to himſelfe) whereunto he anſwered firſt of all, That being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both hee and his were aſſayled by Warre; and had, beſides that, alſo beene required to giue them their aſſiſtance: wherunto they had anſwered very faintly, and being requeſted would not be preſent. Secondly, he told them that that which they vndertooke, was both vnlawfull and moſt wicked, in that not daring to confront or aſſaile the enemie, they made no bones to ſet vpon and aſſault their owne brothers and familiars, threatning them that if they gouerned not themſelues, he would (by the aſſiſtance of God) be reuenged on them. But theſe words of his were both neglected & deſpiſed, ſo that he was forced to arme himſelfe againſt them, and with an hoſt of men ſent from Galaad, he made a great ſlaughter, partly in purſuing thoſe that fled, partly alſo in preuēting their paſſage who fled vnto Iordan: and the number of thoſe that were ſlaine, amounted to forty thouſand or thereabouts. But after that Ieptha had gouerned ſixe yeers, he deceaſed, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was borne, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his deceaſe, Apſan tooke vpon him the gouernment. He was of the tribe of Iuda, of the city of Bethleem, and had ſixtie children, thirtie males and thirty females, which he left all aliue and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy either recitall or memory, during the ſpace of his ſeuen yeers gouernment: he was buried in his country. Elon a Zabulonite his ſucceſſor differed nothing from him in the ſame, and during the terme of ten yeers wherein he gouerned, he atchieued nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the ſonne of Elon (of the tribe of Ephraim of the City of Pharathon) was declared ſoueraigne Iudge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicity in his children (by reaſon that the eſtate was in peace and ſecurity, and that hee exploited nothing worthy glory) hee had forty ſonnes, who had thirty other children, and he rode accompanied with theſe ſeuenty, who were all of them expert on horſebacke. Hee left them all aliue, and died when he was very old, and was magnifically buried in Pharathon.

CHAP. X.

Of SAMSONS valour, and how many miſchiefes he did vnto the Philiſtines.

AFTER his death, the Philiſtines had the vpper hand ouer the Iſraelites, and exacted tribute from them for the ſpace of forty yeeres. From that miſery were they ranſomed after this manner: Manoach an excellent man, and one of the chiefeſt of the tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely eſteemed Prince amongſt them, had a wife moſt famous for her beauty, and excellent amongſt all other of that time; yet had he no children by her; whereat he was very ſore diſpleaſed: and for this cauſe hee made his continuall prayers vnto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farme) beſeeching him that it might pleaſe his Maieſty, to grant him ſome lawfull heire and ſucceſſour (now the place whither they reſorted, was ſituate in a broad Plaine.) Furthermore he loued his wife ſo exceedingly, that hee almoſt doted on her, and for this occaſion he was extremely iealous of her. Whileſt thus the woman liued ſolitarily by her ſelfe, an Angell of God appeared vnto her in a viſion, promiſing her a goodly, faire and puiſſant ſonne, who denounced vnto her the pleaſant meſſage of the birth of her child, which God by his prouidence would beſtow vpon her, who ſhould be goodly and admirable in his forces, and vnder whom alſo (as ſoone as he ſhould attaine to mans eſtate) the Philiſtines ſhould endure many ouerthrowes: exhorting her not to cut his haire, commanding likewiſe likewiſe that he ſhould taſte no other drinke but water (becauſe that God had ſo commanded it:)and after he had finiſhed theſe ſayings,he departed according to the pleaſure of God. As ſoone as her husband returned home againe,ſhee told him all that which the Angell had ſaid vnto her, who was amazed at the beauty and greatneſſe of the young meſſenger, who appeared vnto her after ſo ſtrange a manner, as Manoach was almoſt ſpent with iealouſie and ſuſpicion (which ſuch a paſſion is woont to engender.) But ſhee deſirous to mitigate his diſcontent, and that diſtruſt which he had vainely and vnaduiſedly conceiued; beſought God that it might pleaſe him once more to ſend his Angell vnto her, to the intent that her husband might ſee him. Whileſt therefore they liued in this ſort out of towne,the Angel preſented himſelfe againe (through the grace of God) and appeared vnto the woman (being apart from her husband.) But ſhee beſought him to abide vntill ſuch time as ſhe had called her husband: which when ſhee had obtained,ſhe went and fetcht Manoach, who notwithſtanding was not deliuered of his ſuſpition: but required him that he would againe relate vnto him all that which he had ſignified to his wife. The Angell anſwered him,that it ſufficed that ſhe onely knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was,to the end that when his ſonne ſhould bee borne, hee might both giue him preſents, and preſent him thankes. The Angell anſwered, that he had no need thereof, by reaſon that he had not brought the good newes of the birth of his ſonne for any neceſſity that hee had. Manoach beſought him to ſtay and receiue ſome token of kindneſſe: but he would not conſent. Finally, being inſtantly preſſed to abide and receiue ſome gift: Manoach killed a kid, and commanded his wife to roſte the ſame. And when as all things were in readineſſe, the Angell commanded them to lay the bread and fleſh vpon a rocke without diſhes: which being done,he touched the fleſh with a wand which he bare in his hand, and ſuddenly a flaming fire conſumed both the bread, and fleſh; and the Angell was ſeene to aſcend vp into heauen in the ſmoake,as it were in a chariot. Manoach was affraid leſt ſome inconuenient ſhould happen vnto him, by reaſon that they had in that ſort ſeene God: but his wife recomforted him,by reaſon that God had appeared vnto them for their profit ſake. Anon after ſhe became big with childe,and obſerued all that which had beene commanded her, and when the infant was borne,ſhe called his name Samſon (which is as much to ſay, as ſtrong) who preſently endowed with an excellent beauty both of mind and body,vſing his haire vnſhorne, and ſobriety in his diet, he ſeemed to make ſhew in himſelfe of ſome propheticall and more then humane forwardneſſe.

Samſons birth. Iudg. 14.

It happened on a day that there was a ſolemnity celebrated in Thamna,a Citie of the Philiſtines, whither Samſon reſorted with his father and mother, and was ſurprized with the loue of one of the damſels of that place, requiring his father and mother that this maiden might be giuen him in marriage: which they refuſed to doe, alleadging that ſhee was not of the ſame linage that he was of, and that God would prouide him of a match to the good and profit of thoſe of his Nation: but in the end he preuailed ſo much,that he eſpouſed the maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her parents, it hapned one day, that being diſarmed, he met with a Lyon vpon the way, whom he graſped and ſtrangled with his hands; and hauing ſlaine him, he caſt the body of the beaſt into a wood not far diſtant from the high way. Another day,and at another time, returning in like ſort to the damſell, hee found a ſwarme of Bees which went and made their hony and habitation in the breſt of the ſame beaſt, and hee tooke three hony-combes which he carried with other preſents vnto his betrothed. After this,he inuited the Thamnites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they ſuſpected his forces) vnder colour to doe him honour, choſe out thirtie of their ſtrongeſt and valianteſt young men, whom in words they aſſigned for his companions, but in effect appointed for his guardians; to the end hee might not attempt any commotion at ſuch time as he had drunke deepely: and there was nothing intended but ſport, according as it is the cuſtome in other ſuch like occaſions. To whom Samſon ſaid, I will propoſe a queſtion vnto you, which if any one of you can reſolue, I will giue each of you a fine linnen ſhirt,and other veſtments in reward of your prudence. They being very deſirous both to be reputed wiſe,as alſo to gaine the reward which was propoſed,willed him to propound his queſtion:which he did in theſe tearmes: He that deuoureth all,and that of himſelfe is vnpleaſant to be fed vpon,hath brought forth a moſt pleaſant kind of fruit. They trauelled for the ſpace of three dayes to finde out the ſence thereof,but they could not: and therefore they required Samſons beſt-beloued, that ſhee would ſound the ſecrets thereof, and diſcloſe the ſame vnto them; which if ſhee failed to performe, they threatned to burne her to death. Samſon at the firſt (notwithſtanding all her flatteries and ſollicitations) denyed to tell it her: at laſt ſhee vrged him ſo inſtantly, and ſhed ſo many teares (telling him that if he did not expound the queſtion vnto her, that she would take it for a certaine signe that he hated her: that at last he told her what hapned with the Lyon which he had slaine, and how in him hee had the three hony-combes which hee brought vnto her: and (suspectlesse of either fraud or guile) he deciphered the whole story vnto her, and shee afterwards reported the same to those that had besought her in that behalfe. When as therefore the seuenth day was come wherein the question was to bee decided, they assembled themselues together about sunne-set, and said: There is nothing more irksome to meete withall then a Lyon, neither any thing more pleasant to taste, then hony: Whereunto Samson replyed, that there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for shee it is that hath reported my words vnto you. Notwithstanding all this, he deliuered that which he had promised them out of that booty, which he had taken from certaine Ascalonites, whom he encountred vpon the way. From that time forward hee forsooke this marriage, and the woman (the more to despite him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalfe first sollicited the marriage. Samson (beeing the more incensed by this iniury) resolued to reuenge himselfe both on her, and the whole nation: For which cause in the summer season (when the corne was ready to be reapt) hee tooke three hundreth foxes, to whose tayles he fastned flaming torches, and droue them into the Philistines fields of corne, consuming by this meanes all their haruest hope. The Philistines vnderstanding that Samson had done this, and conceiuing the reason that induced him to execute this action, sent their garrison to Thamna, and burnt this woman aliue with all her kinred, as the authors of that losse that had hapned vnto them. After that Samson had slaine diuers Philistines in the countrey, hee went and dwelt at Etam (which is a strong rocke in the tribe of Iuda.) For which cause the Philistines assailed that tribe, who certified them that there was no reason why they should suffer for those offences which were committed by Samson, and that in especiall, because they paied them tribute. The Philistines replied, that except they would not be maintainers of this act of iniustice, they should deliuer Samson vnto them. They therefore (desirous that the Philistines should haue no cause of quarrell against them) came vnto the rocke to the number of three thousand men, or thereabouts, and blamed Samson for those actions which hee dared to commit against the Philistines (a people that might endomage all the nation of the Hebrewes) alledging further that they came to the end to take, surprize and deliuer him into the Philistines hands, praying him to submit himselfe voluntarily to that their resolution. Samson made them sweare that they would doe him no further iniury, but deliuer him onely vnto their enemies, and that done, he descended from the rocke, surrendring himselfe to the hands of those of Iuda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliuer him to the Philistines. Now being arriued in a certaine place, which before that time had no name, and at this present is called the Maxilla, that is to say, a Iawe (by reason of the valour which Samson shewed in that place) and approaching neere the Philistines campe; shouting and reioycing in their presence, by reason that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them) Samson brake his bonds, and catching vp the iawe of an Asse which hee found at his feete, and marching foorth against the Philistines, he slewe and beat downe to the number almost of two thousand of them, putting all the rest to flight and confusion. Samson (becomming more elate after this execution then he ought to haue beene, and confessing not that it was done by the assistance of God, but attributing the same to his owne vertue) gloried, that with the iawe of an Asse he had partly slaine, and partly constrained the enemies both to feare and flie. But being seized with an exceeding thirst, hee acknowledged and confessed that mans force is of no force, and protested that all ought to be ascribed to God, who he besought that he would not be displeased with that which he had spoken, but that it might bee remitted, and himselfe deliuered from the present danger. Whereupon God heard his praiers, and caused a pleasant and aboundant fountaine to issue and spring from the foote of a rocke: for which cause Samson called the place Maxilla or Iaw, which name continueth euen vnto this day. After this battaile Samson set light by the Philistines, and went to Gaza where he soiourned in an Inne. The gouernours of the Citie vnderstanding of his arriuall, set men to keepe the gates, to the end hee might not depart without their knowledge. But Samson (beeing no waies ignorant of that which they intended against him) arose about midnight & carried away the gates, with the hinges and lockes and all the furniture of the same; and laying them on his shoulders, carried and cast them on the mountaine Hebron. Not long after that, hee transgressed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domesticall manner of liuing, conforming himselfe to the fashions of the Gentiles, which was the source and of-spring of all his ruine. For hee was surprized and intangled with the loue of one that was called Dalila (which was a common strumpet amongst the Philistines.) To her resorted the gouernours of the Philistines, Shee (conuerſing with him in drinking and keeping him company) tolde him that ſhee maruailed at his actions, and by ſubtill inſinuations practiſed to vnderſtand the manner and cauſe that made him ſo excellent in vertue. But Sampſon (that as yet was ſubtill, ſtaied and well gouerned) in countercheck of her craft anſwered her: that if he were tyed with ſeuen vine branches that were yong and pliant, hee ſhould become the moſt feebleſt amongſt men. Whereupon for that time ſhee contented her ſelfe; and hauing giuen notice thereof to the gouernours of the Philiſtines, ſhee had in her houſe certaine men of warre: then when he was drunke and a-

Which when ſhee had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Sampſon told her, that if ſhee pleighted his haire with a fillet, hee ſhould be weakned: and hauing experimented that alſo, ſhee found
C that it was falſe. Finally (for that a great misfortune attended vpon him) ſhee beſought him ſo much, that at laſt hee condeſcended to gratifie her, and ſpake to her after this manner: God hath care ouer mee, and I am by his eſpeciall prouidence bred and brought vp: for this cauſe I nouriſh this haire, for that God hath commanded me not to cut the ſame, becauſe my force ſhall endure and augment as long as theſe lockes ſhall endure and grow. Which when ſhee vnderſtood, ſhee ſhaued off his haire and betraied him to his enemies, whoſe forces at that time he was too feeble to reſiſt, who plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound: but in ſpace of time his haire grewe againe, and at ſuch time as the Philiſtines celebrated a publique feaſt (wherein the Princes and Peeres banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a houſe, the couer whereof was ſuſtained with two pillars) Sampſon was ſent for, and brought to the feaſt, to D the end they might mocke at him in the midſt of their feaſts and drunkenneſſe. But hee taking it more grieuouſly then all other the euils which hee indured, that hee might not reuenge himſelfe on thoſe that thus iniuriouſly did iniure him: hee wrought ſo much with the boy that led him, that he approched and tooke hold of the foreſaid pillars, telling him that hee had great neede to repoſe himſelfe, conſidering the trauell that he had ſuſtained. As ſoone therefore as he got holde on them, he ſhooke them in ſuch a ſort, as they were ouerturned, and the houſe fel vpon thoſe that were therein, who died to the number of three thouſand men: with theſe alſo died Sampſon, who finiſhed his daies in this ſort, after he had commanded ouer Iſrael for the ſpace of twenty yeeres:

AFTER the deceaſe of Sampſon, Eli the high Prieſt tooke vpon him the gouernment ouer the Iſraelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech vnable to endure
F the miſerie thereof, came from Bethleem a Citie of the tribe of Iuda to inhabit in the countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife, and Chelion and Maalon his ſons, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate ſucceſſe as might be deſired, he married his ſonnes to certaine daughters of the Moabites, Chelion vnto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten yeeres after, Elimelech and his ſonnes dyed, the one after the other. By which miſhappe Naomi being caſt into great ſorrow and deſtitute of their companie, whoſe deare familiarity ſhee had preferred before the loue of her countrey: changing her reſolution

(according to those occurrences that had happened her) shee determined to returne vnto her friends, by reason shee had receiued intelligence, that her countrey at that time was in goode-state. But her daughters in lawe could no wayes endure to bee separated from her, and will shee, nill shee, they would needes accompany her: but shee willing them a more happy marriage then that which they enioyed with her sonnes, and in all other things prosperity, and protesting vnto them that there was no ability in her to doe them good; shee besought them that they would stay in that place, and not (desiring to follow their wretched mother in lawe in an vncertaine euent) to lose the certaine pleasure and peaceable fruition of their countrey. These her perswasions tooke effect with Orpha: but Ruth (resolued in no sort to forsake her) attended on her mother in law (as an assured and future companion of whatsoeuer fortune should fal vpon her.) Now when as both of them were arriued in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinsman) entertained them in his house: and whereas the Citizens called her by the name of Naamis, she said vnto them, that it was more seemely for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue signifieth good hap, and Mara is as much to say as bitternesse.) Whereas then it was haruest time, Ruth by the permission of her mother, went out into the fields to gleane, and gather corne for her sustenance: and it fortuned that shee met by good hap in the fields with Boos, who came thither likewise not long after; who beholding her, inquired and questioned with the chiefe reaper as touching the woman. Now hee had a little before that time vnderstood by her, her whole estate; which he declared vnto his master, who gaue her thankes for the good affection which shee bare vnto her mother in lawe, and of the care shee had of her deceased sonne, whom Ruth had married, wishing her in effect all good fortune: and not suffering her to gleane, he permitted her to reape and to gather all that which shee might, commanding his master-reaper that he should no waies let her from taking whatsoeuer she pleased: giuing order likewise, that when the reapers should take their refection, they should giue her both meate & drinke. Now when as Ruth had receiued graine at their hands, shee reserued it for her mother in lawe, and came home at night and brought her the sheaues. In like manner Naomi had reserued a portion of certaine victuals for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had sent her. Vpon her returne Ruth reported vnto her all those words that Boos had said vnto her: and Naomi gaue her to vnderstand that Boos was of her kin, and that it might be that he was mooued by deuotion towards God to haue care of her. Some other daies after, Ruth issued againe with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings. And certaine dayes after (and about that time that they threshed barley) Boos came and slept on the floore: which when Naomi vnderstood, shee bethought her selfe of some subtill practice, whereby shee might make Ruth lie with him (presuming that it would bee a very good fortune for the yong woman, if they might growe in acquaintance together) for which cause she sent her to sleepe at his feete. Ruth (that made it a conscience to contradict her mother in lawe in whatsoeuer shee commanded her) repaired thither, and vpon her first arriuall Boos perceiued nothing (because he was fast asleepe:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was some body that lay fast by him, hee demanded what shee was: whereupon shee told him her name, requesting him as her master, that hee would permit her to repose in that place for that time. But early in the morning, before the seruants began to fall to their worke, hee commanded her to arise, and to take as much barley with her as shee could beare, to the end she might returne vnto her mother in lawe, before that any man might perceiue that shee had slept in that place (because it is wisedome to auoide slander, especially at such time when there is occasion offered for a man to speake ill.) Touching the rest (said hee) the matter standeth thus: Thou hast a kinsman (said hee) that is more neere thee in blood then I am; thou must enquire of him, if it bee his pleasure to take thee to his wife: and if hee saith that hee liketh thee, thou must then necessarily submit vnto him: but if hee refuse thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the lawe intendeth. Now when she had reported these newes vnto her mother in law, shee gathered courage and conceiued hope that Boos would take care of her. Thereupon Boos came into the Citie about noone-daies, and called a councell of the elders, and sent for Ruth and his kinsman, to whom in person hee spake thus: Doest thou possesse the heritage of Abimelech and his successors? Who when he had publikely declared that hee was seized thereof in right of proximity, according to the ordinance of the lawe: Boos replyed, Thou must not (saith hee) onely obserue the lawes in part; but thou must precisely execute them according as they are. For, behold heere a yong woman, whom it behoueth thee to marry according to the lawe, if thou wilt bee inheritor of his possessions. But hee surrendred vnto Boos, not onely the possessions, but also the woman; by reason that Boos was allied also to those that were dead, & especially for that the said kinsman had already both wife and children.

B The affaires of the Hebrewes were at this time in very poore eſtate, and they armed themſelues anew againſt the Philiſtines vpon this occaſion: The High Prieſt Eli had two ſonnes, Ophni and Phinees. They againſt all right and law (offering outrages to men, and vrging impieties againſt God) ſuffered no ſinne to ouer-ſlip them which they committed not: for they tooke preſents (partly in way of honour, partly rauiſhed by force and rapine.) And as touching thoſe women that came vnto the Tabernacle in way of deuotion, they abuſed them, and rauiſhing ſome againſt their wils; and corrupting ſome others by preſents, they ſo lewdly liued, that their life ſeemed to be a true and licentious tyranny: for this cauſe their father was ſore diſpleaſed with them, but the people were ſo much the more ouer-burdened with griefe, becauſe as yet they perceiued not that Gods puniſhment ſhould ſo ſuddenly fall vpon them. But

C incontinently after that God had declared to Eli and the Prophet Samuel (who about that time was very young) what miſhap ſhould fall vpon Elies children, hee mourned ouer them, as if they had beene already dead. (But I will firſt of all declare ſomewhat vnto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards will I ſpeake of the children of Eli, and what inconuenience fell vpon all the Hebrew Nation.) Elcana was a Leuite of baſe condition, liuing in Ramatha a part of Ephraim: he had married two wiues, the one called Anna, the other Phenanna: by Phenanna he had children; yet notwithſtanding loued he Anna very intirely, although ſhee were barren. Now as Elcana with his wiues repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was reſident (as we haue before declared) to the intent to offer ſacrifice in that place: whileſt, I ſay, during the feſtiuall he diſtributed the portion of his meate to his wiues and children, Anna

D (beholding the children of his other wife ſitting round about their mother) began to weepe and lament with her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe was without iſſue and alone. And after that by her griefe ſhee had ouercome all that conſolation which her husband could giue her, ſhe went vnto the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it might pleaſe him to giue her a ſonne, and make her a mother; promiſing that her firſt begotten ſonne ſhould be dedicated vnto the ſeruice of God, and ſhould lead a particular life farre differing from that of other liuing men. And for that ſhe employed long time in making her prayers, the High Prieſt Eli, who ſate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, ſuppoſing that ſhee had taſted too much wine: but after that ſhee had told him that ſhee drunke nothing but water, and that (being oppreſſed with griefe) ſhee was come into the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it might pleaſe him to grant her children;

E he exhorted her to be of good courage, promiſing that God had heard her prayers: whereupon ſhee returned to her husband repleniſhed with good hope, and tooke her repaſt with ioy and gladneſſe. When as then they returned to their owne houſe, ſhe began to waxe big with childe, and at laſt ſhe bare a little young ſon, whom ſhe called Samuel (that is to ſay, Requeſted at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer ſacrifice, and giue thankes vnto God for the birth of the childe, which God had giuen them, and to bring their tenths; whereupon the woman (remembring her of the vow ſhee had made in his behalfe) deliuered him into the hands of Eli, and conſecrated him vnto God to be his Propher. For which cauſe they ſuffered his haire to grow, and he dranke nothing but water, and Samuel was nouriſhed and brought vp in the Temple: Elcana had by Anna other ſonnes and three daughters. But as touching Samuel (incontinently

Anna bare Samuel to Elcana her husband.

F after he had attained to the age of twelue yeeres) he prophecied. On a certaine night therefore whileſt he ſlept, God called him by his name: and he ſuppoſing that the High Prieſt had wakened him; came vnto him: but he told him that he had not called him. This notwithſtanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being ſore amazed, he ſaid vnto him, Samuel, I neither now at this preſent, nor before this time haue ſpoken vnto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, anſwer him therefore, and ſay, Here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more; and he required him that it might pleaſe him to ſpeake, and he would anſwer, not

Eli inforced the Prophet by imprecations to declare vnto him that, which he had heard. But Samuel (for feare he ſhould diſcomfort him) would not diſcloſe the ſame vnto him, which made which Samuel prophecied in effect prooued true, his reputation increaſed daily more and more.

The Paleſtines kill foure thouſand of the Iſraelites.

In that time the Philiſtines (leading out their army againſt the Iſraelites) incamped neere H vnto the City of Amphec, and for that the Hebrewes were negligent to withſtand them, they paſſed further into the countries thereabout: ſo that in fighting with their enemies, the Philiſtines at laſt got the vpper hand, and ſlew the Hebrewes, and had them in chace, for the ſpace of foure miles, purſuing the reſt of thoſe that fled euen vnto their owne tents. Whereupon the Hebrewes grew iealous and affraid of their whole eſtate: and therefore ſent they to the councell of the Elders and the high Prieſt, praying them to bring the Arke of God with them, to the end that hauing it in preſence with them, they might ſtrike the battell and ouercome their enemies. But they bethought them not, that he that had pronounced the ſentence of their calamitie againſt them, was greater then the Arke which was made for him. The Arke then was brought, and the ſons of Eli attended it, whom their father had expreſly commanded, that if it ſo fell out that the I Arke were taken, they ſhould neuer more come before his preſence, except they would die. Now Phinees executed the office of the high Prieſt, by the permiſſion of his father, by reaſon he was very aged.

The Hebrewes becauſe of the preſence of the Arke conceiued very great hope and aſſurance, that they ſhould haue the vpper hand of their enemies. The Philiſtines likewiſe were ſore amazed, fearing the preſence of the ſame: but the iſſues were not anſwerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they ioyned battell, the victory which the Hebrewes hoped ſhould be theirs, fell vnto the Philiſtines; and the loſſe which the Philiſtines feared, fell vpon the Hebrewes, who at laſt perceiued that they had repoſed their confidence on the Arke all in vaine. For as ſoone as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned I ing that ſome diſaſter had befallen his people; ſent to ſeeke out this yong meſſenger, by whom he was aduertiſed of that which had hapned. This accident of his ſonnes and the army he bare with great moderation, becauſe that before that time he had vnderſtood by God what ſhould happen (for thoſe aduerſities which are leaſt ſuſpected, doe more grieuouſly oppreſſe vs, at ſuch

CHAP. I.

How the Paleſtines compelled by peſtilence and famine, ſent backe the Arke of couenant vnto the Hebrewes.

AFTER that the Philiſtines had gotten the victory ouer the Hebrewes, and taken the ſacred Arke(as we haue before this declared)they brought it with other their ſpoiles vnto the City of Azot,and placed it in maner of a trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idoll. But on the next day after (when early in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their god) they found him fallen from that baſe or pillar that ſuſtained him, and lay along vpon the ground,his face vpward before the Arke; whereat being ſore mooued,they tooke and faſtned him in his former place:and when as they came very oftentimes thither,and alwaies found him proſtrate, and adoring before the Arke, a great feare and perturbation inuaded the whole people. At length a grieuous plague, not onely ranged in the City of Azot, but alſo ſeized on all the inhabitants of the countrey. For the people being ſuddenly taken with the flixe, died in great torment, and ſome of them vomited vp their bowels, beeing corrupted and corroded with the diſeaſe. Beſides this,the whole land ſwarmed with mice,who deſtroying all things, neither ſpared the corne,nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus ouerpreſſed with theſe calamities,and vnable any longer to indure the ſame,vnderſtood that the Arke was was the cauſe thereof, and that neither the victory, neither the ſurprizall of the ſame, had any wayes procured either their good or profit. They therefore ſent vnto the Aſcalonites, requiring them that they would receiue the Arke into their Citie, who (willingly condeſcending to their embaſſage and demand) receiued the Arke, and were preſently plagued with the ſame ſickneſſes and miſhaps which the Azotians had ſuffered. For together with the Arke the calamities alſo were tranſlated, for which cauſe it was likewiſe ſent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while: for the inhabitants of that place being afflicted by the ſame grieuances which the other indured, ſent it to the neighbour Cities, ſo that after this ſort the Arke was conueied to fiue Cities of the Paleſtines: (exacting as it were by thoſe plagues a tribute in euery one of them of violated religion) who wearied with ſo many euils, and made examples vnto others not to entertaine the Arke, which ſo grieuouſly recompenced thoſe that receiued the ſame, perceiued that there was no other way left them, but to finde out ſome good meanes to rid themſelues of the ſame. When as therefore the Princes of the fiue Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Azot, were aſſembled, they conſulted amongſt themſelues what were beſt to be done, and firſt of all they reſolued to ſend backe the Arke vnto thoſe to whom it appertained, whoſe captiuity God did reuenge, in that with it many plagues entred into the ſame Region, and ceaſed not to waſte both their men and their countrey. There were ſome that ſaid that this reſolution was vnſeemely to be executed, denying that theſe things ſhould be imputed to the captiuity of the Arke (whoſe power if it were ſo great as they intended, or if God had any wayes care of the ſame; hee would neuer haue permitted it to haue fallen into the hands of men of a contrary religion) perſwading them to digeſt theſe misfortunes with an equall minde, and ſo to thinke that all theſe things were nothing elſe but the effects of nature, which in certaine periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants, (and in other things ſubiect to her power) theſe kinds of alterations and mutations. But the counſell of thoſe men, that had approoued their vnderſtanding and wiſedome in times paſt, was preferred before their opinion. For the aſſiſtants ſuppoſed that in this deliberation, as alſo their opinion and counſell was moſt conuenient. They therefore aduiſed that the Arke ſhould be ſent backe and not retained, and that the fiue Cities ſhould dedicate fiue golden ſtatuaes in teſtimonie of their gratitude, becauſe they had beene preſerued by his fauour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impoſſible to eſcape: they annexed alſo ſo many golden mice vnto them, like vnto thoſe that ſpoiled their country. All theſe locked in a cheſt and laid vpon the Arke, they commanded that a new Cart ſhould be built, and that they ſhould yoake and tie to the ſame certaine kine that had new calued, locking vp their calues from them, leſt they ſhould be an impediment to their dammes, and (to the intent that through the deſire to ſee their yong) they ſhould haſte the faſter. That done, that driuing the chariot and them, they ſhould leaue them in a place that had three wayes, and ſuffer them to draw that way that them liſted: and if they tooke the way of the Hebrewes, and ſhould trauell towards their countrey, they then ſhould aſſure themſelues that it was the Arke which was the cauſe of their euils; but if they drew another way, let them (ſaid they) be driuen backe againe, being moſt aſſured that the Arke hath no ſuch vertue in it. This counſell was approoued by euery one of the aſſembly, and preſently effected: ſo hauing prepared all thoſe things whereof we haue ſpoken, they brought the Chariot into a high way that extended three wayes, and leauing it in that place, they returned backe againe.

The victory of the Hebrewes vnder the conduct of SAMVEL.

The yeere of the world, 2851. before Christs Natiuity, 1113.

The ſacred Arke cõmeth to Bethſama. The gratulation of the Bethſamites vpon the arriuall of the Arke.

NOVV when the kine entred and kept the right beaten way, and trauailed therein no otherwaies then if ſome men had led them, the gouernours of the Philiſtines followed after them, deſirous to vnderſtand whither they would trauell, and in what place they would reſt both themſelues and the chariot. There is a borough in the tribe of Iuda called Bethſama, towards which they drew: and although they had a very faire Plaine before them, yet would they not trauell any further, but reſted the charriot in that place. The inhabitants came vnto this ſpectacle, & greatly reioyced therat: for although it was ſummer time (wherin euery one buſied himſelfe in gathering in the fruits of the field) yet ſo it was, that when they perceiued the Arke, they were ſo tranſported with the pleaſure that they had, that they laid aſide the worke wch they had in hand, and ran preſently vnto the Chariot. Then taking downe the Arke and the Cofer (wherin the

A the ſtatuaes of gold, and golden rats were, they laid them vpon a certaine rocke in the field, and after they had ſolemnly ſacrificed and royally feaſted together, they offered vp both the chariot and kine for a burnt offering vnto God. Which when the Princes of the Paleſtines perceiued, they returned backe againe into their owne countrey. But Gods indignation and diſpleaſure was whetted againſt the Bethſamites: ſo that ſeuentie of them were ſlaine, by reaſon they had touched the Arke, & with prophane hands (not being Prieſts) attempted to ſuſtaine it. For which cauſe the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their loſſe, and mourned for that their countrimen were extinguiſhed by no fatall death, but by a puniſhment and plague ſent from God, lamenting in particular euery one of their alliance. And ſuppoſing that they were vnworthy that the Arke ſhould remaine with them, they ſent meſſengers to the gouernours and the reſt of the He-
B brewes, to let them vnderſtand that they had recouered the Arke out of the hands of the Philiſtines; who being made priuy to euery accident, placed the ſame in Cariathiarim a Citie bordering vpon the Bethſamites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Leuites, called Aminidab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life) to his houſe directed they the Arke, as to a place agreeable vnto God, becauſe there dwelled in the ſame a man of ſo much vertue. His ſonnes had the charge of the Arke, and continued in that ſeruice for the ſpace of twenty yeeres, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had onely remained 4. moneths with the Philiſtines. During the time that the Arke was in the Citie of Cariathiarim, all the people conuerted themſelues vnto God with prayers and ſacrifices, ſhewing great deuotion and forwardneſſe in his ſeruice. The Prophet
C Samuel perceiuing this their readines in courage, and ſuppoſing he had got a fit occaſion to exhort them vnto libertie, and thoſe profits which conſequently follow the ſame; and applying his ſpeech vnto the opportunitie, time & affaires, ſpake vnto thē ſuch words as ſounded to this effect: Yee men of Iſrael, ſince at this preſent the Philiſtines ceaſe not to moleſt you, and God beginneth to ſhew himſelfe merciful and fauourable vnto you: it behoooueth you, not onely to be touched with a deſire to recouer your liberty, but alſo to endeuour your ſelues to purchaſe the ſame in effect. Beware therefore leſt through your owne manners you make your ſelues vnworthie therof, and let each one of you endeuour to follow iuſtice; and expulſing all ſinne out of your D mindes, conuert your ſelues in all puritie vnto God, and perſeuere conſtantly in his ſeruice. For in doing theſe things, you ſhall ſhortly obtaine all felicitie, and eſpecially purchaſe vnto your ſelues a new libertie, and an aſſured victory againſt your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the ſtrength of your bodies, neither by the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtaine: for God hath not propoſed rewards for theſe things, but for vertue and iuſtice, who (truſt me) will not deceiue your expectation, nor faile in the execution of his promiſes. When he had ſpoken after this manner, all the people teſtified their conſent in good words, ſhewing the pleaſure they had conceiued by his diſcourſe, promiſing to doe that which ſhould be well liking and agreeable vnto God. Whereupon Samuel aſſembled them the ſecond time in the city of Maſpha (which word ſignifieth conſpicuous) there erected they an Altar and ſacrificed vnto God, and after they had faſted for a daies ſpace, they publikely addreſſed them to call vpon the E name of God. The Philiſtines in the mean ſpace, who were aſſembled together in the ſame place, had an inkling of that which the Hebrewes did, and being certified of this aſſembly, came with a great armie and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrewes, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This ſodaine attempt of theirs ſore diſmaied and troubled the Hebrewes: ſo that they repairing and running vnto Samuel, told him that their hearts failed them through feare, and their minds were troubled through the remembrance of thoſe precedent loſſes which they had receiued: For which cauſe they ought to hold themſelues in quiet, for feare leſt the enemy ſhould inforce his power againſt them. Whileſt (ſaid they) thou haſt led vs hither to pray, F ſacrifice, & offer vp our vowes vnto God, they are encāped neer vnto vs, being ready to ſurprize vs that are naked and diſarmed: we haue no other hope therfore of our ſecuritie, but that proceedeth from thee and God; who being moued by thy prayer, may giue vs meanes to eſcape from their hands. Samuel in way of anſwer wiſhed them to be of good cheere, promiſing them that God would yeeld them ſome teſtimonie of his aſſiſtance: whereupon ſacrificing a ſucking lambe for the people, he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to ſtretch forth his right hand for them in this battell againſt the Philiſtines, and that he would not permit them to fall this ſecond time into the enemies hands. To theſe prayers of his, God liſtned with intentiue eares, and accepted their humble hearts and dutifull obſeruance, ſmiling vpon their offering, and promiſing them both force, and victorie. Both before the ſacrifice was wholly conſumed with flame, and the ceremonies remonies performed; the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites sight, supposing that the day was already theirs, in that they had intercepted the Iewes who were vnprepared for the fight (who were not onely disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they beene foretold the same, they had scarcely beleeued it.) For first of all by Gods commandement the earth trembled vnder their feete, and with vncertaine pase they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were sodainly swallowed vp by the earth-quake: at length astonished by often flashes, and hauing both their eyes and hands halfe blasted and burned by the fierie lightnings that fell (so that they could not weild nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismaied, sodainly set vpon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as farre as a place called Corræus, where he fixed and erected a stone or trophee, as a marke both of his owne victorie, and the enemies flight, and called the same The strong rocke; as a witnesse of the force that God had giuen him against the Philistines: who after they had receiued this ouerthrow, sallied not out any more against the Israelites. But remembring themselues of their feare and those accidents that fell vpon them, they remained in peace, offering no further inuasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceiued and gotten against the Hebrewes, translated it selfe and remained with the Hebrewes euer after this victorie. And Samuel led forth his armie against them, and slew a great number of them, and for euer abased their pride, taking from them that countrey which before-times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Iewes, which countrey extendeth it selfe from the frontire of Geth, to the Citie of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

CHAP. III.

SAMVEL weakned by reason of his old age, cannot any longer gouerne the estate, and committeth it to the administration of his sonnes.

NOVV when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good forme of gouernment, he assigned them a Citie whither they might appeale, and decide those differents that might fall out amongst them: and as touching himselfe, he trauelled twice euery yeere from citie to citie, to administer iustice vnto them, and continued the maintenance of this policie for a long time. But as soone as he perceiued himselfe to be ouerburdened with yeeres, and vnapt to execute his ordinary offices, he reserued the gouernment and superintendence of the people to his sonnes, the elder of whom was called Ioel, and the yonger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seate of iustice in Bethel, and that the other should giue audience at Bersaba, diuiding the people, and attributing each part to his particular Iudge. In these was there a manifest example and infallible testimonie, that children are not alwaies borne like vnto their fathers: but that sometimes of euill parents there are good children bred, as contrariwise at that time, of a good father there were euill sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father, they followed a quite contrarie course, and oppressed iustice through corruptions and rewards; and, swallowed vp and surfeited in delights and pleasures, they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should studie to liue well, and vprightly.

CHAP. IIII.

How the people being displeased with the manners and gouernment of the sonnes of SAMVEL, demanded a King.

WHEN as therefore the people perceiued, that the sonnes of the Prophet had cõmitted so many outrages against their lawes & policie, they were verie sore displeased, & had recourse vnto their father where he dwelled in the Citie of Ramatha; where reckoning vp vnto him the misdemeanors of his sonnes, and how through the multitude of his yeeres, he was vnfit according to his accustomed manner to administer the affaires of the common-weale, they earnestly intreated and besought him, that hee would nominate and elect some King ouer them, who might both command their nation and Empire, and exact due punishment on the Paleſtines, for their many and too oftentimes offered iniuries. This reſolution of the people grieuouſly tormented Samuels minde, who by reaſon of his innated and vpright iuſtice, miſliked of the kingly authority, as a ſtile and ſtate too imperious: for he greatly delighted himſelfe in the Ariſtocracie or gouernment of the elders, deeming no eſtate more conducible, or auailable for the ſecuritie and proſperitie of the people, then that was. And ſo did this matter diſtemper and diſtract this man, as by reaſon of his care, he could neither taſte food, nor entertaine ſleep: but all the night long toſſed and tumbled in his bed, during thoſe times complotting and imagining many things in his mind. Whileſt theſe his indiſpoſitions continued, God appeared vnto him and comforted him, willing him not to be aggrieued at that which the people had required: but that he ſhould ſuppoſe that this iniurie, not onely concerned him, but God himſelfe, whom they diſclaimed alſo for their King and ſole Gouernour ouer thē. The effect wherof they had complotted, from the day that they departed out of Ægypt: but ere it be long (ſaid he) they ſhall repent themſelues, yet ſhall not their repentance vndoe that which ſhall be done; and it ſhall appeare by thoſe counſailes they haue taken, that they haue bin contemners & ingrateful toward me by their owne confeſſion, and towards thee alſo which haſt beene their Prophet. I will therefore that you chooſe them a King, and ſuch a one as I ſhall nominate vnto thee, after thou haſt aduertiſed them what euils they ſhall endure (at ſuch time as they ſhall haue a King) & haſt publikely declared vnto them, what inconuenients follow the change which ſo vehemently and vnhappily they purſue. Whē Samuel vnderſtood theſe ſayings, he aſſembled the people about the break of day, and proteſted publikely vnto them, that he would eſtabliſh them a King. But ſaith he, before I ſhall effect that which you requeſt, I muſt expoſe and declare vnto you what eſtate you ſhal liue in, being vnder the ſubiection of royaltie; and how many and grieuous euils you ſhall be preſſed withall, by thoſe Kings that ſhall gouerne you. Know therefore firſt of all, that they will take your children from you, and make ſome of them coachmen, and otherſome their horſemen and archers of their guard, others their poſts and tribunes and centurions; ſome likewiſe their handicraftſmen, and armorers, and chariot-makers, and ſmiths, and forgers of other ſorts of weapons, beſides husbandmen of his fields, and plowers, and diggers of his vineyards: neither is there any thing which they ſhal not be cōpelled to do after the maner of bondſlaues, that are bought with money. They ſhall take your daughters alſo, and make them their perfumers, cookes and bakers; and they ſhall employ thē in all ſeruile offices, wherunto their chambermaides are to be imploied either by ſtripes or torture. They ſhall take from you your ſubſtance, and giue it to their Eunuches, and guard. They ſhall take your flocks, and diſtribute them amongſt their ſeruants: In a word, you & all yours ſhall ſerue one King, & ſhal be of no better reckoning then the ſlaues of his houſhold. When you ſhall endure theſe paines, then ſhall you call to remembrance al theſe things which I haue told you, and with repentance you ſhal beſeech God, that he will haue mercy vpon you, and giue you aſpeedy deliuerance from the ſeruitude of your Kings: but he ſhall not reſpect your prayers, but neglecting and repulſing them, ſhal ſuffer you to beare the penalty of your euill counſell. Although theſe future inconueniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect and ſet light by them: and not ſuffering that ſiniſter opinion which before that time they had conceiued in their minds, to be altred or fruſtrated in them, they inſiſted with all obſtinacy; requiring (without any care of future miſhaps) that they might haue a King created ouer them, becauſe (as they ſaid) it was neceſſarie that they ſhould haue a King that might wage warre with them, to reuenge them on their enemies, and repreſſe their aduerſaries forces, and that there was no abſurditie in it, but that they might be gouerned in the ſame ſort as their neighbours were. Samuel perceiuing that his perſwaſions could preuaile nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diuerted from that reſolution wherein they perſiſted, he ſpake thus: Goe your waies for this time euery one of you vnto your houſes, and I will cauſe you to be aſſembled when the cauſe requireth, and when God ſhall haue informed me what King he will giue you.

in any other kinde of cattell, had lost certaine of them which were straied from the rest of his flocke: whereupon he sent his son accompanied with a seruant to search and seeke them out; who hauing trauersed and trauelled in quest of them thorow all his fathers tribe, iournied thorow the rest of the tribes, without any hope or inkling of them: for which cause hee determined to returne home againe, for feare lest his father should conceiue some care and griefe in his absence. Whilest then he arriued neere vnto the Citie of Ramatha, the seruant that followed him, certified him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whose foresight the knowledge of the truth was subiect, towards whom hee counsailed him to addresse himselfe, with assurance and confidence, that by him hee should vnderstand what was become of his Asses. Saul replied, that he had no meanes left to recompence the Prophet, by reaspn they had consumed all the money they had brought foorth with them in their iourney. His seruant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a sicle, with they might giue him: but they were both of them deceiued, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew neere vnto the gates of the Citie, they met with certain maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gaue them directions, telling them that they were to make haste before that he were set downe to supper, by reason he at that time entertained diuers guests, and he himselfe was first wont to sit downe at the vpper end of the table. Samuel had inuited this company, by reason that all the day long hee had instantly besought God, that hee would declare vnto him, who it was that should bee established: and God also gaue him to vnderstand that he would informe him the next day after, and that about the same houre he would send a young man vnto him of the tribe of Beniamin. For this cause Samuel sat in his house expecting the assignation: which being come, he came downe vnder pretence to go to supper, and in the way he met with Saul. At that very instant God signified vnto Samuel, that it was he whom he should elect Prince and gouernour ouer the people.

Saul asketh where the Prophet dwelleth.

God certifieth Samuel whom he should create King.

Saul commeth vnto Samuel. Samuel certifieth Saul how he shall enioy the kingdome.

Saul addressing himselfe vnto Samuel, besought him that he would shew him the Prophets lodging, by reason that he was a stranger and knew it not. Samuel told him that he himselfe was the man to whom hee spake, and led him to the banquet; assuring him that his Asses (in search of whom he had trauelled so long) were in safetie, and that all mens goods were at his command. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too base to hope or expect so much; and further, my familie is the least of all the families: you therefore iest and mocke at me, in speaking of such things as surpasse my condition. The Prophet tooke him by the hand, and brought both him and his seruant to the table, and placed him aboue all those that were inuited, who were to the number of seuentie. Samuel commanded that the royall portion should bee set before Saul: and when the houre of bed time came, all the rest arose and departed to their houses, but Saul and his seruant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as soone as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and departing with him out of towne, he commanded him to send his seruant before, and to remaine himselfe with him behind, because he had certaine things to impart vnto him in priuate. Hereupon Saul sent away his seruant, and Samuel taking a cruet with oyle, powred the same vpon the young mans head, and embracing him, said: Bee thou King elected by God against the Philistines, and for the defence of the Hebrewes. Thou shalt haue this signe which I now shall informe thee of, of thy future honour: When thou shalt be parted from hence, thou shalt ouertake three men in the way, who trauell to Bethel to adore and sacrifice vnto God: the first of which, thou shalt see bearing three loaues, the second shall beare a goate, & the third shall follow carrying a glasse of wine. These shall embrace thee and caresse thee: they shall giue thee two loaues, and thou shalt receiue them. And from thence shalt thou depart vnto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou shalt meete with a messenger, that shall certifie thee that the Asses are found. From thence comming vnto Gabatha, thou shalt finde the Prophets assembled in their congregation, and being rauished by the Spirit of God, thou shalt prophecy amongst them: so that whosoeuer shall behold thee, shall be rauished in admiration, and shall say: Whence commeth it to passe, that the sonne of Cis hath attained to so good fortune? and when thou hast had these signes, know that God shall be with thee: salute thy father and thy kinsmen in my behalfe. Hereafter thou shalt repaire and be sent vnto me vnto Galgal, to offer sacrifices of thankesgiuing vnto God. Hauing in this manner told and foretold him that which is foresposen, he gaue him licence to depart: and all these things hapned vnto Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had prophecied vnto him. When Saul was arriued at Abners house, who was his vncle (whom he loued aboue all the rest of his other familiars:) Abner questioned with him about his voiage, and as touching those things which had chanced vnto him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but but point by point informed him of all that which had hapned vnto him, during his being and aboad with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had declared vnto him the recouery of his Asses: but as touching the royaltie, and those things that concerned the same, hee concealed them; supposing that if it should be made knowne, it would not be beleeued; but that he should reape hate thereby. For although he were both his friend and cousin; yet thought he it more secure and conuenient for him to burie the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himselfe the infirmitie of mans nature, that no man is constant in loue, but although by manifest assistance from God, felicity fall vpon any man, yet other men doe grieue and repine that any one should be preferred before them.

Saul concealed his royall dignity.

The inconstancy of mans loue.

After this, Samuel assembled the people in the City of Maspha, where he framed his speech in such sort, as he certified of those things which he had receiued from God, namely, that he hauing procured their liberty, and brought their enemies in subiection vnder them; next, how they were forgetfull of so many benefits, and had degraded God of his royalty; as if they were ignorant, that the greatest good that might happen vnto men, is to be gouerned by him that is the soueraigne good; how they had determined to haue a man to their King, who according to his pleasure and appetite, or according to the vnbridled bent of his passion, would vse them like slaues made subiect vnto him, and would vsurpe vpon their goods without forbearing any thing whatsoeuer; that men are not so studious to maintaine their handie works and labours, as God, who hath an inestimable care of those whom he hath created. Notwithstanding (saith he) since you haue thus determined, and are after this manner resolued, and that the outrage which you haue enterprized against God, preuaileth with you, set your selues all of you in order according to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots. To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Beniamin, which being cast the second time, light on the family of Metri, and afterwards being approued by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Cis, to haue the kingdome. The young man, who before that time knew what should happen, had stept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seeme that he had desired this dignity; and such moderation and temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out, that diuers cannot conceale the ioy they conceiue, if any face of felicity smile vpon them; but manifest the same vnto all men: yet notwithstanding he not onely was voide of vaine appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many worthy people) but that wch is more, he stole away from the presence of those men ouer whom he should command, and so handled all things that he made them seeke after him, and trauell to find him out. Whilest therefore they carefully sought, and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet praied God that he would shew thē where he was, & that he would bring him into their presence: when as therfore he was enformed by God in what place he remained; Samuel sent out certaine messengers to conduct him thither, and assoone as he came amongst them, Samuel set and placed him in the midst of the people: now was hee more high then any of the company by the shoulders; and had a Kingly and goodly shape and appearance: then spake the Prophet after this manner, God hath giuen you this man to be your king, behold how he surpasseth you al, and shewes himself worthy to be your Prince. But as soone as the people had cried God saue the King; the Prophet, who had reduced into writings all those mischiefes that should befall them, read the same vnto them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle of God for a perpetuall testimony vnto posterity of those things which in future ages should succeed, according as he had fore-prophecied: which done, Samuel dismissed the people, and returned to the City of Ramath, which was his countrey. But Saul departing vnto Gabatha, diuers worthy men gaue their attendance on him, and did him the honor that appertained vnto a King. But diuers seditious and loose companions, who set him at noughts, both mocked them, and those things which they did, neither brought they any presents vnto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, any wayes to respect their King. A moneth after this instalment, there fell a war betwixt him and Naas King of the Ammonites, which was the originall of that honour which was generally attributed vnto him by the whole multitude: this Naas had offered diuers outrages vnto those Iewes that dwel on the other side of Iordan. For he had trauersed the riuer with a great & huge army leuied against them; and had ouercome diuers of their Cities. For at that time he vsed force and violence against them: and to the intent that they might not rebel, neither deliuer thēselues from his subiection, he vsed this subtilty & preuention to cut off al colour & occasion from them, of opposition. For to those that surrendred themselues, and subscribed to his mercy, & to those that were taken captiues, or conquered in the wars, he plucked out their right eyes: and this did he to that intent, that when they

ſhould defend themſelues, they ſhould haue their left eyes couered with their bucklers, and by that meanes be made vnapt to enter battell. The king of the Ammonites hauing after this manner dealt with thoſe on the other ſide of Iordan, he led his armie towards the Galaadites, and encamped neere vnto their chiefe Citie called Iabes, to which he ſent Heraulds to ſummon the inhabitants to ſurrender the ſame, vnder theſe conditions: either to ſuffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or elſe by enduring the ſiege, to ſee the finall ouerthrow both of themſelues, & of their City: wiſhing them to make choice of which they liſt, whether they would loſe a little part of their bodie, or hazard both their fortunes and liues at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this ſo doubtfull and dreadfull an election, neither durſt returne an hoſtile or peaceable anſwer, but asked truce for ſeuen dayes, to the end that ſending their meſſengers to their kinsfolke, they might craue their aide: which if they could obtaine, they would warre; and otherwiſe they promiſed to ſubmit themſelues vnto the enemy, vnder what condition ſoeuer were beſt pleaſing vnto him. Naas, that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their anſwer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewiſe to craue aſſiſtance at all their hands, who were their aſſociates. Whereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers from city to city, and certified the Iſraelites of all that which Naas had done vnto them, and the extremity whereunto they were reduced. The Iſraelites hauing beforetime vnderſtood in what eſtate they of Iabes were, had grieuouſly lamented and conceiued great diſpleaſure thereat; but the feare that afflicted them, ſuffered them to aſſiſt their friends in no other manner then by commiſeration: yet as ſoone as their meſſengers arriued in the Citie where Saul was, and that they had recounted vnto him the dangers wherewith the Iabeſites were oppreſſed; the people were as in times paſt mooued with compaſſion. For they lamented the miſerie of their Parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the Citie, perceiued the inhabitants drowned in their teares, and enquiring of them for what cauſe they were ſo confuſed and abaſhed, hee was certified of that, which the meſſengers had reported: and on the inſtant he was rauiſhed by a diuine motion, and ſent the Embaſſadours backe againe to thoſe that ſent them, promiſing that within three dayes he would come and ſuccour them, and that he would haue the vpper hand of the enemie before ſunne-riſe, to the end that the riſing ſunne might behold them victorious, and deliuered from all feare. The combate and victorie of SAVL againſt the Ammonites.

Sauls ſerious exhortation & command for warre.

SAVL deſirous to incite the people to iſſue out and make warre vpon the Ammonites, to the intent vnder a penaltie he might aſſemble them with more readineſſe, he houghed his owne oxen, and threatned all thoſe whom he met withall to doe the like vnto theirs, except the next day they preſented themſelues with their armes vpon the banke of Iordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march vnto the place whither by them they ſhould be conducted.

1 Kings 11.

The feare of this penaltie publiſhed among the tribes, made them gather to head about the ſame time, ſo that all the aſſemblies of the people were muſtered in the City of Bala. In this ſuruey, beſides thoſe of the tribe of Iuda, there were numbred ſeuen hundred thouſand men, and of the tribe of Iuda in particular, there were ſeuenty thouſand. Hauing therefore paſſed Iordan and marched ſome ten cubits length of Nilus (which is about ſome three leagues) all the night time, before the ſunne riſe, hee attained the place whither he intended to conduct them, and diuiding his armie into three parts, he aſſailed the enemie on euery ſide, that ſuſpected no ſuch encounter: and fighting valiantly againſt them, he ſlew diuers, and amongſt the reſt Naas King of the Ammonites. This victorie made Sauls name famous amongſt all the Hebrewes, ſo that he was wonderfully praiſed and honoured for his valour: ſo that if before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they changed their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worthieſt of them all. For he was not ſatisfied to redeeme and deliuer thoſe of Iabes, but he entred the Countrey of the Ammonites alſo, and forraged the ſame with his armie, and vtterly ouerthrew them: and after he had obtained a great booty and prey, both he and his victoriouſly and magnifically returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleaſed with this noble action atchieued by Saul, reioyced becauſe they had choſen them ſo noble a King, and exclaimed againſt thoſe that ſaid, that it would be diſcommodious and vnprofitable for their common

A common-weale, saying, Where are now these murmurers? let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people besotted with some good successe, is wont to speake and inforce against them that set light by the authors and inducers of the same. Saul receiued great content and comfort through this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithstanding he swore that no one of their tribe should be put to death that day, because it would not seeme conuenient nor agreeable, that the victorie which was giuen them by God, should be mixed with the blood of their brethren; but rather that it was more decent and comely that the time should be spent in feast and iollitie. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behooued them to confirme the kingdome to Saul by a second election: and to that end, they assembled together in the Citie of Galgal, according as he had commanded them: and there in the sight of all the people

For vnder Moses and his disciple Iesus, who gouerned the Empyre, and armie at that time, the nobilitie and elected worthy men ruled the State. After whose death for the space of eighteene whole yeeres, the people was without gouernment, the common-weale not long after reassumed her pristine policie, and the gouernment was giuen vnto him, which was esteemed the most valiant in warre, and the most vpright in doing of Iustice. After this, the Prophet Samuel assembled the people, and spake vnto them after this manner: I coniure you by that great God that hath giuen life to those two brothers (I meane Moses and

C Aaron) and that hath deliuered your forefathers frō the Ægyptians, & their tyranny, that without any affection either of feare or shame, or instigation of any other passion, you truely testifie whether I haue committed any sinister or wicked act, either for profit sake, or for auarice, or fauor. Reproue me, If I haue taken away any mans calfe, or sheepe, or any other thing whatsoeuer, but that which I might lawfully take for my reliefe and sustenāce, and at such hands as willingly offered me the same; or if I haue drawn any mans beasts to my vse, or vsed his cattell to my profit and his hinderance: in these and such like, if I haue offended any man, let him now accuse me in the presence of the King. All of them cryed out with one voyce, that no such default had beene committed by him, but that he had gouerned their nation in holinesse and iustice. After that the people had thus publikely testified in the behalfe of Samuel; hee said vnto them: Since you haue

D liberally & freely protested, that you haue no cause of wrong to vrge or inforce against me, heare I pray you, that wherewith I can iustly accuse you. You haue grieuously offended against the maiestie of God, in that you haue required a King at his hands: you should haue rather remembred, that your old father Iacob accōpanied onely with his 70. sons came into Ægypt, constrained thereunto by famine, and that in that countrey diuers thousands of persons issued from his loynes, whom the Ægyptians kept in captiuity, offering them extreme outrages: And when as your fathers called vpon God, how he wonderfully deliuered them from the necessities wherin they were, without giuing thē any King, contenting thēselues with two brothers, Moses & Aaron; who brought and conducted you into this countrey which you possesse at this present. And although you participated these benefits by the hands of God, yet notwithstanding you haue not

E forborne both to forget religion, and neglect pietie. This notwithstanding, at such time as you haue bin conquered by your enemies, he hath set you free; gracing you first of all with the ouerthrow of the Assyrians and their forces: secondly, giuing you victory ouer the Ammonites, and Moabites: and finally ouer the Philistines. Now these great exploits were performed by you, not vnder the conduct of a King, but by the direction of Ieptha and Gedeon: what folly therefore hath bewitched you to make you flie from God, and to seeke to liue vnder the subiection of a King? But I haue named such a one vnto you, whom God hath chosen to be your gouernour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I may giue you a manifest testimony, that Gods wrath is whetted against you, because you haue desired to haue a King; I will striue to expresse it vnto you, by visible signes done by God himselfe, I will therfore require of God, that he will make you see in this

They notwithstanding professed that their errour was of ignorance, not of obstinacie, and besought the Prophet that with a good and fatherly affection, hee would beseech God to appease his wrath towards them, and forgiue them their offences at that present, which to their other grieuous negligences they had annexed, and whereby they had transgressed his holy will. All which Samuel promised them to doe, and besought God that it would please him to pardon them the errour which they had committed in that behalfe, and that it would please him to be appeased by his praiers. Besides this, he exhorted them to liue vprightly, and to keepe in their continuall remembrance what euils had hapned vnto them, for that they had forsaken the way of vertue; and what wonders God had done, and what lawes he had giuen by Moses, all which they ought to meditate on, if they desired to be in safetie, and liue happily with their King. But if they should contemne the same, he foretold them, that both themselues and their Kings should be grieuously punished. Samuel hauing prophecied these things vnto the Hebrewes, dismissed thē to their owne dwellings, after he had confirmed the kingdome to Saul the second time.

An exhortation to the consideration of Gods assistance and benefits bestowed on the Israelites.

CHAP. VII.

The Palestines, assailing the Hebrewes, are ouercome in battell.

BVT when the King had mustered his men, and chosen out three thousand of the choisest souldiers, he appointed two thousand of them for the guard of his Person, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The rest he gaue in charge to his sonne Ionathan, and sent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there; who, followed by them, valiantly ouercame a garrison of the Philistines neere vnto Gebal. For the Philistines of Gaba hauing gotten the vpper hand ouer the Iewes, had taken their armes from them, and seized and fortified both with men and munition the strongest Cities of their countrey; prohibiting them to beare armes, and in generall from the vse of any yron: by reason of which inhibition, if their husbandmen had at any time neede of any yron worke, as of plough-shares, mattockes, or any such other instrument fit for manuring or tillage of their lands, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongst the Philistines.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. Saul elected two thousand for his owne guard, & one thousand for Ionathans. Saul ouercommeth the Philistines.

Now when the Philistines had gotten some intelligēce that their garrison was after this manner defeated, they were wonderfully mooued, and supposing amongst themselues that the iniurie and outrage was in no sort to be suffered, they armed themselues against the Iewes, and went out embattailed with three hundreth thousand footmen, thirty thousand charriots, and sixe thousand horse, encamping with their whole host neere vnto the Citie of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrewes vnderstood, he marched toward the Citie of Galgal: and as hee trauailed thorow the countrey, he animated and encouraged the people to recouer their libertie, proclaiming warre against the Philistines; whose forces he so little feared, as he mocked thereat, saying, that they deserued not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrew by their encountry. But when Sauls souldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly discomforted, so that some of them hid themselues in dennes and places vnder the earth, othersome fled on the other side of Iordan into the countrey of the Gadites and Rubenites. But Saul sent for the Prophet, resoluing to cōsult with him vpon the estate of the war, who gaue him answer, that he should attend in the same place where he was, and that he should prepare beasts for sacrifice, because that within seuen dayes he would come vnto him & sacrifice on the seuenth day: which done, he might encounter the enemie. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet obserued he not intirely all that which Samuel had inioyned him. For when he perceiued that he was somewhat slacke in comming, and that his soldiers waxed weary, he tooke the beasts that were prepared for the sacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards vnderstanding that Samuel was arriued, hee went out to meete him, and doe him honour. Samuel told him, that he had done amisse, by reason he had neglected that which was commanded him, presuming before his arriuall (who was sent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer praiers and sacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both discouered his rashnes, and disorder in sacrificing. Saul excused himselfe, alledging that he had staied during the terme of seuen dayes which were appointed him: vrging further, that necessitie, and the depart of his souldiours, together with the feare of the aduerse army which were in Machmas, and the intelligence hee had receiued that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer sacrifice. Samuel replyed, saying, Thou hadst done more aduisedly, if thou hadst obeyed, and not contemned God by thine ouerhaste, whose minister and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mightest both haue gotten an assurance and continuance of thy kingdome to thy selfe, and succession to thy posterity. This said, being displeased with that which had hapned, he returned back

A to his owne houſe, and Saul with ſixe hundred ſouldiers (onely accompanied with his ſonne Ionathan) came vnto the City of Gabeon. The greater part of theſe men were diſarmed, by reaſon that the countrey was intirely deſtitute of yron; and workemen that were expert and skilfull in forging and making armour: for the Philiſtines permited them not to haue any, as wee haue declared a little before. Theſe diuiding their army into three battels, inuaded the countrey of the Hebrewes, by ſo many wayes, deſtroying and forraging all things, both in the ſight of King Saul, and of his ſonne, who neither could inhibite their incurſions, nor by reaſon of their multitudes make head againſt them. Both he therefore and his Sonne, and Achias the high Prieſt, ſate them downe vpon a hillocke, and ſeeing the countrey ſpoyled round about them, they were much diſmaied. But Sauls ſonne conſpired and concluded with his Eſquire and Harneſſe-bearer, to enter ſecretly into the enemies campe, and raiſe an vprore and alarum in the ſame; who willingly pro-
B miſing and offering him his ſeruice to aduenture with him in all occaſions and places, with the hazzard of his life: they both of them diſcended from the mountaine, and marched directly towards the enemies campe, who had pitched their tents on a high pointed rocke, which extended it ſelfe in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a banke, as it were a wall and fortification againſt the incurſion of their enemies. For which cauſe they kept their watch ſomewhat too careleſly, becauſe the place was fortified by nature: ſo that no man might aſcend, or aſſaile them, but with diſaduantage. When as therefore they had gotten neere vnto the campe, Ionathan incouraged his commpanion, and animated him to aſſaile the enemy after this manner. If (ſaith he) they eſpie vs, and will vs to aſcend, let vs take this ſummons of theirs for an aſſured to-
C ken of victory: but if they hold their peace, and call vs not, let vs returne backe againe.

As therefore they approached the enemies hoſt, about the beginning and brie of day, the Philiſtines ſaid the one vnto the other: The Hebrewes creepe out of their caues and dens. Then cried they out to Ionathan, and his Harneſſe-bearer, ſaying: Come hither, come hither vnto vs, to the end wee may plague you according to your audacious enterprize. Sauls ſonne quickely taking hold of theſe their words, and eſteeming them for an ominous and anſſured token of victory, departed with his Eſquire from the place where they were firſt diſcouered, anſwering them that he would ſhortly viſit them. So withdrawing himſelfe on the other ſide of the rocke, which by reaſon of the ſituation thereof, was left vnguarded: ouercomming the difficulty of the place with great labour; at laſt they attained the place where the enemy was, whom they found aſleepe, and
D aſſailing them ſlue twenty of them, and filled the whole army with terror & amazednesſe: ſo that caſting away their weapons they fled amaine: ſome others being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, inuaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themſelues that onely two Hebrewes durſt neuer aſcend and enter their campe, they addreſſed themſelues to their mutuall murther and ſlaughter: ſo that ſome of them were ſlaine, others fled to eſcape the ſword, and fell headlong downe the rockes. But when as the Kings eſpials had told him what confuſion and diſorder was befallen in the campe of the Philiſtines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were abſent: and hearing that his ſonne and his Harneſſe-bearer were miſſing, he commanded the high Prieſt, that attired in his pontificall ornaments, hee ſhould prophecy that which ſhould ſucceede: who aſſuring him that hee ſhould obtaine the victory ouer his enemies, he ſallied out
E and aſſaulted the Philiſtines, and ranne vpon them, who were thus confuſed and diſordered, and whetted the one againſt the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes ſuch, as before times were fled into dens and places vnder ground, as ſoone as they heard that the victory inclined on Sauls ſide: ſo that gathering together to the number of ten thouſand Hebrewes, hee purſued his ſcattered enemies thorow all the countrey. But afterward, a great inconuenient hapned vnto Saul, proceeding from the ioy hee had conceiued by this victory (for commonly ſuch as are bleſſed by ſuch good fortunes, are not maſters of their owne affections and reaſons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to ſatiate himſelfe with reuenge for all thoſe iniuries he had receiued from the Philiſtines, hee publiſhed an imprecation or curſe amongſt the Hebrewes, againſt any one whomſoeuer, that intermitting the chaſe and ſlaughter ſhould take F ſuſtenance before night, purpoſing vntill darke night neither to giue ouer purſuite or ſlaughter. This execration thus publiſhed by Saul, it chanced that his ſonne that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his Father, nor the generall ratification and allowance of the ſame by the people, falling into a certaine groue, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many ſwarmes of Bees, hee by chance light vpon an hony combe, and preſſing the hony thereout, afterwards did eate the ſame. Afterwards hauing intelligence that his Father had vnder a grieuous penalty of execration, forbidden any man to taſte any ſort of meate before ſunne-ſet, he gaue ouer eating further:

ther: yet said hee, that his father had done amisse therein in publishing that prohibition, by reason that if they had receiued sustenance, they might with greater force and forwardnesse pursue the enemy that fled, and ouertake and slaughter them in great number. Killing therefore many thousands of the Palestines partie, about the euening they began to ransacke and spoile the campe of the Philistines, and bore away from thence great spoyles, and a wonderfull number of cattell, part of which were slaine and eaten with the blood, contrary to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and signified to the King, how the people had offended against God, by slaughtering the beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either washt or purified from the blood; Saul commanded that a great stone should be rowled into the midst of the place, and commanded the people to kill and sacrifice their beasts vpon the same: and that they should forbeare to eate the flesh with the blood, because it was not agreeable vnto God. All which was performed according as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offred a burnt sacrifice vnto God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assaile the enemies campe, and sacke all that was therein before the day spring, whilest his men of war diligently followed him, and shewed great forwardnes in the execution of his command: the King asked counsell of the High Priest Achitob, whether God would giue him the victorie, and permit those that should enter the enemies campe, to returne from thence with victorie. The High Priest certified him that God returned him no answer: which when he vnderstood; It is not without cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to giue a willing answer in that which we ought to doe: but there must needes be some hidden sinne in vs, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be silent. But I sweare by the same God, that although mine owne sonne Ionathan had committed that sinne; to the end I may appease God, I will with no lesse seuerity execute him, then any one stranger that is neither by alliance nor affinity tied vnto me. Now when the people cried out and encouraged him to the performance of that he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and he standing with his sonne apart, began by casting lots to finde out him that was faulty. Now when the lot fell vpon Ionathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his own conscience he was guilty of? To whom he answered, I know no other thing, but that yesterday being in pursuite of the enemy, and ignorant of thine edict, I tasted of a hony combe: but Saul swore that he would slay him, setting more by his oath, then either by kinred, nature, or affection. Hee nothing astonished with his present perill, with a generous and dreadlesse minde, presented himselfe with this reply: O father (said he) I intreat no fauour at thy hands: for I will willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly because I haue seene so famous a victorie: for I shall die throughly contented to see the insolency of the Palestines ouermastered by the power of the Hebrewes. This valour and courage of the young man mooued the whole multitude to remorse and commiseration: so that they swore all of them that they would not suffer that Ionathan, who was the author of so famous a victorie, should be slaine: and therfore rescued they the young man from his displeased father, and made vowes vnto God to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul, after he had slaine about sixe thousand of his enemies, returned with victory to his owne home, and raigned afterwards very happily, and ouercame by force the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalechites, and King Oba that dwelt neere about him. He had three sonnes, Ionathan, Iosuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob, and Michol. The Generall of his Army was Abner the sonne of his vncle called Neer: for Neer and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and sonnes of Abiel. He was very rich both in horse and Chariots, and against whatsoeuer enemy he marched forth, he alwaies returned with victory: so that he reduced the affaires of the Hebrewes to happy estate, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those nations that neighboured vpon them. But the chiefest of the youth, that either preuailed in strength, or exceeded in beauty, he chose to be of his guard.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 8. 1. King. 15.

BVT Samuel comming vnto Saul, told him that he was sent vnto him by God, to admonish him how hee had chosen him aboue the rest, and preferred him to the kingdome: and for that cause that it behooued him to be obedient vnto him in all things, because he ruled the people; but God both Kings, Kingdomes, and all things. Thus therefore (said hee)

doth God command thee. Since the Amalechites offered many iniuries vnto the Hebrewes in the desart, whilest in their departure out of Ægypt, they trauelled into that region which they now inhabite; it behooueth thee to punish them by a most iust warre: and hauing ouercome them, that thou vtterly extinguish their memorie, without regard either of sexe or yeeres; and this reuenge shalt thou execute vpon them, in repaiment of those iniuries they in times past offered to our forefathers. Neither shalt thou spare either beast or horse, or flocke, to apply them to thy profit or particular vse: but thou shalt consecrate all vnto God, and according as Moses commanded it, deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All these things did Saul promise to performe, and supposing obedience consisted in this, not onely in the acting, but also the speedy execution of that which was enioyned him, he presently assembled all his forces together, and mustring his souldiers at Galgal, he found about forty thousand, besides the tribe of Iuda, which of it selfe affoorded and allowed thirtie thousand chosen men: with these did Saul enter the countrey of the Amalechites, and laid diuers ambushes neere vnto a riuer, not onely to afflict them with open and hostile warre, but also to enclose and surprize them at vnwares, and kill them amidst their high-wayes: He charged them therefore, and put them to flight, and discomfited their whole armie, pursuing them that fled. Which execution of his, hauing that answerable successe (according as God had promised him before) he marched onwards, and besieged the Cities of the Amalechites, and ouercame some of them by batterie, some by mines and countermures raised on the outside: othersome by famine and thirst, and diuers other waies. And in those Cities which he ouercame, he neither spared women nor children, neither supposing their murther to be cruell, neither inhumane: first, for that he executed it vpon his enemie; next, for that he did nothing but according to Gods Commandement, towards whom his disobedience might redound to his vtter ouerthrow. He tooke Agag prisoner also, who was the King of the Amalechites, whose beauty and personage seemed vnto him so well proportioned and perfect, that he wondred thereat, and thought him worthy to be kept aliue; and that not by Gods Commandement, but ouercome by his owne affection, vsurping vpon an vngranted priuiledge of mercie to his owne preiudice: For God so hated the Amalechites, that he spared not their infants, who ought in naturall compassion to haue beene more pitied then the rest. But Saul kept aliue the king of his enemies, and the author of all the Hebrewes euils, setting more by his beauty then Gods Commandement. This sin of his the people presently imitated: for they spared both horse and other kind of cattell, and made prey of them, notwithstanding that God had charged them to reserue nothing. They carried away with them all other moueables and riches, and onely consumed those things which were of smallest value by fire. This victorie had Saul ouer those people that dwell betwixt Pelusium, which is a Citie on the borders of Ægypt, vnto the red sea. But he medled not with the Sichemites, which inhabit in the middest of the Madianites, whom before the battell he had commanded to retire themselues, lest they should partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied vnto them, by reason of Raguel, Moses father in law; the Hebrewes had cause to procure their safety. Saul hauing obtained this victory, and reioycing at his good successe, returned to his own home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his war with the Amalechites, but as if he had precisely obserued all that which was enioyned him. But God was sore displeased, both for that the King of the Amalechites was preserued, and for that the people had made prey of their cattell: for both these actions of theirs were expresly against Gods permission. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortall King; that they should neglect and contemne his lawes and decrees, by whose onely meanes they were furthered and fauoured in their victory. For which cause God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented him in that he had chosen Saul for their King, considering that he infringed his commandements, and gouerned himselfe according to his owne appetites. When Samuel heard these words, he was sore troubled, and besought God all the night long, that he would appease his wrath and displeasure conceiued against Saul: but notwithstanding all the importunities, and praiers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no sort be reconciled, because it was inconuenient that the sinnes, which were committed by Saul, should bee remitted by Samuels submission and intercession. For sinne neuer more augmenteth and increaseth, then when such as are offenced are too remisse in their punishments: for whilest they would be reputed both for good and mercifull, they themselues both vnwares, and vnwittingly, become the authors of sin. When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his request, and it manifestly appeared that no praiers or supplication might appease him; as soone as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at

at that time remained in Galgal. Now as soone as the King perceiued him, he ranne vnto him and embraced him, saying: I giue God thankes for the victorie; and all those things which hee commanded me, I haue performed. But Samuel replied and said: How commeth it then to passe, that I heare this bleating of sheepe, and bellowing of beasts thorow the army? Saul answered, that the people had reserued that cattell for sacrifice, and that besides them, all the nation of the Amalechites was exterminated according as God had commanded, and that there was not any one remaining, but that he onely had reserued the King, whom he would cause to be presented before him, to the end they might consult together what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answered: that God tooke no pleasure in sacrifices, but such as were good and iust, and such (said he) are they that are according to his will and commandement; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God refuseth not him that sacrificeth not, but him that disobeyeth him. For he willingly accepteth not those sacrifices that are offered vnto him by those that submit not themselues vnto him, and offer not vnto him the true and onely offerings; yea, though they present diuers and many great sacrifices, and bring him sundry Iewels of gold and siluer, but reiecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of pietie, but testimonies of wickednesse: But he taketh pleasure in those onely that obserue that which he hath pronounced and commanded, making choise rather to die, then any waies to infringe the same: not seeking that sacrifices should be offered vnto him; but if they be offered, although of small and no value, yet are they more acceptable vnto him in pouertie and obedience, then all those which the richest hand, or strongest fortune can affoord him any wayes. Know thou therefore (said he) that thou hast incurd Gods displeasure, in that thou hast contemned and neglected his commandements: for how canst thou thinke that he will regard thy sacrifices with a gracious eye, which hee himselfe hath adiudged to vtter perdition and ruine? except thou thinke that to offer such things vnto God, bee in effect no lesse then to seeke out death: Be assured therefore of the losse both of thy kingdome, and power, which hath in such sort transported thee, that thou had contemned God, who bestowed the same vpon thee. But Saul confessed that he had sinned and done amisse, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alleadged he that he was compelled to doe the same, in that he durst not restraine the souldier, who was whet and kindled vpon the prey: but (said he) be fauourable and mercifull vnto me, for hereafter I will take heede lest I fall into the like sinne: and he besought him that he would stay with him so long whilest he might offer a peace offering in his behalfe. But he that foresaw and knew that God would be mooued by no sacrifice, began to depart.

BVT Saul willing to retaine Samuel, tooke hold of his garment, and for that the Prophet hastily withdrew himselfe, he tore away a part thereof, by reason that Samuel violently withdrew himselfe from him. To whom the Prophet said, that in like sort his kingdome should be rent from him, and that another who was more honest and vpright, should take possession thereof: for God continued in his determination intended against him, because that to change and varie opinion is humane passion and not diuine puissance. Saul answered, that he had grieuously sinned, but it was impossible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithstanding besought him, that in the presence of the people he would as yet doe him honour, at such time as he should walke with him, and cast himselfe before the presence of God: which Samuel condescended vnto, and went with him to adore God. After this, Agag the king of the Amalechites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament and complaine that death was very bitter and tedious; to whom he answered in this manner following. As thou hast caused diuers mothers amongst the Hebrewes to weepe and lament the losse of their children; so shalt thou cause thy mothers sorrow and torment for thy death: which said, he presently commanded that he should be put to death in Galgal: as for himselfe he returned backe againe to the city of Ramath. But the King perceiuing in himself into how many mischiefes he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chiefe city called Gaba (which name signifieth a hillock) and from that day forwards he neuermore came into the Prophet Samuels presence, who was heartily sorry for his fall: But God cõmanded him to giue ouer his care, & that taking with him the sacred oyle he should repaire to the city of Bethleem to Iesse the son of Obed, & that there he should ſhould anoint one of his ſons for King according as he had commanded him: and when as the Prophet ſaid that he was afraid, leſt Saul getting notice thereof, ſhould either by treaſon or open force ſeeke to ſlay him, being encouraged and aſſured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed towne. In that place was he ſaluted with great concourſe of people, and each of them inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither: who anſwered them that he came to offer ſacrifice vnto God. Now when the oblatiõs were performed, he inuited Ieſſe and his ſonnes to banquet with him; and beholding the eldeſt of them to be faire and well proportioned, he coniectured by his ſtature and ſeemelines, that it ſhould be he that was to be elected King; but in this matter he attained not the ſcope of Gods prouidence. For demanding whether he ſhould anoynt that young man, whom in admiration he thought ſo worthy of the kingdome: it was anſwered him, that men ſaw not in ſuch manner as God doth. For thou (ſaid he) beholding the beauty of the young man, ſuppoſeſt him worthy of the kingdome: but I prize not royaltie and gouernment of eſtate, by the beauties of the body, but by the vertues of the ſoule: and him require I that is perfectly furniſhed herewith, and hath his mind beautified with pietie, iuſtice, obedience and fortitude. Vpon theſe words Samuel commanded Ieſſe to bring all his other ſonnes into his preſence, who preſented him with fiue others, the eldeſt of which was called Eliab, the ſecond Aminidab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fift Rael, and the ſixt Aſam. Now when the Prophet beheld theſe likewiſe no leſſe beautifull men then was the eldeſt, he asked of God which of them hee ſhould chooſe for King; he anſwered him that he ſhould chooſe neither of them: for which cauſe he enquired of Ieſſe whether he had any other ſons beſides thē: who told him that he had one which was called Dauid, who had the care and cuſtody of his flockes. Him did the Prophet ſodainly command him to ſend for, alledging that it was impoſſible for them to ſit downe to the banket, except he were preſent. Now when Dauid was arriued according as his father had commanded him; Samuel ſeeing him faire in colour, quicke in eye, and otherwaies anſwerable to his naturall ornaments: This is he (ſaid he in priuate to himſelfe) who is accepted and elected by God to be our King. This ſaid, hee ſat downe at the table, and made the young man ſit aboue him, and both Ieſſe his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruet of oyle in the preſence of the ſaid Dauid, he anointed him, and told him in his eare, how God had choſen him to bee King, and exhorted him to ſtudy iuſtice, and to be obedient to that which ſhould bee commanded him, aſſuring him by that meanes, that his kingdome ſhould be of long continuance, his family and ſtocke ſhould be famous & renowned, and that he ſhould ouercome the Philiſtins, and conquer thoſe nations againſt whom he ſhould fight, & obtaine glorious renowne in his life time, and leaue the ſame to his ſucceſſors as an inheritance. Samuel hauing made this exhortation, departed from him, and the Spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entred into Dauid, ſo as hee began to prophecy, by meanes of a diuine ſpirit wherewith he was ſeized: whereas on the other ſide, Saul was tormented with ſtrange paſſions of the euill ſpirit, whereby he fell into ſtrange ſuffocations, and ſtranglings: ſo as his Phyſicians could not inuent any remedy for him, but gaue counſell that ſearch ſhould be made, if a man might bee found that were expert and cunning in ſinging and playing on the harpe, to the end that when the euill ſpirit ſhould aſſault and trouble him, he might ſtand at his head, and both with voyce and inſtrument ſing ſacred hymnes before him. And when as the King had giuen preſent and ſpeedy command, that ſuch a one ſhould bee ſought after, one of thoſe that were aſſiſtant, told him that hee had ſeene in Bethleem a ſonne of Ieſſes, a young man of excellent feature, and beſides his other good parts, and bringing vp, very cunning both in ſong and playing on the Harpe: and beſides that, addreſt enough and toward in feates of armes. He therefore ſent meſſengers to Ieſſe to command him to withdraw Dauid from the folds, and to ſend him vnto him, becauſe that hauing heard report of his beautie and valour, he was deſirous to ſee him. This command of his did Ieſſe obey, and ſent his ſonne with preſents vnto Saul the King, who greatly reioyced vpon his arriuall, and made him his pentioner, and honoured him diuers wayes. For he was refreſhed by him, and was his onely Phiſician againſt the vexation of euill ſpirits, at ſuch time as they ſeized and poſſeſſed him: for by reciting and ſinging Pſalmes vpon his Harpe, he reſtored the King to his right mind: he therefore requeſted Ieſſe that he would ſuffer him to liue with him, and attend vpon him, becauſe hee was ſo much delighted with his preſence: whereunto he condeſcended, permitting him to dwell with the King.

CHAP. X.

A ſecond expedition of the Paleſtines againſt the Hebrewes.

The yeere of the world, 2883. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1081.

NOT long time after this, the Philiſtines aſſembled themſelues, and gathered together great companies of men of warre, with whom they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and ſubdued all that which is betweene Sucoth and Azeca, where they encamped. Saul on the other ſide led foorth his army againſt them, and encamping himſelfe vpon a certen mountaine, he conſtrained the Philiſtines to diſlodge from their firſt campe, and intrench thēſelues vpon another mountaine right ouer againſt that where he pitched his tents. The campes being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended it ſelfe betweene both the armies: Into this there deſcended a certaine man called Goliah, a Gittite, of huge ſtature, beeing foure cubites and a ſpan length in height, hauing his limmes couered with huge and mightie armour: for his curets which he bare on his backe, weighed fiue thouſand ſicles; his helmet and pouldrons were of braſſe, made fit to couer his maſſie mēbers; his ſpeare which he bare in his hand was no light lance, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, & the head thereof weighed 600. ſicles, and after him there followed diuers men bearing armes. Now when he came betwixt both the armies, hee ſtood vp and cried with a loud voice, addreſſing his ſpeech to Saul and the Hebrews in theſe tearmes: Hebrewes, what neede you to hazzard the doubtfull fortune of warre? Single me out an aduerſarie, and let vs determine by our two hazzards on whoſe ſide the victory & conqueſt ſhall fall: ſo that whoſeſoeuer ſouldier ſhall be ouercome, let his party be adiudged ſubiect to their ſides who haue the victory: for it were better that ſome one among you, then the whole army ſhould be brought in hazzard. When he had ſpoken thus, he returned back to his owne camp. The next day he came foorth againe and vſed the ſame words, and thus for forty dayes ſpace ceaſed he not to defie the Hebrewes in ſuch like words, and vnder the ſame conditions: ſo that both Saul and all his army were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelues alwaies ready and arranged in battell, although the fight was begunne on neither ſide. During the time that Saul addreſſed himſelfe to this expedition, he ſent Dauid backe againe to Ieſſe his father (contenting himſelfe with his other three brothers, who at that time ſerued vnder his royall ſtandard) where hee intended his intermitted care of keeping his flocks: But whilſt the war was rather protracted then performed, whither his father had ſent him to carry victuals to his brothers, and to know how their affaires went in the armie, and whileſt that Dauid deuiſed with his brothers, as touching thoſe things which his father had committed to his charge: he heard the Philiſtine blaſpheming and railing vpon the Hebrew army, and was therewith ſo greatly mooued, that turning himſelfe vnto his brothers, he told them that he was ready and addreſſed to fight hand to hand againſt that enemie. But Eliab the elder brother reproued him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardy then became his age, and that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to returne vnto his father, and intend his flocks. Dauid for the reuerence he bare vnto his brother departed from thence, and meeting with certaine ſoldiers, ſaid vnto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud chalenger: which they preſently ſignified vnto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeek him out. Now when he came before his preſence, he asked him what he intended to doe? O King (ſaid he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy feare ouermaſter thee. For I am hee that will abate the pride of this enemy, and encounter and enter combate with him: and how great and high ſoeuer he be, how elate and fierce ſoeuer he ſhew himſelfe, I will ſubdue him, and turne his terrour to deriſion: and ſo much the more ſhall the glory, and the honour of thy army be enhaunced, by how much ſo great and expert a man at armes ſhall bee ſubdued by a young man, and an vnexperienced ſouldier. Saul amazed at his hardineſſe, and great courage; yet notwithſtanding, ſuſpecting him by reaſon of his yeeres; told him that hee was too feeble, to encounter a man ſo expert in feates of armes: whereunto Dauid made this anſwer, That which I promiſe you (my ſoueraigne) is vnder the aſſurance which I haue in God, which heretofore I haue prooued, and the ſuccour which at other times I haue receiued at his hands. For whiles I fed my fathers flocks, I redeemed a lambe that was rauiſhed out of my fold, out of the lions iawes; and catching the wilde beaſt by the taile, that with open mouth aſſaulted and ſought to deuoure me, I beat him to the ground, and ſlue him. Neither with leſſe ſucceſſe inuaded I a Beare that ſet vpon my flocke; and as light doe I ſet by this monſter alſo: who vomiting out his ſlanderous raylings both againſt God, and men, ſhall neither eſcape the diuine arme of iuſtice which he ſo wickedly prouoketh, neither flie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him.

So

So much preuailed this forward readineſſe in the young man, that the King beſeeching Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſhed him with a royall armour, a ſword and a helmet, and ſent him forth to the battell. But Dauid feeling the weight of his armour, and ſeeming rather to be loaded then defenced with the ſame, ſaid vnto him: Let theſe armes (O King) ſerue to incloſe and defence thy body, who art able to beare them, and ſuffer me I beſeech thee, who am thy ſeruant, to fight according to mine owne fantaſie. He therefore laid vp his armour, and tooke a ſtaffe in his hand, and fiue ſtones which he gathered on the bankes of the torrent, which he put in his ſcrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemie. Now when the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorne he asked him whether he thought him to be a dogge, that hee thus came forth to fight with him, with weapons fit to ſcare dogges? Nay (ſaid Dauid) I eſteeme thee worſer then a dog: which ſo much peruerted Goliahs patience, that he curſed the name of his god, thundring out threats, that he would caſt out his carkeiſe to be deuoured by the beaſts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But Dauid anſwered, Thou commeſt againſt me with thy ſword, thy iauelin, and curets: but contrariwiſe, I march out againſt thee vnder the warrantiſe and protection of God, who ſhall deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole army, for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy body to the dogs whom thou reſembleſt, and all men ſhall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrewes, and that our armes and forces are the cares that it pleaſeth him to haue of vs, and that all other furniture of warre is vnprofitable, except it be aſſiſted by God. The waight of the Philiſtines armes hindred him from marching readily: ſo that he marched foote by foote towards Dauid, contemning him and truſting that he ſhould kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, as alſo becauſe he was young, and tender in yeeres.

CHAP. XI.

The ſingle combate betwixt DAVID and GOLIAH, and the ſlaughter of the Philiſtines that followed after.

DAVID ſet forward to make head againſt the enemy, beeing aſſiſted by a companion whom he ſaw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the ſtones, which he had gathered on the bankes of the torrent, out of his ſcrip, and hauing fitted it to his ſling, he forced it againſt Goliah, and gaue him ſuch a ſtroke on the forehead, that hee pierced him to the very braine: ſo that Goliah fell downe ſuddenly dead, and he running vpon him as he lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his owne ſword: for he himſelfe had none. As ſoone as he was ſtrooken downe, diſcomfiture and flight ſeiſed all the Army of the Philiſtines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed warriour amongſt them ouerthrowne and ſlaine, they began to ſuſpect the generall iſſue of their warre, and reſolued to retire from thence; ſo they tooke their flight in diſorder and confuſion, ſuppoſing by that meanes to deliuer themſelues out of dangers. But Saul and the whole armie of the Hebrewes ſallied out againſt them, with great ſhouts and cries; and in the perſuite made a great ſlaughter of them, and draue them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Aſcalon. In this battell there died on the Philiſtines ſide aboue thirty thouſand, and the reſt that were hurt and wounded, were twice as many. Saul returning backe into his campe, pillaged and burnt their tents: but Dauid bore Goliahs head into his pauillion, and hung his ſword in the Tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame vnto God. But Saul afterward conceiued a priuie hatred againſt Dauid, vpon this occaſion which enſueth: For whereas he returned triumphant like a conquerour with an armie, and the women and maidens ſinging and dancing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meete him: The women ſung, that Saul had ſlaine diuers thouſands of the Philiſtines; and the virgins anſwered, that Dauid had ſlain diuers ten thouſands. Which when Saul vnderſtood, and ſaw that the leſſer teſtimonie of thouſands was referred to him, and that the ten thouſands were attributed to Dauid, he ſuppoſed that after ſo glorious a renowne, there wanted nothing for Dauid, except to be King. For which cauſe he began to feare and ſuſpect him: ſo that by reaſon of the feare he had of him, he thought that he was too neere his owne perſon, and therefore from being one of the chiefeſt in authoritie about him, which was to bee one of his chiefe Commanders and guard, hee made him Captaine ouer a thouſand, rather reſpecting his owne ſecuritie, then the others honour; to the intent that being often charged by incurſions of the enemie, hee might by ſome diſaſter be depriued of his life. But Dauid hauing in all places the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, returned alwaies with with good ſucceſſe and happy iſſue: ſo that for the excellency of his valour, the people intirely loued him: and Sauls daughter alſo, that was about that time marriageable, began to bee inamoured with him, and ſo great and apparent was her affection towards Dauid, as the certaine notice thereof came vnto her fathers eares, who was ſore diſpleaſed therewith; yet hoping by that meanes the ſooner to intrappe him, he gaue eare thereto with ſome ſhew of allowance, and told them who diſcouered their loues vnto him, that he would willingly giue him his daughter to wife, vnder pretence that the enioying of her might be the meanes of his vtter ouerthrow: For (ſaid he) I am content to giue him my daughter in marriage, vnder that condition, that he bring mee ſixe hundred enemies heads; and he deſirous to get ſo high and famous a reward, and in like ſort to obtaine honor, by an act both ſo dangerous and admirable, will vndertake the execution thereof, and ſhall be ſlaine by the hands of the Philiſtines, and that intention which I haue conceiued againſt him, ſhall ſucceede according to mine owne hearts deſire: for I ſhall bee deliuered of him, in ſending him out of the world, not by my meanes, but by other mens hands. Further, he charged his Courtiers to ſound and ſeeke out Dauids reſolution, and how he was affectioned towards marriage: who beganne to deuiſe with him, telling him that the King bare him a moſt intire fauor, and that the people admitted him, and how they ſhould procure him the marriage of the Kings daughter. Whereunto Dauid replied: Thinke you it to be a ſmall matter to be ſon in law vnto the King? for my ſelfe I eſteeme otherwiſe, conſidering in eſpeciall mine owne baſe condition, who haue neither reputation nor any honourable quality. When Sauls ſeruants had related vnto him what anſwer Dauid had made them: Tell him (ſaid he) that I neither want goods nor preſents (for that were to expoſe my daughter to ſale, and not to match her with a husband.) I ſeeke for a ſonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue, ſuch as is manifeſt and apparent in thee: and my deſire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou giue me neither gold nor ſiluer, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers houſe; but the puniſhment of the Philiſtines, and ſixe hundred of their heads, which ſhall be the moſt deſired and accepted dower thou canſt preſent me with. My daughter alſo requeſted aboue all the dowers, that may accrew vnto her by order of law, to be married to ſuch a man that is ſo ennobled and famous by the ouerthrow of his enemies.

Sauls daughter in loue with Dauid. Saul ſubtilly obiecteth Dauid to ſlaughter, vnder a colourable condition of ſlaughtering the Paleſtines Saul vnder couenant of 600. Philiſtins heads promiſeth Dauid his daughter.

When theſe words were reported vnto Dauid, he was very ioyfull, thinking that Saul ſpake ſincerely of this affinitie: and without delay, or taking counſell or deliberation, whether the thing were eaſie or impoſſible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to goe and find out the enemy, and execute the condition, vnder which the marriage was promiſed him. For it was God that made all things eaſie and poſſible to Dauid: for after he had ſlaine diuers of them, and cut off ſixe hundred of their heads, he returned and preſented them to the King, and in conſideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

CHAP. XII.

SAVL admiring DAVIDS fortitude, giueth him his daughter to wife.

BVT Saul that could not flie from his promiſe (for feare leſt it ſhould bee a great diſhonour for him to be found a lyer, or to haue promiſed Dauid his daughter vnder colour, either to murther him, or to draw him to the execution of things that were impoſſible) deliuered his daughter Michol vnto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that mind. For perceiuing that Dauid was gracious in Gods ſight, and in good reputation amongſt the people, he was afraid of him: and being vnable to conceale his feare he had conceiued, to bee depriued of two things of ſuch conſequence, as were his kingdome and life, hee reſolued to kill Dauid; giuing commiſſion to his ſonne Ionathan, and diuers other of his ſeruants to execute the ſame. But Ionathan amazed to ſee this change in his father, who in ſtead of the ſingular good liking he had of Dauid in times paſt, ſought to hurt Dauid, not in any ſlight ſort, but by indangering his life: and on the other ſide being ſingularly affected towards him, and reſpecting of his vertue, he communicated the ſecret and deliberation of his father with him, counſelling him to haue care of himſelfe, and to flie vpon the next morrow, and that in the meane while he would go and ſalute his father, and as ſoone as the occaſion preſented it ſelfe, hee would ſpeake and conferre with him, to know the cauſe of his conceiued diſpleaſure againſt him, to the intent he might pacifie the ſame: ſuppoſing it to be a matter vnreaſonable, that hee ſhould be depriued of life, to whom the people were ſo much indebted, and who in particular was his eſteemed and vowed friend:

CHAP. XIII.

How the King practiſed to murther DAVID.

THE next day after, Ionathan came vnto Saul, and finding him merry and well diſpoſed, he began to ſpeake vnto him to this effect, as concerning Dauid. In what fault (O Father) either great or ſmall haue you found Dauid guilty, that you haue ordained and commanded him to be done to death? who is ſuch a man as for the conſeruation of your own perſon, hath bin very profitable, and beſides that hath preiudiced the eſtate of the Philiſtines, and inhanced the honour of the people of the Hebrews, and hath deliuered them from that diſgrace and mockery, wherewith they haue beene curbed for the ſpace of forty yeers: ſo that he onely hath dared, and oppoſed himſelfe againſt the proud defies of the enemy; and ſince that time hath brought ſo many of the Philiſtines heads as was commanded him, in recompence whereof he hath had my ſiſter to wife: ſo that his death ſhould be a great diſpleaſure vnto vs, not only by reaſon of the vertue wherwith he is endowed, but alſo through occaſion of his alliance with vs in blood and conſanguinitie. For by his death your daughter ſhall partake part of the iniurie, by reaſon that ſhe ſhall ſuffereth incommodity of widdowhood, before ſhe hath taſted the fruits and commodities of marriage. Weight theſe things, and pacifie your diſpleaſure, & do no wrong vnto ſuch a man, who firſt of all hath beene the author of your ſo good and great fortunes, as is the conſeruation of your perſon at ſuch time, as you were poſſeſſed and tormented with euill ſpirits: and hath brought to paſſe that your furies are alayed: and ſecondly, hath reuenged you of your enemies. For it is a thing vnworthy either your maieſtie or the name of a man, to forget good deſerts. With theſe words was Saul pacified, ſo that he ſwore vnto his ſonne that he would not iniure Dauid: for his iuſt perſwaſions and arguments were more ſtronger, then the choler and feare of the King. Ionathan ſent to ſeeke out Dauid, and told him theſe good and happy tidings from his father, and brought him vnto him, where he liued and remained in ſort as he did beforetime.

Ionathan reckoneth vp vnto his father the good deſerts of Dauid praying him to pacifie his diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him.

CHAP. XIIII.

How hardly DAVID eſcaped the ambuſhes that were often laid for him by the King; yet hauing him twice at aduantage and in his power, would not murther him.

ABOVT the ſame time, whileſt the Philiſtines led forth their armie anew againſt the Hebrewes, Saul ſent out Dauid againſt them accompanied with his forces, who encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and returned vnto the King with a great victory. But Saul entertained him not, both as he deſerued, and the happy exploit atchieued by him did merit; but deſpited and enuied his good actions and honourable deſerts, as if Dauids happy ſucceſſe had bin Sauls diſaduantage and preiudice. But as ſuch time as the euill ſpirit returned anew and both ſeized and vexed him, he lodged him in his own chamber where he lay, and hauing at that time a iauelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his harp and to ſing hymnes. Now whileſt Dauid executed that his commandement, Saul ſtretching out his arme, threw his dart at him: but Dauid forſeeing it, auoided the ſtroke, and fled into his owne houſe, where he ſoiourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the King ſent out certaine of his ſeruants to watch his houſe for feare leſt he ſhould eſcape, to the end that the next day being drawne and appearing in iudgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, Dauids wife, and Sauls daughter, hauing intelligence of her fathers intention, ran vnto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he and ſhee were, who without his preſence neither could nor would liue any longer. Beware (ſaid he) leſt the ſunne finde thee in this place, for he ſhall no more behold thee here hereafter. Flie therefore whileſt the preſent night offereth thee opportunitie, which God doth lengthen for thy ſafetie ſake: for be aſſured that if thou be ſurprized in this place, my father will make thee die a miſerable death. This ſaid, ſhee let him downe by a window, and ſo ſaued him; and incontinently after, ſhee prepared his bed, and trimmed it as if he lay ſicke therein, therein, and vnder the couering thereof shee laid the liuer of a new slaughtered Kid: and when her father had sent the next morning to apprehend Dauid, shee answered that he had beene sicke all the night long: then discouering the bed that was couered, shee gaue them to vnderstand that Dauid was laid therein, making them touch the couerlet vnder which the liuer stirred, and made them beleeue that the liuer that lay there was Dauid, who panted and breathed very hardly. Which being signified vnto Saul, hee commanded that he should be brought vnto him in that estate wherein he was, because hee was resolued to put him to death. But when Sauls messengers were arriued and returned thither, and had discouered the bed, they perceiued Michols subtiltie, and went and certified the King thereof: who reprooued her very grieuously for that shee had saued his aduersarie, and deceiued her father. But she defended her selfe with words full of good apparance, saying, that Dauid had threatned to kill her; and how for that cause, and by the impulsion of feare, shee was drawne and induced to aide and saue him. For which cause shee ought to be pardoned, since by constraint and not offset purpose shee had furthered his escape. For (said shee) I thinke that you seeke not so greedily after the death of your enemie, as to preferre the same before the safety and security of your daughter. On these perswasions Saul pardoned his daughter.

Dauid expresseth to Samuel how the King was affected towards him.

Dauid deliuered from this perill came vnto the Prophet Samuel to Ramatha, & told him what ambushes the King had laid for him, and how hardly hee had escaped death by the stroke of his Iauelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, hee had alwaies shewed himselfe obedient: againe how hee had neuer ceased to warre vpon his enemies, and had by Gods assistance beene fortunate in all things, which was the cause that Saul was so displeased with him. The Prophet, informed of Sauls iniustice, forsooke the Citie of Ramath, and led Dauid to a certaine place called Galbaath where he remained with him. But as soone as Saul was informed that Dauid was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certaine souldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him vnto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were seized with the Spirit of God and began to prophecie. Which when Saul vnderstood, hee sent out others, who had the like encounter with the first. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company prophecy likewise, he was in the end so much despited, that hee came thither in his owne person. And when he drew neere the place before that Samuel saw him, hee made him prophecie; so that Saul comming towards him, was seized by aboundance of the spirit: so that he was rauished out of himselfe, and hauing despoyled himselfe of his raiment, hee lay prostrate all the day and the night long in the presence both of Samuel and Dauid. Dauid departed from thence, and went vnto Ionathan, to whom he complained of those ambushes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithstanding he had neuer committed either iniurie or fault against his father, yet did he earnestly pursue him to put him to death. Ionathan perswaded him that he should neither rashly suspect these things, nor be ouer-credulous in those reports which perhaps might be brought vnto him, but that he should trust him onely; who was assured that his father intended no euill against him: For if he had, he would haue told him, who is neuer wont to act any thing without his counsell. But Dauid sware vnto him that it was so, and besought him that he would beleeue his vnfained assertions, whereby he might the more easily procure his securitie, lest contemning his words, and supposing them to be fained and friuolous, he should by his death be ascertained of the sight and truth thereof: For he assured him that his father for that cause did not communicate his counsailes with him, because hee was assured of the loue and friendship that was betweene them. Ionathan sore aggrieued, that Dauid was so perswaded, and Sauls intention was such, asked him what hee desired at his hands, or wherein hee might shew him friendship? Dauid said vnto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou maist, and refuse mee in nothing. Now to morrow is the first day of the moneth, in which I was accustomed to dine at the Kings table, & if thou thinkest good, I will depart out of the Citie into the field, where I will lie hidden: if he aske for me, thou shalt say I am gone into the countrey of Bethleem where my tribe solemnizeth a feast; thou shalt certifie him also that thou hast giuen me leaue. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinary wish that frieds vse to such as go a iourney, know that he hath no hidden rancor, nor secret malice conceiued against me; but if he answer otherwise, it shal be an assured testimony that he complotteth some mischiefe against me, & this shalt thou ascertaine me of, as both becommeth my present calamity, & our mutuall friendship, which by vowed oath thou being my Lord, hast plighted with me who am thy seruant: And if thou thinke me vnworthy of this fauour and iniurious towards thy father, without expecting the sentence of his iustice, kill me now at this present with thine owne sword. These his last words so grieuously

Saul sent armed souldiers to apprehend Dauid, who began to prophecie, and he himselfe likewise comming thither prophecieth. 1. King. 10.

Dauid desired Ionathan to sound his father how he was affected towards him.

A grieuously strooke Ionathan to the heart, that hee promised him to accomplish his request, assuring him to certifie him if hee any wayes could perceiue that his father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be beleeued, he caused him to walke foorth with him into the cleere and open ayre, and there sware vnto him that hee would not pretermit any thing that might tend to the conseruation of Dauid. For (said he) that God that filleth and moderateth all things in this wide spred Vniuerse, and who, before I speake, knoweth my mind: he, I say, shall beare witnesse of that accord which shall be ratified betweene thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father, till such time as I know and haue conceiued his intention, and that, I haue entred into his secrets to know what sickenesse his soule is seized with; and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceale it from thee, but giue thee notice thereof, be it that he be
B appeased or displeased against thee. The same God knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be assistant vnto thee, as also he is at this present: and that hee abandon thee neuer, but make thee Lord ouer thine enemies, yea though it were my father, or my selfe. Onely remember mee in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children, and be as fauorable towards them, as I am affected to thee-ward at this present. After he had sworn this oath, he dismissed Dauid; willing him to conceale himselfe in a certaine place of the Plaine, where he ordinarily exercised himselfe: For that as soone as he vnderstood his fathers minde, he would returne thither with his Page, and if (saith hee) hauing shot three shafts at the marke, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them backe againe to mee, for that they are
C right before him, know thou that thou art to expect no euill from my father: but if thou heare me speake to the contrary, thinke thou that my father is incensed and mis-affected towards thee; yet howsoeuer it happen, I will doe my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwayes then wee expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such time as thou shalt obtaine thy happy dayes, and be thou fauourable vnto my children. Dauid being confirmed by Ionathans promises, retired himselfe to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnity of the new moone, after the King was purified according to the custome, he sate downe to take his repast: Now when his sonne Ionathan was set on his right side, and Abner the Generall of his Army on the left, Saul perceiued Dauids place was voide, and spake not a word, supposing that he was absent from that company, by reason hee was not purified since he had the company of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new moone that he was absent likewise, he asked his sonne
D Ionathan, why Iesses sonne both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at that feast? who answered him, that he was gone into his countrey (prosecuting the story, according as it had beene concluded betweene them) alleadging that his Tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assist the same. Further (said he) he inuited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assist the feast, for you know how entirely I loue the man. At this time knew Ionathan the displeasure his father had conceiued against Dauid, and perceiued most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceale his choller, but began to raile vpon his sonne, calling him Rebell and his enemy, and companion and confederate with Dauid, telling him that he shewed reuerence neither to him, nor to his mother, since he was so minded: and that he would not beleeue, but that as long as Dauid liued, their royall estate should be alwayes in continuall disturbance: Hee commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might doe iustice vpon him. Ionathan replyed, What euill hath Dauid committed, for which hee should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choller in words and disgraces, but taking hold of a Iauelin, he assaulted him and would haue slaine him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained by his friends. At that time did Ionathan cleerely discouer the hatred that Saul bare towards Dauid, and how instantly and seriously he sought his ruine, since welny for Dauids sake he had slaine his owne and eldest sonne. Then did Ionathan withdraw himselfe from the banquet, seeing with how little profit hee had pleaded, and so much was hee grieued that hee ceased not to weepe, and the rather since welny his father had vnkindly slaine him: And seeing that Dauid was adiudged to die, hee passed all the night long without sleepe, and about the day spring hee departed out of the City to the appointed field, making a shew that hee walked out to take his exercise; but indeed, it was to discouer vnto his friend the intent which his father had, according as it was couenanted betweene them. After that Ionathan had done that which he had promised, and sent backe his Page into the City, he came vnto Dauid, both to see and speake with him in priuate: who as soone as he perceiued him, cast himselfe prostrate at Ionathans feete, calling him the conseruer and maintainer of his life. But Ionathan lifted him vp from the earth, so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutuall kisses for a long time, lamented their yeeres with warme teares, and their vnfortunate friendſhip with bitter ſighes: they bewailed likewiſe their future ſeparation, no leſſe grieuous vnto them, then death it ſelfe. Finally, ſcarcely giuing any truce to their aboundant teares, and exhorting one another to haue in perpetuall remembrance their plighted faiths and promiſes, they departed one from the other.

Dauid commeth to Naban or Nob to Achimelech the high Prieſt.

Dauid flying from the King, and the war which he made againſt him, retyred himſelfe to the city of Nob to Achimelech the Prieſt: who ſeeing Dauid come alone vnto him without either friend or ſeruant, was amazed; and deſired to know the cauſe why he thus wandred without any attendance. Dauid told him that the King had ſent him about ſome ſecret execution, which might not be communicated vnto him, although he were deſirous to know it: and as touching my ſeruants (ſaid he) I haue commanded them to attend mee in this place. He further required him, that he would giue him ſuch things as were neceſſary for his voyage that he had to make, wherein he might performe the part of a friend, in ſuccouring him at ſuch time as he had neede of him.

Dauid receiuing Goliahs ſword, flieth to Geth to Achis king of the Paleſtins.

Which when he had condeſcended vnto, he requeſted him to giue him ſome armes, either ſword or iauelin (now in this place was there preſent one of Sauls ſeruants that was called Doeg a Syrian by nation, and the paſtor of the Kings mulets.) The Prieſt anſwered him, that he had no ſuch thing by him, except it were Goliahs ſword, which he himſelfe had hanged in the Tabernacle and dedicated vnto God, at ſuch time as he ſlew the Philiſtine. Dauid hauing gotten it, fled out of the countrey of the Hebrewes, and went vnto Geth, a countrey of the Philiſtines, wherein Achis was King. There being knowne by the Kings ſeruants, he was diſcouered and noted to bee that Dauid, that had ſlaine many thouſand Philiſtines. Dauid fearing to bee put to death by him, and ſuſpecting leſt hee ſhould fall into the ſame danger which hee had eſcaped by flying from Saul, counterfeited himſelfe to bee fooliſh and mad: ſo that the ſome frothed and iſſued out of his mouth; and counterfeited in all things ſo cunningly, that hee made the King of Geth beleeue moſt ſtedfaſtly that he was beſotted and frenzie in his ſickeneſſe. For which cauſe the King was wroth with his ſeruants, in that they had brought him a mad man, and commanded them with all expedition that might be, to driue him out of his countrey. Hauing in this ſort eſcaped out of the countrey of the Geths, he tranſported himſelfe into the tribe of Iuda, and being in the caue of Adullam, he ſent vnto his brothers to let them vnderſtand that he was there, who came vnto him with all their linage: and diuers others that either were in neede or ſtood in feare of Saul, reſorted vnto him, ſaying, that they were ready to performe whatſoeuer he ſhould command them: all which amounted to the number of foure hundreth or thereabouts. Dauid therefore being thus aſſured, by reaſon of the ſuccors and forces that came vnto him, diſlodged from thence & went to the King of the Moabites, beſeeching him that hee would bee pleaſed to entertaine his father and mother in that countrey, vntill ſuch time as hee vnderſtood what ſhould bee the iſſue or end of his affaires. The King vouchſafed him this fauour, and did them great honour all the time they were in his countrey. And as touching Dauid, he hauing receiued inſtructions by the commandement of the Prophet to abandon the deſart, and to ſoiourne in the tribe of Iuda: he obeyed him; ſo that comming to Saron, he made his abode in that place. But when Saul had vnderſtood that Dauid had beene ſeene with a number of men, hee fell into an extraordinary feare and trouble of minde: for knowing both the vnderſtanding and courage of the man, hee thought inwardly with himſelfe that hee would attempt no action that was not great, and ſuch a one as might not onely endanger his Kingdome, or at leaſtwiſe breed him much difficulty and labour. For which cauſe, aſſembling his friends and Captaines, and thoſe of his tribe in Gaba, where hee kept his royall Court, there ſitting in a place called Aror, where all his honourable and ciuill Magiſtrates, with the reſt of his Captaines and ſouldiers enuironed him round about, hee ſpake vnto them after this manner: Beloued friends, I know that you can beare witneſſe of my bounty, and how I haue aduanced ſome of you to honours, ſigniories and poſſeſſions, and haue preferred you to the chiefeſt dignities and prerogatiues amongſt the people. Now would I know of you whether you hope or expect from the ſonne of Ieſſe greater bounty and larger benefits, then I haue beſtowed vpon you: I know that all of you are confederated with him, and that my ſonne Ionathan likewiſe is of the ſame faction, and hath perſwaded you to follow and fauour him. For I am not ignorant both of the oathes and couenants that are paſt twixt him and Dauid, and am well aſſured that hee is both a counceller and aſſiſter vnto him in whatſoeuer hee vndertaketh againſt me: yet are none of you touched with theſe cares; but intending your owne quiet, you expect the euent of theſe matters.

A the Syrian maſter of the Kings mulets, aroſe and ſaid: That he had ſeene Dauid in the Citie of Nob, who reſorted to the high Prieſt Achimelech, to aske counſel of him as touching his affaires; that there he had receiued thoſe things that were needfull to furniſh him in his voyage, and Goliahs ſword likewiſe; and how he was ſafely conducted towards the place whither he pretended to goe. Hereupon Saul ſent for the high Prieſt and all his kinred, and ſpake thus vnto him, What wrong or diſpleaſure haue I done thee, that thou haſt entertained the ſonne of Ieſſe? and haſt deliuered him victuals and armes; to him, I ſay, that ſeeketh but the meanes to poſſeſſe himſelfe of my kingdome? What anſwer haſt thou made him as touching thoſe demands he preſented thee, in regard of his future fortunes? for thou haſt not beene ignorant that he fled from me, and what hatred he beares againſt both me and my family. The high Prieſt denied none of theſe B things, but freely confeſſed that he had deliuered him ſuch things as were reported, but not with an intent to gratifie Dauid, but the King: for I entertained him (ſaid he) not as thine enemy, but as thy faithfull miniſter and tribune; nay which is more, as thy ſonne in law, and ſuch a one as was tyed vnto thee by neere alliance. For who would haue thought, that he, who was intituled to ſo much honour by thee, ſhould be thine enemy: nay rather, who would not eſteeme him for thy fauourite and neereſt friend? And whereas he asked counſell of me as touching Gods will, this is not the firſt time I haue anſwered him, but oft and many other times haue I aduiſed him. And whereas he ſaid, that he was ſent by thee about ſome haſtie and ſecret buſineſſe, ſhould I haue refuſed him thoſe ſupplies which he required at my hands, I might haue bin iudged rather to haue done iniurie to thy maieſtie then to him. For which cauſe thou art not to ſuſpect or thinke euill C of me; or if thou haſt receiued any aduertiſement, that Dauid at this time intendeth ſome trouble and innouation againſt thee, oughteſt thou to think that by reaſon of the courteſie I haue ſhewed him, that I either fauour him or maintaine him againſt thee? for what I beſtowed, I imployed as on thy friend, thy ſonne in law and thy tribune; and whatſoeuer courteſie he receiued frō me, it was done vnto thee. Notwithſtanding all theſe iuſt allegations, yet could Saul be no waies induced to beleeue them: but contrariwiſe, his vehement feare made him ſuſpect the true iuſtifications of Achimelech: ſo that he commanded certaine armed men that were about him, that they ſhould put both him and all his family to the ſword. But when they held it no leſſe then ſacriledge, to violate by violent death ſuch as were men conſecrated vnto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to perpetrate the ſlaughter, who ioyning to himſelfe certaine other ſacrilegious D and impious men, he murthered Achimelech and all his race, who were in number three hundreth, thirtie and fiue men. He further ſent to Nob the citie of the Prieſts, and put all of them vnto the ſword, neither ſparing woman nor childe, nor hauing reſpect vnto any other age, but conſumed the whole Citie with fire, onely one ſonne of Achimelech eſcaped, who was called Abiathar. All which befortuned according as God had foretold the high Prieſt Eli, ſaying, that by reaſon of the tranſgreſſion of his two ſonnes, his poſteritie ſhould be extinguiſhed.

This cruell and malicious act perpetrated by King Saul (in extinguiſhing all the race of the ſacerdotall order, without compaſſion either of Infants, or reuerence of old age: this deſtruction of his of that Citie, which God had choſen to bee the countrey and common nurſe of the Prieſts and Prophets, and which he elected to be a receptacle and refuge of all that ſort of men) E manifeſtly expreſſeth and declareth vnto all men, how depraued and corrupt the minds of men are: For ſo long as they are humble, and limited by a baſe and priuate eſtate, becauſe they neither dare nor can haue libertie to giue ſcope to their vnbridled natures: they ſeeme to be good and iuſt men; and make ſhew of a wonderfull ſtudie of iuſtice, accompanying the ſame with pietie, and are perſwaded that God is preſent in all our actions: finally, that he beholdeth all our cogitations. But no ſooner haue they attained to power and empire, laying aſide their former and reformed manners, and taking vpon them as it were in a Stage-play, both a new habit and another perſonage, but they are deuoured in all audaciouſneſſe and inſolencie, and contempt of both diuine and humane lawes. And when as to ouercome their enuie, they had moſt neede of pietie and iuſtice; and when as not onely all their actions, but alſo their wils are expoſed to all F mens eyes: then moſt of all, as if either God diſſembled, or feared their power, they exerciſe their tyrannies vpon their ſubiects; and whatſoeuer they decree, either through vaine feare, hatred or vnreaſonable fauour, that ſuppoſe they both to be ratified by men, and allowed by God: being altogether depriued of either reſpect or reaſon of thoſe things that are to come. For whatſoeuer they be that ſpend their many and vnexhauſted labours in their ſeruice, thoſe doe they firſt preferre: and afterwards when they haue loaden them with the burthen of dignities, they through enuie not onely depriue of thoſe dignities; but through ſlander alſo doe oftētimes oppresse them, not considering how deseruedly they oppresse, but onely giuing credit without G proofe to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage, not on those they ought to punish, but those that may most easily be depressed and ouerthrowne. The manifest example hereof appeareth vnto vs in Saul the sonne of Cis: who after the gouernment of the nobility was extinct, and the supreme magistracie of Iudges was disannulled, beeing the first created King of the Hebrewes, onely for that hee suspected Achimelech, he slew three hundreth Priests and Prophets, and after he had slaine them, destroyed their citie with fire; and as much as in him lay, depriued the high Temple of God, not only of Priests, but sacred ministers; & after so hideous a slaughter, neither spared their countrey nor any of their offspring to be left aliue. But Abiathar Achimelechs sonne, who onely escaped with life amidst all his slaughtered family, flying vnto Dauid, declared vnto him both the ouerthrow of his family and the death of his father. Dauid H answered him, that hee expected no lesse then that which hapned, at such time as hee espied Doeg there, who as his minde gaue him, would not faile to reprooue and scandall Achimelech to Saul: yet tooke he it on him that the misfortune hapned vnto his friend by his meanes: he therefore praied him to remaine with him, because he could not be concealed or secured in any place better then with himselfe.

Abiathar escaping from Sauls hands, telleth Dauid of the slaughter of Achimelech his father, and of the Priests.

About the same time, Dauid vnderstanding that the Philistines made a road into the countrey of Cilla, and preied the same, determined to assault them, if after the Prophet had asked counsell of God, hee should bee by the oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordingly falling out, hee sallied out accompanied by his friends, and set vpon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recouered a very rich prey, and gaue conuoy to the Cillans, till I such time as they had safely gathered in and housed all their corne and fruite. The rumour of this his exploite was presently brought vnto Saul: for this noble act and happy execution was not onely not shut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renowne thereof was dispersed euery where both in other mens eares as also in the Kings, and both the action and the author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very ioyfull to heare that Dauid was in Cilla, and said thus: God hath deliuered him into my hands, by inforcing him to shut vp himself within a citie inclosed with wals, gates, and barres: whereupon he sodainly gaue commandement that all the people should march against Cilla, and besiege the same, and surprize or kill Dauid.

Saul seeketh to besiege Dauid in Cilla.

But Dauid hauing intelligence hereof, and aduertised by God, that if hee staied among the K Cillans, they would deliuer him into the hands of Saul, hee tooke with him his foure hundreth men, and retired himselfe from the Citie into the desart, and encamped on a defenced hill called Engaddi: so that the King being aduertised that he was fled from the Cillans, ceased to issue out in armes against him. From thence Dauid departed to a certaine place of the Ziphians, where Ionathan Sauls sonne met with him, and after hee had embraced him, hee exhorted him to bee of good cheere, and to conceiue an assured hope of future good fortune, and not to giue place to his present miseries, by reason that he should obtaine the kingdome, and should haue the whole power of the Hebrewes subiected vnto him; but that such things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great trauailes: and after they had once more renued the oath of mutuall and lasting amitie and faith betweene them, during all the time of their L liues, calling God to witnesse with imprecations against him, that should contradict or in any sort change those conuentions; Ionathan left Dauid somewhat eased in heart, and disburdened of his conceiued feare, and that done, returned to his owne home. But the Ziphians intending to gratifie Saul, told him that Dauid was amongst them, and promised him to deliuer him prisoner into his hands, if so be hee would issue out against him: insomuch as if hee would seize all the streights of the countrey, it should bee impossible for him to flie into any other place. The King praised their forwardnesse, and promised them to requite their loyalty, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection, and withall sent out certaine men to seeke out Dauid and to beake ouer the forrest, promising them that shortly hee would follow after them. Thus did the Gouernours & Princes of the Ziphians offer thẽselues vnto the King to search out M and apprehend him, expressing their affection therein, not onely in outward shew, but also with their whole power labouring what they might, that surprising him, they might deliuer him to the Kings hands. But their iniust desire had as infortunate successe: who beeing to incurre no perill by concealing him from pursuite, promised to betray into the Kings hands through adulation & auarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his enemies. For Dauid beeing made priuie to their malice, and ascertained of the Kings approach, leauing those Dauid hearing of the Kings coming, flieth to saue himselfe.

A thoſe narrow ſtraights wherin they then incamped, eſcaped to a certaine rock which is ſituate in the deſarts of Simon: Neither deſiſted Saul to purſue him; for knowing by the way that he had ouercome the ſtraights, he came to the other ſide of the rock, & Dauid had ſurely both bin taken and circumuented, had not the King been reuoked by fearfull tidings, which aſſured him that the Paleſtines had forcibly entred and ſpoiled his kingdome. For he thought it more conuenient to reuenge himſelfe on thoſe his hoſtile and ſworne enemies, and to giue ſuccour to his country and people, being ready to be ſpoiled and waſted, then vnder deſire to lay hands on a priuate enemie, to betray both his country & ſubiects to their ſwords; and thus was Dauid ſaued beyond all expectation, and retired himſelfe to the ſtraights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulſed the Paleſtines, certaine newes was brought him that Dauid dwelt in the ſtraights of Engaddi: where-
B upon, preſently taking with him three thouſand of the choiſeſt men in all his army, hee led them ſpeedily to the forenamed place, and being not far from thence, he perceiued neere vnto the high way, a deepe, hollow, large, long and open caue, whereas Dauid with his foure hundred men might be hidden, and deſcended himſelfe alone into the caue to disburthen the neceſſities of nature. This was preſently diſcouered by one of Dauids followers, who told him that GOD had preſented him a fit opportunity to reuenge him on his enemy, and counſelled him to cut off Sauls head, and to diſcharge himſelfe thereby of much trouble and torment; who ariſing and finding him out, onely cut off the lap of the veſture wherewith Saul was attired, & preſently thereupon repented himſelfe, ſaying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by elec-
C tion had raiſed to the eſtate of Maieſty and Empire. For (ſaid he) although he be vniuſt toward me, yet ought I not to be iniurious towards him.

But when Saul was iſſued out of the caue, Dauid went out after, & cried with a loud voice, beſeeching Saul that he would giue him audience: who turning back vnto him, he caſt himſelfe proſtrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the cuſtome, and ſpake after this manner; How vnworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy eares to ſcandalous backbiters, and giuing truſt and credit to vaine and looſe men, thou ſuſpecteſt thy moſt tried friends, whom thou rather oughteſt to iudge by their ſincere and vpright actions? for words may be either falſe or true, but the mind may bee diſcouered by none more apparant arguments then by mens actions: as at this preſent thou maiſt iudge, whether thou haſt raſhly beleeued them, that make mee guilty before thy Maieſtie of that crime, that was neuer yet ſo much as thought vpon, and haue ſo
D much exaſperated thee againſt me, that day & night thou thinkeſt on nothing more then my deſtruction: Seeſt thou not now how vaine thy opinion is, whereby they perſwade thee, that I am an enemy of thy houſe, and earneſtly deſirous of thy death? Or with what eies thinkeſt thou doth God behold thy cruelty, who requireſt his death, who hauing occaſion and opportunity offered him to be reuenged on thee, ſpareth thy life, whoſe life were it in thy hands, were aſſuredly loſt? for as eaſily might I haue cut off thy head, as this lap of thy garment (and therewithall, in confirmation of his words, he ſhewed it him) yet did I forbeare this iuſt reuenge: yet contrariwiſe art not thou afraid to exerciſe thy vniuſt tyrannies againſt me. But God ſhal beare witnes hereof, & ſhal approue which of vs both are of more peaceable behauiors. Saul amazed to ſee how ſtrangely his life had bin preſerued, and rauiſhed to conſider the naturall mildneſſe and moderation in E Dauid, began to weep, & Dauid wept alſo: but Saul ſaid that he had greater cauſe to lament then he. For, ſaid he, by thy meanes haue I receiued many benefits, and thou at my hands haſt been repaied with infinite iniuries. This day haſt thou teſtified that thou retaineſt the ancient iuſtice of thy progenitors, who commanded that their enemies ſhould be diſmiſſed with life, at ſuch time as they were ſurprized in the deſart: now am I thorowly perſwaded that God hath reſerued the kingdom for thee, & that the Empire of all the Hebrews attendeth thee. Aſſure thou me therfore by an oth, that thou wilt not exterminate my race, neither remēber thee of thoſe iniuries I haue done vnto thee, but that ſparing my poſterity, thou warrantize and keep them vnder thy protection. Dauid ſware vnto him according as hee had required, and ſuffered him to returne into his Realme, and both he and his companies retired themſelues to the ſtraights of Maſpha. About the F ſame time died Samuel the Prophet, a man who by his merit was in great eſtimation amongſt the Hebrews, the famous teſtimony of whoſe vertue, and the peoples obſeruation towards him, was expreſſed in this, in that they celebrated his funerall, and ſet out his ſepulcher with great pompe: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented him many daies, not after the manner of a common or forraine miſery, but as if each one of them had in particular a preiudice and loſſe to lament for. For, he was a man that was naturally framed to all iuſtice and goodneſſe, and for theſe his vertues moſt acceptable vnto God. Hee gouerned the people after the death of Eli the high Prieſt, firſt in his owne perſon, for the ſpace of twelue yeeres, and afterwards during the raigne of Saul eighteene yeeres, whoſe death hapned (as I ſaid) about this time. But in thoſe places where Dauid at that time remained, there was a certaine Ziphian in a towne called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattell. For he had a troupe of three thouſand ſheepe, & a heard of a thouſand Goats. On theſe did Dauid cõmand his people to commit no waſte; neither through deſire, nor neceſſity, nor hope of concealemẽt, they ſhould doe him any hurt. Charging them moreouer, that they ſhould offer no wrong vnto any man, becauſe that to violate and take another mans goods, was both vnlawfull and wicked, and contrary to Gods commandement. He inſtructed them in this ſort, imagining with himſelfe, that he ſhould gratifie a good man, and ſuch a one as deſerued to be in like ſort fauoured: but Nabal (for ſuch was his name) was a rude and curriſh perſon, leading his life in hunting. Yet had he a wife that was good, wiſe and faire.

Nabals flocks ſpared by Dauid.

To this Nabal did Dauid ſend tenne of his ſeruants about the time of his ſheepe-ſhearing, both to ſalute him, as alſo to wiſh him all good, and to beſeech God, that for diuers yeeres he would grant him grace to doe the like. Meane while he requeſted him, that hee would impart vnto him ſomewhat of that which was in his power, when as his ſheepheards could informe him, that hauing long time remained in the deſart, wee haue, ſaid they, beene ſo farre off from doing your flocks any harme, as we haue rather ſeemed to be their ſheepheards and keepers: they promiſed him likewiſe, that whatſoeuer courteſie he ſhould ſhew vnto Dauid, he ſhould beſtow it on a mindfull & thankfull perſonage. Thus ſpake the meſſengers vnto Nabal: but hee anſwered them very diſcourteouſly, and rudely, demanding of them what that Dauid was? and beeing informed that he was the ſonne of Ieſſe: Now, (ſaid he) theſe fugitiues and ſlaues forſaking their Maſters, liue proudly and inſolently.

Dauids embaſſage to Nabal to require reliefe, and his curriſh anſwer.

Dauid, hearing of this report, was grieuouſly diſpleaſed, and commanded foure hundred of his men to take vp their weapons and follow him, commanding two hundred to keepe the baggage (for at that time he had ſixe hundreth) and in this equipage marched hee forward againſt Nabal, ſwearing, that that very night he would vtterly exterminate & root out all his race, and ranſacke all his riches. Neither was he only diſpleaſed for that Nabal was ingratefull towards them, without reſpect of that humanity which they had ſhewed towards him, & his; but alſo, for that without any cauſe of iniury offered, he had iniured and outraged him in words.

Dauid ſallieth out againſt Nabal with 400. armed men.

In the meane while, certaine ſheepheards that attended Nabals cattell, told their Miſtreſſe their Maſters wife, that Dauid hauing ſent vnto her husband to require ſome ſmall courteſie, had not onely obtained nothing, but alſo receiued inſupportable iniuries, whereas till that day he had ſuffered his flocks to be vntouched: telling her that that inſolency of their Lord, might breede them all much woe and miſery. Which when Abigal heard (for ſo was the woman called) ſhe loded diuers Aſſes with all ſorts of preſents (without making any motion to her husband, who was ſo drunke that he was inſenſible) and went towards Dauid. As therefore ſhe deſcended the ſtraights of the mountaine, Dauid encountred her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with foure hundred men. As ſoone as Abigal perceiued him, ſhe leaped from her Steed, and falling vpon her face, ſhe proſtrated her ſelfe before him, beſeeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was anſwerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal ſignifieth folly: ſhe excuſed her ſelfe likewiſe, ſaying, that ſhe ſaw none of them that were ſent vnto her husband. For which cauſe ſhe ſaid, I beſeech thee grant me pardon, and giue God thanks, that by my means he hath hindered you from polluting your hands in innocent blood: for if thou remaine pure and innocent from bloudſhed, he ſhall exact a puniſhment at their hands that haue hurt thee. For thoſe misfortunes that attend on Nabal, ſhall fall on the heads of thine enemies: onely be thou fauourable vnto me in accepting theſe my humble preſents, and for my ſake remit that wrath which thou haſt iuſtly conceiued againſt my husband: for clemency and humanity becommeth him whom the Fates haue deſtinated a kingdome. Dauid accepting her preſents, gaue her an anſwer after this manner: Woman, ſaid he, GOD of his goodneſſe hath this day brought thee hither, otherwiſe, thou haddeſt not liued, or ſeene the next morning. For I haue ſworne, that this night I would ouerthrow thy houſe, and leaue none aliue of that vngratefull mans family, who hath ſo contumeliouſly abuſed both me and mine: but now God hath put thee in mind wiſely to preuent and pacifie my wrath.

Nabal ſignifieth a foole.

As touching Nabal, although at this preſent hee bee exempted by thy meanes from puniſhment, yet ſhall hee not eſcape, but he ſhall loſe his life: for his manners vpon another occaſion ſhall be the cauſe of his ruine. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abigal: who returning to her houſe, and finding

Which when Dauid vnderſtood, he ſaid that he was deſeruedly puniſhed by God, becauſe that his owne wickedneſſe was the cauſe of his puniſhment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who receiued the iniurie were vndiſtained with blood: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can eſcape Gods iudgement, and that all humane affaires are not raſhly diſpoſed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodneſſe, and the wicked puniſhed accor-
B ding to their wickedneſſe. He afterwards ſent meſſengers to his wife, and cauſed her to come vnto him, to the intent he might marrie her, and take her to his wife. Shee anſwered the meſſengers, that ſhe thought her ſelfe vnworthie to lie at his feete: notwithſtanding ſhe repaired vnto him with all her furniture and meanes whatſoeuer, and was married to Dauid, hauing obtained that degree of honour, both in that ſhe was modeſt and iuſt, as alſo for that ſhe was beautifull. Now Dauid had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the Citie of Abeſar.

As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gaue her to wife at Liſſa to the ſonne of Phalti of the Citie of Gethla. After this, certaine Ziphians comming vnto Saul, told him that Dauid was returned againe into their countrey, and that if it pleaſed him to aſſiſt them, they might eaſily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul iſſued with three thouſand
C armed men, and being ſurprized by night, he incamped in a certaine place called Siceleg.

When Dauid was certified that Saul was iſſued forth againſt him, he ſent out certaine Spies, whom he gaue in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired; who aſcertaining him that he was at Siceleg; he watched all that night without the knowledge of any of his followers, and went into Sauls campe, attended onely by Abiſai his ſiſter Saruias ſonne, and Achimelech the Chittite.

Now whilſt Saul was aſleep, & both his Generall Abner with all his ſouldiers wholly deuoured in drowſineſſe, Dauid entred into the Kings campe: and although he knew the Kings pauilion, by reaſon of his Iauelin that ſtood at the doore therof, yet ſlew he him not, neither permitted he Abiſai, who was both willing and addreſſed to execute the ſlaughter, to performe it. But this he ſaid, that although the King were euill, yet notwithſtanding it were a ſtrange and vndecent thing
D for him, to ſlay him who was Gods elected: for that it was Gods right to take reuenge on him, who had giuen the kingdome: and thus reſtrained he the others vnbridled furie. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that hauing the opportunitie to ſlay him, he had ſpared his life; he bare away with him his Iauelin, and the pitcher of water that ſtood by Saul whilſt he ſlept, without the witting or knowledge of any of the campe: ſo much were they deuoured and ouerhaled with ſleepe. He therefore departed thence in all aſſurance, hauing executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to doe. But after he had paſſed the riuer, and had attained the top of a mountaine, from whence he might be eaſily heard, he cried out to Sauls ſouldiers, and their Generall Abner ſo ſtrongly, that he awaked them from their ſleep; and call-
E ling vpon Abner as well as the commõ ſort of ſouldiers, the Generall asked who it was that called him? to whom Dauid anſwered, It is I, the ſonne of Ieſſe, your fugitiue: but, ſaid he, How commeth it to paſſe, that thou who art ſo great, and in chiefeſt authoritie about the King, haſt ſo ſmall reſpect and guard of his perſon? Thy ſleepe is more pleaſant vnto thee then thy watch for his conſeruation. Aſſuredly this act of thine deſerueth a capitall puniſhment, becauſe thou neither haſt diſcouered me, nor any others before we entred the campe, or approched the King. Seeke for the Kings Iauelin & his pitcher of water, and thou ſhalt perceiue in what great danger he hath beene euen in the midſt of you, without any notice or diſcouery of yours.

Saul perceiuing that it was Dauids voice, and conceiued how that being in his hands (whom he had ſurprized in the depth of ſleep, through the negligẽce of his guard) he had not ſlaine him, but pardoned him his life, although it iuſtly lay in his power to take his head frõ him: he ſaid,
F that he gaue him thankes, and acknowledged his life from him, exhorting him to be aſſured, & without ſuſpect of any euill to returne home vnto his houſe, becauſe he was perſwaded, that he loued not himſelfe ſo much, as he was intirely affected by Dauid; notwithſtanding that he had purſued him, and for a long time paſt had chaſed him like a fugitiue, conſtraining him alſo by diuers afflictions and great torments of ſpirit, to be abandoned from his deareſt parents & friends: yea from Dauid himſelf, who might haue preſerued him, and who had giuen him diuers demonſtrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had beene oftentimes preſerued; whom notwith-

notwithstanding he ceased not to pursue vnto the death, who contrariwise desired nothing more then his life. Hereupon Dauid willed him to send some one of his seruants to bring backe his Iauelin and pitcher of water: protesting that God should be Iudge of both their natures, manners and actions, who knew that that day also hee had spared his enemie, whom if he had so thought good, he might haue extinguished.

Saul hauing this second time escaped from Dauids hands, returned to his royall house. But Dauid, fearing lest if he soiourned in that place, he should be intrapped by Saul, thought good to retire himselfe into the countrey of the Philistines, and soiourne there. So that accompanied with sixe hundred men which he had with him, he transported himselfe to Achis King of Geth, one of their fiue Cities; who receiued him with all his people, & gaue him a place to dwell in: so that he aboad in Geth, hauing with him his two wiues, Achimaas and Abigal. Which when Saul vnderstood, he made no more account to send or sally out against him, because that two seuerall times he had bin in danger of his life, at such time as he pursued him to intrap him. Dauid held it not conuenient to remaine in the Citie of Geth, and therefore requested the King of the Philistines, that sith he had courteously entertained him, it might please him likewise to do him the fauour to assigne him a certaine place in his countrey, where he might make his habitation, because he feared to be chargeable to him, if so be he remained in the citie. Achis assigned to him a village called Siceleg, which Dauid after he obtained the kingdome, loued and honoured, holding that for his owne demaine, as his owne children and heires did after him. But hereof will we speake in another place. The time that Dauid liued amongst the Philistines and in the towne of Siceleg, were foure moneths and twentie daies; during which time, by seuerall and secret excursions against the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he spoiled their countrey and returned backe againe with a great bootie of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bondmen, lest Achis by their meanes should haue intelligence of his enterprize. He sent likewise a part of the prey vnto the King, & when he demanded from whom he had taken the same, he answered that he had taken it from the Iewes that dwelt Southward and in the Plaine, perswading him that he had done no losse: so that Achis conceiued an opinion, that since Dauid warred against his owne nation all the time of his aboad with him, he would be a faithfull seruant vnto him. About the same time, the Philistines hauing determined to lead forth their armie against the Israelites, sent out to their allies, requiring them to assist them in that warre, and to make their Rendeuous at Renga, to the intent that being there assembled, they might dislodge and assaile the Israelites. Amongst their other auxiliarie companies, Achis had requested Dauid to assist him, with his sixe hundred souldiers: which he promised him willingly to performe, telling him that the opportunitie was now come wherein he might requite his courtesie, and the hospitalitie he had shewed him. Achis promised him that after the victorie, when as all things had succeeded according as he desired, he would preferre Dauid to the guard of his person; thinking by the promise of this honour and trust, he might augment Dauids forwardnesse and affection towards him.

CHAP. XV.

The yeere of the world, 2890. before Christs Natiuitie, 1074.

BVT Saul about this time had banished all Diuiners and Inchanters, and in generall, all such as were tellers of fortunes, reseruing none within his countrey, but the Prophets. When as therfore he vnderstood that the Palestines were already vp in armes, and strongly encamped neere to the Citie of Sonna, situate in the Plaine, he marched forward and made head against them with all his forces. And as soone as he drew neere to the mountaine of Gelboa, he incāped right ouer against the enemie. Now when his armie discouered their great forces, they were much discomforted, and no sooner beheld it but were amazed. Being therfore sore troubled herewith, he sought counsell at Gods hands as touching the euent of the battell: and seeing he returned him no answer, his heart more & more failed him, in that he manifestly perceiued what sinister successe would betide him, if God should not assist him in the conflict. He therefore commanded that they should search him out some Pythonissa or cunning enchantresse, who inuocated & raised the spirits of the dead, to the end that by her means he might know if his wars should haue that successe which he pretended (for the Diuiners which gaue answer by the belly, which the Greekes call Engastrimythes, declare their aduentures to those that aske them.) And when Saul banisheth all diuiners and enchanters out of his kingdome.

Saul hearing the Philistines made head against him, asked counsel of God.

when as by the report of a certaine familiar friend of his, he was aduertiſed that there was ſuch a one at Endor, vnwitting to his whole armie, and laying aſide his royall habites, and attended onely by two, whom he eſteemed for his moſt faithfull ſeruants, he repaired to Endor to this woman, requiring her to diuine and raiſe vp the ſpirit of him whom he ſhould name. The woman denied, and ſaid, that ſhee ought not to contradict the Kings edict, who had driuen out of his Realme all ſuch ſort of Soothſayers, telling him that hee did not well, that hauing receiued no wrong at her hands, he ſhould thus ſound her, and ſeeke to bring her in lapſe of the Kings lawes, and cauſe her to be puniſhed. But Saul ſwore vnto her, that no man ſhould know thereof, and that he would not diſcouer her diuination to others: briefely, that ſhee ſhould incurre no danger thereby.

Saul repaireth to Endor to aske counſell of a Sorcereſſe.

After then, that by his oathes and proteſtations he had perſwaded her, that ſhe ſhould haue no cauſe to feare, he commanded her to raiſe the ſpirit of Samuel. Shee not knowing what Samuel was, called him from hell, and he ſuddenly appeared. But when ſhe perceiued that it was an honourable man, and of diuine ſemblance, ſhe was ſore troubled; and being wholly diſcomforted with this viſion, ſhe turned and ſaid vnto the King: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no leſſe. Saul confeſſed that it was he, and asked her for what cauſe ſhe ſeemed to be ſo much troubled? Shee anſwered, that ſhee ſaw a man aſcend that reſembled God. Saul commanded her to declare vnto him his ſhape, habit, and age: and ſhe gaue him to vnderſtand that he was a reuerend old man, attired in the veſtment of an high Prieſt. By theſe markes Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, proſtrating himſelfe on the earth, he adored and ſaluted him. The ſpirit of Samuel asked him for what cauſe he had troubled and raiſed him? To whom he complained and lamented that he was inforced thereunto by neceſſity: for that a grieuous hoſt of his enemies were at hand, and that void of counſell, he was forſaken by God, hauing from him no prediction, either by prophecie or dreame: for which cauſe, ſaid he, I made my recourſe vnto thee, who haſt alwayes had care both of mee and my fortunes. But Samuel foreſeeing that the Kings death was hard at hand, anſwered him that it was in vaine for him to queſtion with him, as touching thoſe things that ſhould happen, ſince thou knoweſt that thou art forſaken by God. Know therefore, ſaid he, that Dauid ſhall poſſeſſe the Kingdome, and that it is he that ſhall eſtabliſh the eſtate by armes: but as concerning thy ſelfe, thou ſhalt loſe both thy Kingdome and thy life, becauſe thou haſt diſobeyed God in thy warre againſt the Amalechites, and haſt not obſerued his commandements, according as I foretold thee at ſuch time as I was aliue. Know therefore, that thy people and hoſt ſhall be diſconfited by the enemy, and that both thou and thy ſonnes ſhall be to morrow ſlaine in the battell, and be with mee. When Saul vnderſtood theſe things, he became ſpeechleſſe, through the ſorrow wherewith he was ſeized, and fell downe on the pauement, either for that his forces failed him through ſudden griefe, or for his want of meat; becauſe that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchafed his body any refection or ſuſtenance.

Saul commandeth the witch to raiſe Samuels ghoſt.

Saul complaineth him of his miſeries to Samuel, and asketh his aduice.

Semuels ghoſt certifieth Saul of the euent of his battell againſt the Philiſtines.

Saul through ſudden ſorrow fell in a ſwoune.

At length, hardly recouering himſelfe out of his ſwoune, the woman importuned him to receiue ſome ſuſtenance, beſeeching him to doe her that fauour in recompence of her vnexpected diuination; which though interdicted, ſhe had aduentured to performe for his ſake (before ſhee were aſcertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in conſideration whereof, ſhe prayed him, that ſitting downe at the table, hee would refreſh himſelfe with ſome ſuſtenance, to the end he might be the more able to returne vnto his army. And although he reſiſted and vtterly refuſed to eate, in that he had no appetite, and was vtterly deſperate; yet ſo effectually importuned ſhee, that finally ſhe perſwaded him to receiue ſome little nouriſhment. And whereas ſhe had but one calfe which ſhe bred vp in her houſe with ſome particular care (for ſhe was but a poore woman, and had no other riches) yet ſpared ſhe not to kill it, and dreſſe the fleſh for Saul and his ſeruants. Thus refected, Saul returned back againe into his campe. The courteſie of this woman deſerueth to be praiſed: for, although ſhe knew that the king had prohibited her art, whereby both ſhe and her family ſufficiently maintained themſelues: and although before that time ſhe had neuer ſeene Saul; yet ſo it is, that without remembring her that it was he by whom her art had bin condemned, ſhee entertained him not as a ſtranger, or like the man ſhee had neuer ſeene before; but had compaſſion on him and comforted him, exhorting him to eate, although he refuſed it, and preſented him willingly and heartily with that little which ſhe had in her pouerty. All which ſhe did not vnder hope of recompence, or expected preferment (knowing well that Saul ſhould ſhortly loſe his life) nor according to the ordinary courſe of men, that naturally honour thoſe that haue beſtowed ſome dignity vpon them, and become ſeruiceable to thoſe from whom they pretend to draw ſome profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth an excellent excellent example of bounty, approouing that there is nothing more worthy praiſe, then to relieue thoſe that are in neceſſitie; neither any thing more becomming men, or whereby we may obtaine Gods fauour and graces, better then by it. Thus much ſufficeth at this preſent, in reſpect of this woman. But now me thinketh I ſhall doe well if I inſert in this place, and in theſe my writings, an other example both profitable to people and Nations, and in eſpeciall an incitation to Noblemen, and ſuch as are borne vnto glory, to follow vertue; which alſo ſhal expreſſe what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memory, which ought to engender in the hearts of Kings of Nations, and of Gouernours of Common-weales, a ſingular deſire and affection to addict themſelues to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertaine dangers, yea death it ſelfe; and teach them to endure all difficulties whatſoeuer, for their Countries cauſe. To which intent, the hiſtory of Saul the King of the Hebrewes yeeldeth me matter moſt accident to this purpoſe. For, although he knew that which ſhould befall him, and that his death was at hand (according as it had beene foretold him) yet reſolued he not to auoid the ſame; neither ſo loued hee his life, that for the conſeruation thereof, he would deliuer vp his people into the hands of their enemies, nor diſhonour his Royall dignity: but himſelfe, with his children and all his houſehold, expoſed themſelues to danger; thinking it more honourable to die with them in fighting for his ſubiects, and farre more expedient that his children ſhould die like valiant men, then to leaue them aliue in incertitude of eſtate whereinto they might fall, ſuppoſing that he ſhould haue ſufficient ſucceſſours of his race, if he left behind him a perpetuall memory & praiſe both of him and his. For which cauſe (in my opinion) he was both iuſt, ſtrong, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath bin like vnto him, I ſuppoſe that it becommeth all men to giue teſtimony of ſuch a mans vertue. For I thinke that the Hiſtorians and ancient Writers, haue not worthily entituled them with the ſtile of valiant men, who attaining ſome worthy actions, attempted warre vnder aſſured hope of victorie and ſafety, but they only that imitate Saul may deſeruedly be called iuſt, praiſe-worthy, couragious, hardie, and contemcers of all dangers. For what great thing is there in vndertaking the common hazzard of war, and toſſed twixt hope and feare, to vſe Fortunes fauour if ſhe fawne vpon vs? But contrariwiſe, I account it an aſſured ſigne of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodneſſe, and knowing his death at hand, and aſſured in his conflict, he is not affraid nor diſmaid with ſuch apprehenſions, but ſeeketh out with an inuincible courage is moſt aſſured hazzard.

Ioſephus praiſeth Saul for a worthy and valiant King, in that foreknowing his danger and death, he expoſed himſelf to aſſured perill.

This is the praiſe of our Saul, who is an example to all true louers of glory, that if they haue regard to leaue an honeſt memory to their poſterity, they ſhould vpon the like opportunity propoſe the ſame reſolution to themſelues: but in eſpeciall Kings, who, by reaſon of the excellency of their degree, ought not onely forbeare to be euill, but alſo ſtriue to be excellently vertuous. I could likewiſe ſay more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but leſt I ſhould ſeeme too affectionate, I will returne to our former purpoſe. 1 King. 29.

After that the Philiſtines were thus encamped (according as hath been afore-ſpoken) and had numbred their forces according to their Nations, Kingdomes, & Gouernours, King Achis iſſued in the rereward with his particular company, whom Dauid followed, accompanied with his ſixe hundred ſouldiers: whom when the Chiefetaines of the Philiſtines beheld, they asked the King whence thoſe Hebrewes came, and what their Leaders name was? Who anſwered them that it was Dauid, who fled from Saul his maſter, and how he had entertained him being fled from him: againe, how Dauid, in recompence of the good he had receiued at his hand, and to reuenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them againſt him. But the Chiefetaines blamed him, becauſe he had choſen an enemy for his aſſociate, counſelling him to diſmiſſe him, for feare leſt he ſhould ſecretly performe ſome ſtrange ſtratageme againſt his confederates, becauſe (ſaid they) he hath a fit opportunity to reconcile himſelfe to his Maſter. They therefore willed him to ſend Dauid backe with his ſixe hundred ſouldiers, vnto the place which hee had giuen him to inhabite, becauſe it was the ſame Dauid of whom the damſels made ſongs, ſinging in praiſe of him, that hee had ſlain many thouſand Philiſtines. When the king of Geth vnderſtood theſe things, he thought their counſell to be laudable: for which cauſe, calling Dauid vnto him, he ſaid vnto him; I proteſt vnto thee (ſaid he) that I beare a moſt ſingular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cauſe I haue called thee out to aſſiſt vs in this battell; but our Captaines allow not of my reſolution; for which cauſe, retire thy ſelfe to the place which I haue giuen thee, without conceiuing any euill ſuſpicion of me. There ſhalt thou be in gariſon, to foreſtall the enemy from foraging our countrey: and in ſo doing, thou ſhalt partly aſſiſt in the warre. Hereupon, Dauid departed vnto Siceleg, according ae the King had commanded him.

Achis leadeth out Dauid with him againſt the Hebrewes, and is reprooued by the chieftains of the Paleſtines for ſo doing.

Achis diſmiſſeth Dauid.

But

The yeere of the world, 2890. before the Natiuitie of Christ. 1074.

A But during the time that Dauid was in campe, and attended on the Philistines warre, the Amalechites arose and tooke Siceleg by force, and burned the City: and after they had gathered a great bootie both in that place, and in other villages of the Philistines countrey, they retired backe againe. Now when Dauid arriued at Siceleg, & found it wholly and ruinately spoiled, and seeing likewise that his two wiues, & the wiues of his companions were prisoners together with their children: he presently rent his rayment, and began to weepe and lament with his companions; yea so much was he afflicted, that he had scarce any teares left him to bemone himselfe: beside this, his cõpanions amated with the captiuity of their wiues and children, were ready to stone him to death; accusing him that he was the cause of all that which had hapned. But when B as his griefe was after a manner aslaked, and hee somewhat returned to himselfe, he lifted vp his heart vnto God, and commanded the high Priest Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and aske counsaile of God; and that done, to declare vnto him wherby by his assistance he might ouertake the Amalechites, if so be he should pursue them; and whether he should recouer his wiues and children that they had led away, and reuenge him of his enemies. As soone as the high Priest had certified him that he might pursue them, hee sallied out with sixe hundreth soldiers, and pursued the enemy: and drawing neere vnto the riuer, he found a certen straggler an Ægyptian by nation, wholly discomforted and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was pressed, hauing for three daies space wandered in the desart without any sustenance; whom after he had refreshed with meate and drinke, and recomforted, he asked him to whom he belonged, and what he was. C The Ægyptian told him his nation; & how he had beene left in that place by his master, because that through his weaknes it was impossible for him to follow them. Hee confessed likewise, that his master was one of the number of those that had burned and sacked, not onely other quarters of Iudæa, but Siceleg also. Dauid taking this man for his guide ouertooke them, finding some of them lying on the earth; others banquetting and following drunkennes, and almost senseless by ouerdrinking: so recouering both his bootie and pillage, hee sodainly set vpon them, and made a great slaughter. For they being naked, and suspecting no such inconuenient, and wholly addicted to frolicke drinking and feasting, were all of them easily defeated: diuers likewise amongst them were slaine as they sate at their meat; others likewise were slaughtered whilest they carrousèd the one vnto the other; and some of them perished being loaden with sleepe, and gor- D ged with wine.

The Amalechites in Dauids absence spoile and burne Siceleg, & carry away the prey.

Dauid taketh counsell of God, whether he will assist him to recouer his wiues and goods out of the hands of the Amalechites.

Dauid guided by an Ægyptian slaue, ouertaketh the Amalechites.

Dauid assaileth the Amalechites, and makes a great slaughter of them, and recouereth the whole prey.

They likewise that were compleatly armed, intending to make resistance, were as easily slaine, as they that lay naked vpon the earth: Thus Dauids men abode with him from the first houre of the morning till the euening, doing nought else but kill and murther, so that only foure hundreth of the Amalechites escaped, who likewise fled being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recouered he all that which the enemy had ransackt, and amõgst other things he released both his own wiues and those of his companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundreth, which might not follow them, because they were appointed to guard the baggage: To these, the aboue said foure hundreth would not grant a part of the booty and profit, because they had not (as they said) followed the enemie with them, but shewed them- E selues slacke in the pursuite; alledging that they ought to content thẽselues with the recouery of their wiues. But Dauid said, that the sentence which was pronounced by them, was both euill & vniust: for since God had granted them the grace to defeate their enemies, all of them merited to haue part in the profit, which ought equally to be diuided amongst them, both amongst those that had fought, and amongst those likewise that staied behind to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath beene held firmely amongst them, that they that keepe the baggage, should haue equall part and portion of the prey with those that should goe out to the battell. But when Dauid was returned to Siceleg, he sent vnto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Iuda, a seuerall part of the spoile: In this manner was Siceleg sacked and burned, and thus were the Amalechites discomfited. But the Philistines assailed, and fought a bloody battell with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philistines had the vpper hand, and slew a great num- F ber of their enemies. Saul King of Israel with his sonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with stout hearts, seeing that all their honour consisted in that onely point to die nobly, & to hazzard themselues against all camisadoes of their enemies. For since the Philistines bent all their forces against them, they saw no meanes of recouerie, so that incompassed by them, they died in the middest of them, and yet before their death, slewe a great number of the Philistines. There were there present Sauls three sonnes; Ionathan, Aminadab and Melchi: who being defeated, all the Hebrew armie turned their backes: so that beeing instantly pursued by the enemy, there there fell a great disorder, slaughter and confusion amongst them. Saul fled also, although hee had about him a strong squadron of men. And although the Philistines marshalled foorth against him a multitude of archers, that shot many darts and arrowes at him; yet were they all but a very few repulsed: and although he had fought very brauely, hauing receiued on him diuers wounds, yet being vnable to support the paine and griefe of his wounds, and trauailed with shortnesse of breath, he commanded his Esquier to draw his sword, and to thrust it thorow his body before he should be surprized aliue by his enemies: which his Esquier refused to doe, not daring to lay hands vpon his Master. For which cause Saul drew his owne sword, and settled the point to his brest and cast himselfe thereon: but vnable to force it home enough, nor make it by goaring himselfe thereon to pierce quite thorow him, he looked backe and perceiued a yong man hard beside him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, hee requested him, that since himselfe was vnable to pierce himselfe with his own hands, that he would leane vpon him, and make the sword passe thorow him, & bring him to that death which he so earnestly desired: which he did, and hauing taken from him the gold which he had about his armes, and the Royal Crowne likewise, he fled away. The Esquier seeing Saul dead, so dainly slew himselfe: Not one of all the Kings Guard escaped, but all of them were slaine neere vnto the mountaine Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other side of Iordan & in the Plaine, had intelligence that Saul and his sonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their Nation was slaine, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defenced. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whilest the Philistines spoyled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his sons, which they spoyled and beheaded; sending their heads round about the countrey, to make it knowne that their enemies were defeated. They offered vp their armes also in the temple of Astaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the wals of the Citie of Bethsan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Iabes a City of Galaad vnderstood how the Philistines had thus cut off the heads of Saul and his sonnes, they were sore mooued, and thought it became them not to be so careless of them, but that they should be rescued. For which cause the most valiant and hardy amongst them (for that Citie bringeth vp men both valiant in heart and strong in body) departed and marched all night long, so as they attained Bethsan, and approching neere the wals, took downe the body of Saul and his sonnes, and carried them vnto Iabes, without any resistance of the enemie, in that they durst not attempt the rescue. These Iabesians lamented ouer their dead bodies, and made publike lamentations, and buried them in the faireſt place of their countrey, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this maner weeping, both men, and women and children, and beating their brests, and lamenting the King and his sonnes, and tasting neither meate nor drinke. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because hee had disobeyed God in his warre against the Amalechites, and for that he had slaine the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himselfe also, and destroyed the City of the Priests. He raigned during the life of Samuel, for the space of eighteene yeeres, and twenty two yeeres after his death. Thus finished Saul his life.

THIS battell was fought on the same day that Dauid returned conquerour to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three daies after his returne, he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battell, hauing his garment rent, and ashes cast vpon his head, came and cast himselfe prostrate before Dauid: and being demanded from whence he came, he answered, From the battell of the Israelites; and certified Dauid of the vnhappy issue thereof: telling him how diuers thousands of the Hebrewes were slaine, and how Saul himselfe and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. He likewise gaue him to vnderstand, how he himselfe retreated amongst the Hebrewes, and was present at the flight of the King: confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, vnder purpose to redeeme him from the hands of his enemies: For (said he) Saul hauing cast himselfe vpon the point of his sword, was so weake, by reason of the agonie of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himselfe. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death; the gold about his armes, and the royall Crowne which he tooke and brought from him being dead. Dauid perceiuing no cause whereby he should suspect his death, whereof he had most euident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions. And the more was he ouerpressed with sorrow, by reason of the losse of his most deare friend Ionathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and conseruer of his life: And so vertuous and affectionate shewed he himselfe towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes beene in danger to haue been slaine by him, yet was he sore aggrieued at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himselfe had accused himselfe for slaying the King, declaring thereby that he was the sonne of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should be put to death. He composed likewise lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Ionathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I liue. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his lamentation and obsequies, he asked counsell of God by the meanes of the Prophet, what Citie of the tribe of Iuda he would giue him to inhabit in? who answered him that that he would giue him Hebron. For which cause he forsooke Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his wife and souldiers. All the people of the aforesaid tribe resorted thither vnto him, and proclaimed him King: where vnderstanding how the Iabesins had buried Saul and his sonnes, he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to praise and approoue their actions, promising them that both he allowed their act, and would remunerate their deuoire which they had extended toward the dead: giuing thē likewise to vnderstand, that the tribe of Iuda had chosen him for their King. But Abner the son of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble disposition, vnderstanding that Saul and Ionathan and his two other brothers were dead, came into the campe, and bringing with him the onely sonne of Saul that was left, whose name was Isboseth, he passed on the other side of Iordan, and proclaimed him King of all the people except the tribe of Iuda. He appointed likewise for his royall seate and place of residence, a certaine countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to say, the campe. From thence went he with an elected band of souldiers, with a resolution to fight against those of the tribe of Iuda, in that he was displeased with them, because they had made choise of Dauid for their King. Against him marched out Ioab the sonne of Suri and of Saruia Dauids sister, Generall of his armie, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abisai and Azael, & all Dauids souldiers: and arriuing neere a certaine fountaine of Gabaa, he arranged his armie in that place to enter battell. And when as Abner said vnto him, that he desired to make triall whether part had the better souldiers, it was accorded betweene them, that twelue of either side should be chosen out to determine the challenge: who marching out into a certaine place betwixt both the hosts, and hauing darted their Iauelins the one against the other, came at last to the sword; where mutually assailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, sides and bowels, they all of them at last fell down dead, as if the plot had bin determined between them. Which done, the two armies ioyned in like sort, & after a cruel battell Abner with his followers were discomfited: who speedily flying were incessantly pursued by Ioab, who in his owne person insisted and exhorted his other soldiers to pursue them hastily, without suffering any of them to escape. But amongst the rest, Ioabs brothers were hot vpon the chase, and the yongest of them called Azael, gaue especiall testimonie of his forwardnes, through that swiftnesse in running wherewith he was endowed; for he ranne not onely more swift then other men, but outstripped horses also in their race. Whilest thus he pursued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong course, without turning either on the one side or on the other; Abner turned backe vpon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces; he first couenanted with him for one souldiers armour, and another time seeing that he could not be perswaded to stay, he prayed him to arrest himselfe and pursue him no further, for feare left being inforced to kill him, he should be depriued of the courage to behold his brother Ioab. But perceiuing that he made no account of his words, in that Azael instantly insisted to pursue him; Abner flying and turning himselfe backe, strooke him with a Iauelin which he had in his hand, in such sort as he presently died. But they that pursued Abner, likewise arriuing in the place where Azaels body vnaduenturously fell dead, staied round about him, and surceased to pursue the enemy any further. But Ioab and his brother Abisai outstripping the body with swift running, and conceiuing a more mortall hatred against Abner, for that he had in this sort slaine their brother; they pursued him vntill sun-set, with admirable swiftnesse, and incredible alacritie vnto a place called Dumaton: There mounting vpon a hillocke, hee saw Abner with the tribe of Beniamin flying from him; who began to cry out vnto him and say, that men of the same tribe should not be so whetted and incensed the one against the other: That their brother Azael was in the fault, because that although he had exhorted him to cease from running after him, yet could he not perswade him, and that for the same cause he had both strooken and slaine him. Ioab wisely digesting these his sayings, and accepting of them as of wholesome and friendly aduertisements and counsels, he commanded the trumpet to sound retreat, and surceased to pursue them any more, and incamped for that night in the same place: during which time, Abner trauelled without ceasing, and hauing past ouer Iordan, returned to his campe to Isboseth Sauls sonne. The next day Ioab suruaied the dead, and caused them to be buried. Those that were found dead on Abners side, were about three hundreth and sixtie men; and on Dauids side nineteene, ouer and besides Azael, whose body Ioab and Abisai tooke with them, and carried it vnto Bethleem, and after they had interred it in the tombe of their ancestors, they repaired to Hebron vnto Dauid. From that time forward there arose a ciuill warre amongst the Hebrewes, that endured a long time, in which Dauids followers had alwaies the vpper hand, and neuer aduẽtured the hazzard of the field without returning with some aduantage, aduantage; whereas the ſonne of Saul and his partakers had almoſt euery day the worſe. Dauid at that time had ſixe ſonnes by ſo many wiues, the eldeſt of them was called Ammon the ſonne of Achimaas, the ſecond was Daniel the ſonne of Abigal, the third was called Abſolon the ſonne of Machama the daughter of Ptolomey King of Geſſur; the fourth was Adonias the ſonne of his wife called Aggite: the fift and the ſixt were called Gertheſſa and Gala. But after this ciuill warre was begunne, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountred and fought together; Abner Generall of the armie of King Sauls ſonne, a prudent man, and one that was beloued by the people, endeauoured all that in him lay, that the whole countrey might be commanded by Iſboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted vnto him for a certaine time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accuſed to haue kept company with Riſpa Sauls concubine, the daughter of Sibath, and that Iſboſeth likewiſe had reproued him for the ſame cauſe, he conceiued a great griefe & deſpite, ſuppoſing that he had great iniurie done vnto him, conſidering how carefull he had beene, and was, of the Kings eſtate: for which cauſe he threatned him to eſtabliſh the kingdome to Dauid, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him ſoueraigne ouer the tribes on that ſide Iordan, but that his faith and warlike conduct was the cauſe thereof. For which cauſe he ſent vnto Hebron to Dauid, requiring him by an oath to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſwade the people to forſake Sauls ſonne, and to proclaime him King of the whole region: Dauid ſware vnto him, according as he had required, and was very glad of that embaſſage that Abner had ſent vnto him, and the rather for that vnder aſſured teſtimony of their accords, hee had preſerued Michol Dauids wife (whom hee had purchaſed with the price of diuers great dangers, and with ſixe hundreth heads of the Philiſtines preſented to his father Saul, to the end he might enioy her) which Michol Abner had ſent him backe, hauing taken her from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſboſeth alſo was aſſiſtant, to whom Dauid had written that it was reaſon that hee ſhould recouer his wife. Abner therefore aſſembled all the elders and Gouernours of the people, and told them that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelues to Dauid, he had diſſwaded them from that intent; but at this preſent if they had the will, he would cõdeſcend vnto them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen Dauid by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to bee King ouer all the Hebrewes; and had foretold that hee ſhould puniſh the Philiſtines, and ſhould ouercome them, and bring them vnder his ſubiection. Which when the elders and Gouernours vnderſtood, & were aſſured likewiſe that Abner would ſubſcribe to their reſolution as touching the eſtate, they all of them determined to ſubmit themſelues to Dauid. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolued, did afterwards aſſemble al the tribe of Beniamin (out of which the archers of Iſboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiuing that they contradicted him no waies, but ſubmitted themſelues vnto his pleaſure, he gathered about twentie of his familiar friends, and reſorted vnto Dauid to receiue in his own perſon Dauids oath: both for that each man in his own affaires repoſeth greateſt confidence in himſelfe, as alſo to giue him intelligence what ſpeech he had held with the elders and the whole tribe. Dauid receiued and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently and ſumptuouſly feaſted him at his table for many daies, praying him that he would depart, and returne & bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence & ſight, he might deliuer him vp the gouernment. When Dauid had diſmiſſed Abner; ſome little time after his departure, Ioab the Generall of Dauids armie came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had bin with Dauid, and that but ſome little time before he was departed from him, with accords & promiſes made vnto him that he ſhould be Gouernour; he fearing leſt that if Dauid ſhould place him in honour and dignitie, and ſhould make Abner (who was a man otherwaies exerciſed in affaires, and politique to preuent occaſions) as it were his companion in the kingdome, that the ſaid Ioab ſhould be degraded and depriued of his office; he tooke vpon him a curſed and froward reſolution. For firſt of all he laboured to detract and make him odious in the Kings eare, counſelling him to ſtand on his guard, & not to giue eare vnto Abners promiſes, who vnder colour and ſubtilty ſought to eſtabliſh the kingdome vnto Sauls ſonne: alledging that he came vnto him vnder colour and cautele, intending then to leaue him, when his hopes were ſatisfied and affaires diſpoſed: But perceiuing that theſe his ſubtilties tooke little effect with Dauid, and conſidering with himſelfe likewiſe that he mooued him in no ſort, he attempted a more perilous exploit then the former. For reſoluing with himſelfe to kill Abner, he ſent out certaine men after him, whom he gaue in commiſſion that as ſoone as they ſhould ouertake him, they ſhould vrge their interparlee in the name of Dauid, alledging that they had ſomething to communicate with him as touching the eſtate, which he had forgot to certifie him of.

When Abner had heard the words of these messengers (who ouertooke him in a place called Besira, some twentie furlongs off of Hebron) he strooke out of the way without suspicion of his future disaster, and Ioab going before him, embraced him with great loue, and like an affectionate friend (for such as enterprize any wicked action, do often and subtilly dissemble & make shew of honestie, to the end to expel out of the innocents mind all iealousie or euill suspicion) where singling him from his other companie, and making shew to informe him of certaine secrets, and hauing drawne him into a by-way besides the wall, accompanied only with his brother Abisai, he drew his rapier and thrust it into his short ribbes: Of which wound Abner died, surprized by the treason of Ioab; who pretended and coloured that act of his, with the reuenge and death of his brother Azael, whom Abner had slaine vpon the chase in the first warre at Hebron; but in truth it was but the suspicion of his greatnesse and honour, fearing lest he should be depriued, and Abner inseated by obtaining the next degree of honour vnto Dauid. Hereby may a man conceiue how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazzard for their auarice and ambition sake, and to the end they may not be inferiour vnto any others in those matters. For when as they desire to attaine riches and honours, they atchieue it by ten thousand mischiefes; and at such time as they feare to be dispossest, they striue to continue their estates by meanes more pernicious, because they thinke it to be the lesse sinne, and that the calamitie is lesse actiue, rather not to haue obtained to any greatnesse and power: then after the possession thereof, to fall into disgrace. Thence it commeth, that all of them intend and practise many hazzards and difficult encountries, through the feare they haue to lose their degree. But it sufficeth to haue briefly touched this point. Dauid hauing notice of the murther of Abner, conceiued a great griefe in his heart, and called all his assistants to witnesse, lifting vp his hands vnto God, and protesting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had beene slaine without his commandement or will. He likewise vttered most grieuous curses against the murtherer, his house and accomplices, by which he wished them to be subiect to the fatal penaltie of murther: for he greatly suspected lest he should be held in suspicion to be a party in that which had hapned vnto Abner, contrarie to his faith, oath and promise, which he had past vnto him. Moreouer, he commanded that all the people should weepe and lament for him, and that the funerals of his body should be honored according to the accustomed fashion, in renting of garments and putting on sackcloth: and that the same should be done, the coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefest Gouernours of the Israelites followed, beating on their brests, and shedding teares, and testifying the loue which they bare vnto him during his life, and their displeasure to see him dead, who had bin murthered contrary to their will and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs composed in his praise by Dauid himselfe, who setting himselfe on the tombe first of all lamented, and gaue others cause of lamentation. And so much was hee cõfused at the death of this Abner, that he swore to forbeare all kind of meat vntill the sunne-set, notwithstanding all the instances of his friends, who vrged him to take refection: which act of his purchased him much good will & loue amongst the people. For they that loued Abner, were very glad to be witnesses of that honour which he did him in his death, & that faith which hee maintained in honouring him, euery way according to the custome, as if he had been his kinsmã or friend, and not embasing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if he had beene his enemie. And in generall, all of them were so glad of the courtesie, sweetnesse & royall nature of King Dauid, that they esteemed in like case, that he would haue the like estimate of them, as they saw him haue of deceased Abner. And by this meanes Dauid happily maintained his credit, and increased the peoples good opinion of him, escaping thereby the suspition and conceit that hee might in some sort haue beene accessarie to his death. He protested also vnto the people, that he conceiued no small griefe at the losse of so good a man, declaring thereby that it was no small staine vnto the state of the Hebrewes to bee depriued of him, who had the meanes to maintaine their peace by his good aduice, and to ratifie the same by his executions and warlike valour: But God (said he) who hath care of all things, shall not suffer him to die vnreuenged: And hee it is that shall beare mee witnesse, that it lieth not in my power to punish Ioab and Abisai, who haue greater credit in the armie then my selfe; yet shall they not escape Gods iustice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

Men inclined to ambition and auarice dare al things.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 2.

WHEN Isboseth, Sauls sonne, had notice of Abners death, he was sore displeased, not only for that he perceiued himselfe to be depriued of his neere kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had settled the crowne on his head. Neither did he himselfe long time remaine aliue after him: but by the sons of Ieremon, Banaoth and Thannus, he was traiterously done to death. These two being Beniamites, & of the chiefest nobilitie amongst thē, made their reckoning that they would make away Isboseth, and thereby obtaine great recompence at Dauids hands; supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefest place and dignity in the army, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isboseth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleepe, and vnassisted by any of his guard, and perceiuing likewise that the Porter was fast, who through his trauell and other businesse (by reason of the extreme heate) was laid downe to rest: they entred into his lodging whereas Isboseth was asleepe, and slew him: and hauing cut off his head, they trauelled all the night and day long, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure thē from perill. And when they came to Hebron, they presented Dauid with Isbosethis head, offering themselues as his most dutifull liegemen to do him seruice, who had deliuered him of an enemy, and made away an aduersary against his royaltie. But Dauid allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus vnto them; O cursed men, said he (on whom I intend presently to execute iustice) haue you not heard how I punished him that murthered Saul, and brought his royall crowne vnto me? Yea, although he slew him vpon his owne instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprize him aliue? Were you of that opinion that I was changed, & that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your mischiefes, or that I will countenance thē, as if these acts of yours (who are murtherers of your master) were laudable in you? in you, I say, who haue slaine a good man on his bed, that iniured no man, but was your benefactor, and who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure your selues, that you shal be punished in his behalfe, & shall yeeld me satisfaction by the losse of your liues, becausse you haue thought that Isbosethis death would work my contentment: for, you could not in any sort dishonor me more, then by conceiuing such an opinion of me. Which said, he adiudged them to die by the most cruell torments that might bee imagined: and with all the honour that he might, he caused Isbosethis head to be interred in Abners tombe.

Isbosethis head is brought to Dauid.

Dauids sharp inuectiue against the murtherers of Isboseth, and their punishment.

These murtherers beeing thus done to death, all the chiefest of the people repaired to Dauid vnto Hebron (both they that commanded ouer thousands, and such also as were Gouernours) & submitted themselues vnto him, reckoning vp the good affection they had borne him, both during Sauls life-time, as also the honour which they had neuer discontinued to beare him, since the first time that he was Coronell ouer a thousand, especially for that he had beene chosen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and his children after him; declaring vnto him, that God had giuen him the countrey of the Hebrewes, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. Dauid accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should neuer repent themselues of their obedience: and after he had banquetted and entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

2. King. 5. The nobles of the Hebrews repaire to Dauid to Hebron & declare him King.

Dauid entertained the nobles kindly.

Of the tribe of Iuda, there came together about sixe thousand eight hundred men of war, bearing for their armes a buckler and a iauelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sonnes, and besides whom the tribe of Iuda had assigned the kingdome to Dauid. Of the tribe of Simeon, 7. thousand, and a hundred or somewhat more: of that of Leui 4700. whose chiefetaine was Iodam, with whō was Sadoc the high Priest, accōpanied with 20. & two Gouernours of the same linage. Of the tribe of Beniamin 4000. men of war: for this tribe were as yet of opiniō that some of the heires of Saul should raigne. Of that of Ephraim 20800. both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the halfe as many, namely 8000. Of that of Issachar 200. who were skilfull in diuinatiō, & 20000. men of war. Of that of Zabulon 20000. chosen fighting men: for only this entire tribe was wholly at Dauids cōmād, who were armed in like maner as they of Gad were. Of the tribe of Nepthali there were 1000. chiefetains, famous for their valour, & armed with shield & iauelin, attēded by an infinite nūber of their tribe. Of the tribe of Dan there were 27000. chosen men. Of that of Aser 40000. Of the two tribes on the other side of Iordan, & of the half tribe of Manasses sixe score thousand armed men, with buckler, iauelin, murrion and sword: The rest of the other tribes also wore swords. All this multitude was assembled together in Hebron before Dauid, with great prouision of victuals and wine, sufficient to sustaine them all, who all of them with one consent, appointed Dauid to bee their King. Now when the people had mustred, and banquetted for three dayes space in Hebron, Dauid dislodged from thence with his whole host, and repaired to Ierusalem. But the Iebusites, who at that time inhabited the city, and were of the race of the Chananites, shutting vp their gates against his comming, and placing on their wals as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other sort, in contempt of him, scoffingly iested, and said, that these were sufficient to keepe out the enemy: so much trusted they to their fortifications. Wherwith Dauid being sore displeased, began to besiege Ierusalem, and vsing all diligence and industry to surprize the same, he incontinently expressed how strong he was, checking thereby other mens pride, who perhaps would haue done the like vnto him, and afterwards tooke the lower Towne. And for that the higher Towne was as yet vnsurprized, the King resolued to encourage his men of warre to shew themselues valiant, promising them honours and recompence; proclaiming that hee would make him Generall ouer all the people, that should first of all scale, ascend, and seize the wall. Whilest thus they inforced themselues to mount, without refusing any trauell (through the desire they had to obtaine the gouernment that was promised) Ioab, the sonne of Saruia, was the forwardest among the rest; and hauing got vpon the wall, cried vnto the King, requiring him to grant him the generall gouernment.

Dauid expelleth the Iebusites out of the towne & city of Ierusalem.

After therefore he had cast out the Iebusites from the higher City, and repaired Ierusalem, he called it the city of Dauid, and remained therin all the time of his raigne: so that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, ouer the sole tribe of Iuda, was 7. yeeres and sixe moneths. But after hee had established Ierusalem for his royall city, his fortunes daily more and more increased, because God both furthered, and bettered them. Hiram also, King of Tyre, sent vnto him, and made a league of amity with him: he presented him likewise with presents of Cedar wood, and workemen and Masons, to build him a royall house in Ierusalem. Now, when the King had seized the higher city, he annexed the rocke thereunto, and made one body of twaine; and hauing walled it in, he gaue the gouernment therof to Ioab. This King was the first that droue the Iebusites out of Ierusalem, and called the same by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there some that inferre, that Homer vnder that name intended Ierusalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyma is as much to say, as Security. All the time from the exploite of warre made by Iosuah against the Chanaanites, and since the diuision of the Country (during all which time the Israelites could not driue the Chanaanites out of Ierusalem) vntill such time as Dauid tooke the same by force, were fiue hundred and fifteene yeeres. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongst the Iebusites; who, for that he was well affected toward the Hebrewes, was not put to death in the surprizall which Dauid made of Ierusalem: but (as I will shortly declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the King. Dauid espoused other wiues besides those which he had; besides many other concubines: by them he had eleuen sonnes, whose names are these which follow, Amnas, Emma, Ebamatha, Salomon, Iebar, Eliel, Phalna, Ennapha, Ienaah, Eliphal: besides these, he had a daughter called Thamar. Nine of these were begotten of noble mothers, but the two last (which were named by vs) were the sons of concubines. But Thamar was Absalons sister by the same father and mother.

Chap. IIII.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4.

Now, when the Palestins knew that the Hebrewes had created Dauid King, they led forth their army against him towards Ierusalem, where, encamping themselues in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not farre off from the City) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrewes, who was wont to doe nothing inconsiderately, without out Gods aduice, commanded the high Prieſt to prophecie and foretell, what ſucceſſe and euent the warre ſhould haue; who after he had informed him that God ſmileth on, and fauoureth their attempts, he preſently drew out his army againſt the enemy: and ſtriking the battell, he ſuddenly aſſailed the enemies on their backs, and partly ſlew them, and partly put them to flight. But let no man ſuſpect, that the army of the Paleſtines was either ſmall in number, or weake in courage, which at that time aſſailed the Hebrewes, in that hee coniectureth in his minde, that they were eaſily ouercome; without their attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to know, that all Syria, Phenicia, (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare armes with them, and were confederates in this warre: which was the onely cauſe, that notwithſtanding they were ſo many times ouercome, and had loſt diuers thouſands of men, that they deſiſted not to aſſaile the Hebrewes with more great force: and that which is more, hauing beene defeated in the battels before recited, yet forbare they not to aſſaile Dauid anew with thrice as much power as before, and to incampe in the ſame place. For which cauſe, Dauid tooke counſell of God once more, what the iſſue of this battell ſhould bee: and the high Prieſt told him, that hee ſhould encampe in the forreſt called Teares, becauſe it was not far off from the enemies campe, and that he ſhould not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battell, before the trees did ſhake without any agitation or breath of winde. Wherupon, as ſoone as the trees ſhook, and the time which God had appointed was come; without any delay, he iſſued out, to enioy a prepared and manifeſt victory. For the ſquadrons of the enemy were diſarraied, and incontinently betook them to flight, and were ſwiftly followed and ſlaughtered, vntill the City of Gerar (which is a frontire-towne of their countrey) and their campe was thorowly ranſacked, wherein there were found great riches; and amongſt all other things, their gods were beaten to pieces.

The Paleſtins flight. 2 King 6.

The battell being brought to this end, it ſeemed good vnto Dauid (by the counſell of the Elders and Coronels ouer thouſands) that all the flowre of their youth ſhould be aſſembled from all the parts of the country, euery one according to his tribe. Secondly, that the Prieſts & Leuites ſhould repaire to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Arke of God, and conuey it to Ieruſalem; to the end that when it ſhould be there, the ſeruice of God might thereafter bee celebrated in that place, and other ſacrifices and honours, agreeable to the diuine Maieſty, might be performed. And had the ſame bin done during the life of Saul, no inconuenience had fallen vpon them. When as all the people were aſſembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transferre the Arke; which the Prieſts carrying out of Aminidabs houſe, they laid it vpon a new Waine, which (together with oxen) their brothers and children drew.

Dauids commands as touching the tranſportation of the Arke.

The King marched formoſt, and after him all his people, praiſing God, and tuning all ſorts of melody then vſuall in that country, with diuerſity of ſounds of inſtruments, of Dances, & Shalms, Trumpets & Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Arke into Ieruſalem. But when they were come to the threſhing floore of Chidon (which is a certaine place ſo called) Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the Oxen ſtumbling that drew the charriot, and the Arke ſomewhat ſhaken, he ſtretched out his hand with intent to ſuſtaine the ſame; and becauſe he was no Prieſt, God ſtrooke him till he died. The King and the people were ſore aggrieued at the death of Oza, and the place where he died, is called to this day, Ozas-Striking. Dauid, fearing leſt if hee ſhould retire the Arke with him into the City, the like happe ſhould attend him that had befallen Oza, (who was in that ſort done to death, for that he had onely thus ſtretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his owne houſe within the city, but commanded that it ſhould bee left in the poſſeſſion of one called Obed, by deſcent a Leuite, and in behauiour, a man good and vertuous: where it remained for three moneths ſpace, during which time, his houſe was bleſſed with all worldly goods and goodnes. The King being aſcertained what aduantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore and needy man, was ſuddenly become very rich, ſo that all men had their eyes fixed on him, and they that heard ſpeake of his houſe, enuied him) he aſſured himſelfe that no inconuenience would befall him; for which cauſe he retired the Arke into his owne houſe, which was carried by the Prieſts, and ſeuen quires of ſinging men, diſpoſed by the King, went before the ſame. The King himſelfe likewiſe touched, and played vpon the Harp, ſo that Michol, Dauids wife and Sauls daughter, ſeeing him entertaining himſelfe after that manner, mocked at him. The Arke then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dreſſed by Dauid, who offered moſt magnificent ſacrifices of all ſorts, and forgot not the ſacrifices for proſperities: hee feaſted all the people likewiſe, both men, women and children, diſtributing vnto euery one a cake, a morſell of roſted meate, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the ſacrifice: and after hee had thus feaſted the people, he diſmiſſed them, and retreated himſelfe into his owne houſe. But Michol his his wife (and daughter to King Saul) drawing neere vnto him vpon his returne, besought God for him, that it might please him in all other things she might expresse vnto her husband all that, which became her intire and vnequald loue towards him: but in this shee blamed him, because that being so great and mighty a King as he was, he had dishonoured himselfe in dancing, despoiling himselfe, and discouering partly that which became him not, doing all this in company of his seruants and handmaides. To whom Dauid answered, that he was not ashamed in performing a thing so acceptable vnto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him aboue all others, assuring her that he would play and dance oftentimes after that sort, without care whether his demeanour pleased either her or her chambermaids. This Michol (of whom we entreat) had no children by Dauid, but being married againe to another (to whom her father had betrothed her after he had rauished her from Dauid) she bare fiue sonnes, of whom we will speake in their place. The King perceiuing how by Gods assistance his affaires prospered daily more and more, thought that it should be a hainous offence in him, if he should dwell in houses made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Arke, suffer it to remaine vnder a pauilion: for which cause he conceiued a desire to build a Temple vnto God, according as Moses had foretold: and to this intent consulted he with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to performe all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be each way assistant vnto him: for which cause he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple. But the same night God appeared vnto Nathan, commanding him to certifie Dauid, that hee accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable vnto him (considering in especiall that no one before him had a thought to performe the like:) yet notwithstanding (although his deliberation were such) he permitted him not to finish the same, by reason he had followed many warres, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his decease (which shall happen after hee hath liued a long and prosperous life) his sonne called Salomon (to whom hee shall leaue the Kingdome after his death) shall cause a Temple to bee built vnto him, promising him to assist and fauour the sayd Salomon (euen as the father doth his sonne) and that he would continue the Royalty in his heires and their successours: And that if they shall happen to offend him, hee will onely punish them with sickenesse and sterilitie. Dauid vnderstanding these words which were deliuered him by the Prophet, was very ioyfull, by reason that the Royalty was firmly assured to his heires, and for that his house should bee famous and renowned; and presenting himselfe before the Arke, he prostrated himselfe and adored, and gaue God thanks for all the benefits he had bestowed on him; for that from a poore and humble sheepheard, he had raised him to so great a height of maiesty and glory, and for that he had promised to haue care of his posterity as erst he had had of the Hebrewes and their liberty. This said, after he had sung hymnes vnto God, he departed.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. Dauid warreth against the Palestines and taketh a great part of the inheritance from them.

NOT long time after this, Dauid thought it requisite to make warre vpon the Philistines, partly, to the intent he might auoid the suspition of sloth and idlenesse, and partly, that hauing (according as God had foretold) discomfited his enemies, hee might leaue a peaceable Kingdome to his posteritie after him. He therefore assembled his army anew, commanding them to be in a readines to march forward to the warre: when as therefore he supposed that the army was addressed, hee departed out of Ierusalem, and made a road vpon the Philistines, whom he ouercame in battell, and took a great part of the country from them, by meanes whereof he enlarged the Frontires of the Hebrewes, and translated the warre, and led forth his forces against the Moabites: whose army being diuided into two parts, was by him defeated and ouerthrowne, and the rest were taken prisoners, and tributes were imposed on them, which they were bound to satisfie euery yeere. Afterwards he led out his host against Adarezer sonne of Ara, King of Sophona: and waging battell with him neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, he slew about twenty thousand of his footmen, and some fiue thousand of his horse: he tooke also almost a thousand of his charriots; the greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them onely reserued to his owne vse.

CHAP. VI.

They of Damaſco are ouercome by DAVID.

The yeere of the world, 2904. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1064.

ADAD King of Damaſco and of Syria, vnderſtanding that Dauid had made warre on Adarezer (who was both his friend and confederate) iſſued forth with great forces to be aſſiſtant vnto him, and to deliuer him from his enemies according as he expected. But entring field, and waging battell with Dauid neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, he was ouercome and loſt a great number of his ſouldiers: for in that battell there were ſlaine on his ſide by the Hebrew enemie, to the number of twentie thouſand, and the reſt fled. Of this King, Nicholas the Hiſtoriographer maketh mention in the fourth book of his hiſtories, in theſe words. Sithence and long time after, a certaine man of that countrey called Adad gouerned in Damaſco, and ouer the reſt of Syria (except Phœnicia) who making warre againſt Dauid King of Iudæa, and hauing oftentimes fought with him, in his laſt encountrie (wherein he was ouercome neere vnto the flood Euphrates) he ſhewed himſelfe more reſolute then all other Kings in force and valour. Moreouer he ſpeaketh of his heires, how after his death, they ſucceeded him both in royaltie and name, the one after the other, and ſaith thus: He being deceaſed, his ſonnes raigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiuing from their father, the ſame name and the ſame kingdome, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Ægypt. The third of theſe being more mighty then the reſt, and deſirous to reuenge himſelfe in warre of theſe iniuries, which were offered vnto his grandfather, led forth his army againſt the Iewes, and deſtroyed the countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any waies from the truth: for he of whom he ſpeaketh, is that Adad, that made warre in Samaria, during the reigne of Achab King of Iſrael, of whom we will ſpeake hereafter in his place. But when Dauid had led forth his campe againſt Damaſco, and againſt the reſt of the countrey of Syria, he reduced them all vnder his obeiſance, placing garriſons amidſt their countrey, and impoſing tribute vpon them, which they ſhould pay vnto him. He dedicated alſo to God in the Citie of Ieruſalem, the golden quiuers & armors which Adads guard were wont to weare; which afterward Syſſac King of Ægypt took at ſuch time as he warred againſt Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the temple of Ieruſalem, as it ſhall be declared hereafter, when as we ſhall come to intreat of that matter. This King of the Hebrewes being inſpired by God (who made him proſperous in all his wars) encamped before the goodlieſt Cities Adarezer had, that is to ſay, Betthea and Machon, which he beſieged, tooke, and ſpoyled: where there was found great ſtore of gold and ſiluer and of braſſe, which was of more eſtimation then gold, whereof Salomon made that great veſſell called the Sea, and other faire lauers, at ſuch time as he adorned and furniſhed the temple of God. When the King of Amath vnderſtood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were deſtroyed, he grew affraid of his owne eſtate, and reſolued with himſelfe to make a league & confederacy with Dauid, before he might come out againſt him: and to that intent he ſent his ſonne Adoram vnto him, to teſtifie and expreſſe that contentment he had receiued, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemie, and to contract with him amitie and confederation. He ſent him preſents alſo, namely, veſſels of antique worke of gold, of ſiluer, and of braſſe: whereupon Dauid made a league with Thani (for ſo was the King of Amath called) and receiued the preſents that were ſent vnto him; and afterwards diſmiſſed his ſonne with conuenient honour, both for the one and the other: and conſecrated that to God which he had ſent him (together with the gold and ſiluer, which he had taken from other Cities and nations that were ſubiect vnto him.) For God did not only ſo farre fauour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own wars; but hauing alſo ſent Abiſai Ioabs brother the Lieutenant of his army againſt the Idumæans, he likewiſe granted him victorie: for Abiſai ſlew in the battell about eighteene thouſand of them, and filled all Idumæa with garriſons, challenging a tribute throughout the countrey by the pole. This King loued iuſtice of his own nature, and exerciſed iudgement according to veritie. He had for his Lieutenant generall in all his armies Ioab, and appointed Ioſaphat the ſon of Achilles chiefe ouer the Regiſters. After Abiathar, he eſtabliſhed Sadoc of the houſe of Phinees for high Prieſt, who was his friend. Siſa was his Secretarie: Banaia the ſonne of Ioiada was Captaine ouer his guard, and all the elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. Hee remembring himſelfe alſo of the conuentions and oathes that were paſt twixt him and Ionathan the ſonne of Saul, and of the amitie and affection that had beene between them (for beſides all other graces which he had, he moſt freſhly retained them in memorie, from whom in times paſt

he had receiued any friendſhip. He cauſed a ſearch to be made, if any one of the houſe and family of Ionathan were left aliue, to the intent he might remunerate the friendſhip which he had receiued at Ionathans hands. Whereupon a certaine man was brought vnto him (who was enfranchiſed by Saul) that might enforme him what one of his race was aliue: who asked him if he could name him any of Ionathans ſons then liuing, whō he might make partaker of thoſe courteous fauors and graces, which in times paſt he had receiued by Ionathan. Who anſwered him, that he had one ſonne remaining, whoſe name was Mephiboſeth, who was lame of his legs; for that at ſuch time as the newes came that both his father and grandfather were ſlaine in the battell, his nurſe fearefully ſnatching vp the child and flying, ſuffred him vnfortunately to fal frō her ſhoulders, and ſo hurt him. When as then he was aduertiſed where, and with whom he was brought vp, he ſent vnto the citie of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephiboſeth was kept, and commanded him to be brought vnto him. Now when he came to Dauids preſence, he caſt himſelfe proſtrate on his face to do him reuerence: but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gaue him his fathers houſe with all the poſſeſſions that were purchaſed by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to ſit and feed with him at his owne table; yea to eate of his royall prouiſion, not letting one day ſlip wherein he accompanied him not at meales. The yong man did him reuerence, humbly thanking him for the gracious words, and royall offers he had made vnto him. At that time Dauid called for Siba, & certified him how he had giuen Mephiboſeth his fathers houſe and all Sauls purchaſes, commanding him to manure and husband his poſſeſſions, and to haue care of all things, & to returne the reuenue to Ieruſalem, for that Mephiboſeth was euery day to take his refection at his table, charging both him and his 15. ſonnes, and 20. ſeruāts, tō doe him ſeruice. After the King had thus diſpoſed of him, Siba did him reuerence, and after he had proteſted to performe whatſoeuer he had giuen him in charge, he departed, and Ionathans ſonne remained in Ieruſalem, where he liued at the Kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had beene his owne ſonne: he had a ſonne alſo called Micha. Theſe were the honors that thoſe children which ſuruiued after Ionathan and Sauls death, receiued at Dauids hands. About the ſame day died Naas King of the Ammonites, who during his life-time was Dauids friend, and his ſonne ſucceeded him in his kingdome, to whom Dauid ſent Embaſſadors to comfort him, exhorting him to digeſt his fathers death with patience, aſſuring him that he would expreſſe no leſſe loue towards him, then he did vnto his father. But the Gouernours of the Ammonites entertained this embaſſage very contumelioufly, and not according as Dauid had kindly intended it, & murmured againſt their King, telling him that they were but ſpies ſent by Dauid to ſeeke into his forces, and diſcouer the ſtrength of his countrey, vnder a pretext of humanitie, counſelling him to ſtand vpon his guard, and not to giue eare to his proteſtation, leſt being deceiued, he ſhould fall into ſome remedileſſe inconuenient.

Naas King of the Ammonites, ſuppoſing that his Gouernors ſpake nothing but truth, outraged the Embaſſadors that were ſent vnto him with great iniuries: for cauſing the halfe of their beards to be ſhauen cloſe by the chin, and cutting away the halfe of their veſtments, he ſent them backe againe, returning their anſwers not in words, but in deeds. Which when Dauid ſaw, he was grieuouſly diſpleaſed, and made it knowne that he would not ſuffer that mockerie and iniurie ſo eaſily to be digeſted, but that he would make war on the Ammonites, and reuenge thoſe indignities that were offered to his Embaſſadors. The friends and Gouernours of Naas cōſidering how they had violated and broken the peace, and how for that occaſion they deſerued to be puniſhed; prepared for that warre, and ſent 1000. talents to Syrus King of Meſopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that warre, and receiue their pay: they requeſted the like of Subas: theſe Kings had 20000. footmen in camp. They hired alſo with their mony the King of the coūtry called Michas, & the fourth called Iſtob, which two had with them 12000. ſouldiers.

CHAP. VII.

How DAVID ouercame the Meſopotamians.

Dauid ſendeth out Ioab with the choiſeſt flower of his armie againſt the Ammonites.

BVT Dauid was nothing amated, neither with the confederacie, nor force of the Ammonites; but truſting in God, reſolued that the cauſe of his warre was iuſt: for which cauſe hee continued in reuenge of thoſe outrages which he had receiued by them. Hauing therefore muſtered vnder Ioab the flower of his whole army, he commanded him to depart and make warre vpon them: who came and incamped himſelfe before their chiefeſt City called Aramath; which when the enemies perceiued, they iſſued forth and arranged themſelues in battell not altogether, but in two ſeuerall parts.) For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plaine, and the Ammonites ſtood in battell array neere vnto their City gate, to make head againſt the Hebrewes. Ioab perceiuing this, vſed this ſtratageme to counteruaile their complot: for he choſe out the ableſt and ſtouteſt of his men to ſerue vnder him againſt Syrus, and the other Kings confederates with him, and gaue the reſt to his brother Abiſai, commanding him to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Ammonites whileſt he charged the reſt: willing him, that if he perceiued that the Syrians were ſtronger then he was, and did put him to the worſt, to diſplace his Squadron, and to ſuccour him; promiſing to doe the like, if hee perceiued him to be ouerpreſſed by the Ammonites; When as therefore he had exhorted his brother to behaue himſelfe valiantly and vertuouſly, and to take heede leſt he ſhould light on ſome diſhonour, he ſent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other ſide aſſailed the Syrians, who valiantly reſiſted him for a little ſpace: yet notwithſtanding Ioab ſlew many of them, and finally conſtrained them to turne their backes. Which when the Ammonites perceiued (who were afraid of Abiſai and his people) they retreated likewiſe, and (conforming themſelues according to the example of their allies) they tooke their flight into the City. By which meane Ioab hauing obtained the vpper hand ouer his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victory vnto the King to Ieruſalem.

Ioabs victory.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this loſſe: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certaine knowledge that the Hebrewes were ſtronger then themſelues, yet would they by no meanes liſten after peace. They therefore ſent vnto Chalama King of the Syrians on the other ſide of Euphrates, whoſe confederacie they attained by bribes and huge ſums of money. This King had one, who was called Sabecus, for his Lieutenant-Generall, and vnder him fourſcore thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſemen. Dauid vnderſtanding that the Ammonites drew to head, and intended anew to beare armes againſt him, hee ſurceaſed to proſecute the war againſt them by his Lieutenants, and himſelfe in perſon with all his forces paſſed ouer the riuer of Iordan, and went out againſt them; and at laſt meeting and fighting with them, ouercame them, killing welny forty thouſand of their footmen, and ſeuen thouſand of their horſemen: hee hurt Sabecus alſo, Chalamas Lieutenant, who likewiſe died of that wound. The iſſue of this combate being thus, the Meſopotamians yeelded themſelues vnto Dauid, and gaue him many great and magnificent preſents. He therefore, by reaſon of the winter retired himſelfe for that time to Ieruſalem, but incontinently vpon the Spring time he ſent out his Lieutenant Ioab once more to make warre vpon the Ammonites: who ouerrunning their countrey, vtterly ſpoyled it, and ſhut them vp in Aramath their principall city, which he ouercame and entred. About this time it ſo fell out, that Dauid (notwithſtanding he were a iuſt man, and one that feared God, and an exact obſeruer of all the lawes and ordinances of his forefathers) fell, and offended God moſt grieuouſly. For as he walked on the top of his royall Palace, from the time of mid-day vntill the euening (for betwixt theſe times he vſed accuſtomably to walke) he perceiued a woman of incomparable beauty, and ſurpaſſing perfections, whoſe name was Bethſabe, who in her houſe bathed her ſelfe in a cleere and pleaſant fountaine: and being deuoured and rauiſhed with her beauty, hee could not refraine his concupiſcence, but ſending for her, tooke the ſpoile of her beautie and chaſtity: and by that meanes got her with childe. Which when ſhe perceiued, ſhe ſent vnto the King, beſeeching him to bethinke himſelfe of ſome meanes whereby her ſhame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazzard by the law for her adultery) might be preſerued. Who thereupon ſent for Vrias (Bethſabes husband and one of Ioabs ſouldiers, who at that time was at the ſiege of Aramath) and queſtioned with him vpon his ariuall, as touching the eſtate of the ſiege and of the army: who anſwering him that all things were ſalne out according as he could wiſh; Dauid tooke a portion of his owne ſupper and gaue it him, willing him to repaire vnto his owne houſe, and repoſe himſelfe with his wife. But Vrias did nothing leſſe, but ſlept among his fellow ſouldiers neere vnto the perſon of the King. Which when Dauid vnderſtood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his owne houſe, according to the cuſtome of husbands that had beene long time abſent vpon a long voyage, and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had beene ſequeſtred ſo many daies? Vrias replied, that it became him not either to repoſe or take pleaſure with his wife, whilſt his companions and Generall lay vpon the bare ground in the enemies country. Which ſaid, Dauid commanded him to ſoiourne there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might ſend him backe againe to Ioab. That night the King inuited him to ſupper, and although hee were made drunke through the abundance of wine hee receiued (which the King had purpoſely cauſed to be giuen him (yet notwithſtanding hee ſlept at the Kings gate without any desire to repaire home vnto his wife. Herewith the King was much despited, so that he wrote G vnto Ioab, commanding him to punish Vrias, because he had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his should not be discouered, he suggested him both in the meanes and manner of the prosecution of his death, enioyning him to place him in the ranke of greatest danger, and in face of the enemy, to the intent, that in the fight his person might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whilest they that fought next vnto him, retyred when they saw him charged. When as he had thus written and sealed vp the letter with his owne seale, hee deliuered it to Vrias to beare vnto Ioab: who receiuing the same, and conceiuing the Kings pleasure, placed Vrias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight most desperately, appointing him out certaine of his best souldiers to second him, with purpose, that he would come and succour them with all his H power, to the end he might breake thorow the wall and enter the City.

Dauid writeth vnto Ioab to punish Vrias.

Ioab setteth Vrias in a dangerous place to encounter with the enemie.

Vrias (who was a noble souldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the King, and reputation amongst all those of his tribe, and tooke delight to be imployed in hazzardous attempts, and refused no danger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Ioab gaue priuate intelligence to those that were ranked next vnto him, that when they should see the enemy sally out with greatest furie, they should abandon Vrias. When as therefore the Hebrewes drew neere vnto the City, the Ammonites feared lest the enemy should speedily scale and enter the Citie on that side where Vrias was ranked: for which cause they picked out a squadron of the most resolute men amongst them, and setting open their gates, suddenly with swift course, force and violence, they cast themselues vpon their enemies. They that were neere Vrias seeing them I draw neere, retyred backe againe, according as Ioab had before-hand commanded them: but Vrias being ashamed to fly, or forsake his ranke, expected the enemy, and valiantly encountring him, hee slue diuers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the middest of them, hee was slaine, and with him some others of his companions perished in the conflict. This done, Ioab sent messengers vnto the King to certifie him, that not enduring the delay of the siege, and assailing and scaling the walles, hee was compelled to returne backe into his campe, with losse of some men, and repulse from the Citie; yet had he commanded the messengers, that if they perceiued the King to bee displeased with the newes, they should giue him to vnderstand that Vrias was dead.

Dauid is displeased with the newes of his ouerthrow.

The King hearing this discourse (according as Ioabs messengers had deliuered it) made a shew K to be displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him that he had so neerely approched the wall, alledging that he might haue done farre better, to haue taken the Towne by Myne or engine: vrging in way of example, the act of Abimelech Gedeons sonne, who intending to surprize by force a tower that was within the Citie of Tebez, was strooken with a stone that was cast at him by an old woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entring an action ouer-rash and dangerous, shamefully dyed. In remembrance of whose disaster, they ought to haue beene more warie,
" and not to haue approched the wall of the enemy so neerely. For it is a very good point in
" warre, to haue in memory both fatall and fortunate successes, to the end that when a man is in " the like dangers, hee may follow the one, and flie the other. Whilest hee thus rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Vrias death, which did somewhat appease him: So that he commanded them to tell Ioab, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of warre, that sometime the one side had the better, and sometime the other: to conclude, that he should prouide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receiue any further losse; counselling him by trenches and engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the Towne, should bee put to the sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things vnto Ioab, according to the Kings commandement. But Vrias wife, hauing notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him diuers dayes: and when the dule and lamentation were finished and performed to the dead; the King espoused her incontinent, and she bare him a man-child: yet God beheld not this marriage with a fauourable eye, but was wroth with Dauid, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dreame, hee blamed the King very sore. M Now Nathan, who was a wise and experienced man, knew well that when Kings are displeased, they suffered themselues rather to bee ouercome by passion, then by reason: for which cause hee determined to conceale the menaces and threatnings that God had made, for that time; and discoursed of other profitable matters with Dauid after this māner, requiring the King that it would " please him to censure and deliuer his opinion in the same. Two men (said he) dwelt in one and the " same City: the one of them was rich, hauing many troupes of great and small cattell; the other

A part of that whereon hee fed, and louing her as tenderly as a man would doe his onely daughter. It hapned that this rich man had a ſtranger that repaired to his houſe, for whoſe entertainement he would not ſuffer any one of his owne beaſts to be ſlain, but ſent a violent meſſenger, who took away the poore mans ſheepe, and cauſed it to bee dreſſed to entertaine his gueſt. This report of Nathans diſpleaſed the King very ſore, inſomuch as he ſwore vnto him, that hee that had beene ſo bold to commit ſuch an act, was a wicked man, and that reaſon required that he ſhould reſtore him fourefold, and that after hee ſhould bee put to death. Whereunto Nathan replyed, ſaying, that it was hee that deſerued this puniſhment, who had giuen ſentence againſt himſelfe, in that he had preſumed to commit ſo grieuous a ſinne. Moreouer, hee certified him of Gods diſpleaſure, who notwithſtanding hee had made him King ouer all the Hebrewes, and Lord ouer all the nati-
B ons round about, which were diuers and great; and who beſides theſe things had warranted him from the hands of Saul, and had giuen him wiues, whom hee had eſpouſed iuſtly and lawfully, was ſo deſpiſed & diſhonoured by him, that he had eſpouſed and kept by him another mans wife, and cauſed her husband to bee ſlaine, and betrayed him vnto his enemie. For which ſinnes of his, hee pronounced that hee ſhould be puniſhed by God, and his wiues ſhould be violated by one of his owne ſonnes, who ſhould likewiſe lay a ſnare for him: ſo that hee ſhould ſuffer a mani- feſt plague for the ſinne hee had committed in ſecret. Moreouer (ſaid he) the ſonne which thou ſhalt haue by her, ſhall ſhortly die.

Nathan prophecieth of Dauids puniſhment, and ſharpely rebuketh him: he is condemned by his owne mouth, and repenteth himſelfe.

After the King had receiued this meſſage, he was ſore troubled; & being confuſed, he powred
C forth teares and ſighed for ſorrow, confeſſing that he had done wickedly: for vndoubtedly before this time he had alwaies feared God, and had neuer in his life offended him, but in that act with Vrias wife, whereupon after his ſubmiſſion, God was appeaſed and tooke compaſſion of him, promiſing him to continue both his life and kingdome, and that he would be no more diſpleaſed with him, if ſo be that he repented him of the ſinne he had committed. After that Nathan had declared theſe things vnto Dauid, he departed vnto his owne houſe. But God inflicted a grieuous ſickneſſe on the infant that was borne by Bethſabe: for which cauſe the King was ſore aggrieued, and for ſeuen daies ſpace would take no refection; notwithſtanding that he was earneſtly inſtanted thereunto by his houſhold ſeruants. He put on likewiſe a mourning habit, and laid himſelfe on the ground vpon a ſacke: beſeeching him that it would pleaſe him to grant him the childs life,
D towards whoſe mother he bare ſo exceeding loue and affection. But when the infant was deceaſed about the ſeuenth day of his ſickneſſe, his ſeruants durſt not certifie him thereof, ſuppoſing that if it ſhould come vnto his eare, he would the more obſtinately abſtaine from eating, and the care of his perſon ſhould bee in danger by reaſon of his diſordinate griefe for his childe, to procure and haſten his own death, conſidering he had ſo vehemently bin afflicted and tormented for his onely ſickneſſe. But the King perceiuing by their lookes that his ſeruants were troubled, and that they concealed ſome fatall harme, and gathering thereby that his ſonne was dead: he called vnto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, hee aroſe and waſhed himſelfe,
E and put on a white garment, and preſented himſelfe before the tabernacle of God, and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and ſeruants were very ſore amazed, and wondred why he hauing done none of theſe things during the childs ſicknes, ſhould now after his death doe all theſe things at once; they beſought him therefore that it might be lawfull for thē to demand the cauſe of theſe his proceedings. To whō he anſwered, that he would teach and diſcouer that vnto them, of which they were ignorant. Vnderſtand you not (ſaid hee) that while the child was aliue, and I had hope of his recouery, I omitted no means whereby I might mooue God vnto mercy? but now after that he is dead, it were in vaine for me to ſpend my ſelfe with vnneceſſary griefe. Which when they heard, they praiſed the wiſedome and conſideration of the King. After this he knew Bethſabe his wife, who became with child, & was brought a-bed of a ſonne, who (by Nathans direction) was called Salomon. Meane while Ioab preſſed the Ammonites with a ſore ſiege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things neceſſarie; ſo that they were welny famiſhed for want of victuall and prouiſion: for they drew their water from a lit tle ſpring in ſuch ſort, that they feared leſt if they ſhould vſe it to their owne contentment, it would bee ſodainely drie. He therefore wrote vnto the King, and certified him of the eſtate of the City, and exhorted him to come in perſon, and be preſent at the ſurprizall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be fained by his name.

the crowne of the King of the Ammonites waighing a talent of gold, in the midst wherof was enchased a Sardonyx of great valew, which Dauid wore vpon his head. He found likewise in that citie diuers spoyles of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the Cities of the Ammonites which he tooke by force. But after that the King was returned vnto Ierusalem, there fell a grieuous accident in his family vpon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull, and surpassed all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, borne by the same mother that Absalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of Dauid became enamoured: and for that he could not enioy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginitie, and the hand that was had ouer her) he grew so melancholy that his body dryed vp, and his colour changed through the very griefe that consumed him. A certaine cousin and friend of his called Ionathan (a man of great reach and quicke vnderstanding) perceiuing this his passion, and noting euery day how Amnons beautie and strength decayed and wasted, came vnto him and asked him the cause thereof, alleadging that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was growne passionate through the loue hee bare vnto his sister by the fathers side, Ionathan suggested him both the meanes and inuention to compasse his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himselfe to be sicke, and that if his father came to visit him, hee should desire him to send his sister to minister vnto him, by which meanes he should easily and speedily be deliuered of his sickenesse. This counsell of his was plausible in Amnons eares, who presently counterfaited sickenesse; and laid him downe on his bed (according as Ionathan had aduised him:) and when Dauid was come to visit him, he required him to send his sister vnto him, which he did. She being arriued, he praied her, that with her owne hands she would temper, and fry some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her owne making: for which cause she in her brothers presence tempered the flowre, and made certaine cakes and fried them in the frying pan, and presented them vnto him: but he tasted them not, but commanded all his seruants to retire themselues out of his lodging, because hee intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soone as this commandement of his was performed, hee prayed his sister to bring the meate into his most retired and priuie chamber: whereunto the damsell condescended: whereupon he sodainly surprized her and began to perswade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said vnto him: Forbeare, my brother, forbeare to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Giue ouer this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which will breed nought else but disgrace & infamy to our whole family; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, require me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from mee by force. But hee inraged with loue, neglected all these sayings, and wholly poisoned with the sting of disordinate passiõ, rauished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist. And as soone as hee had aslaked his lustfull desire, a certaine hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many iniurious words against Thamar: so that hee commanded her to arise and depart. Shee answered, that this second outrage was more hainous then the former; for that hauing violated her, hee would not suffer her to remaine there vntill night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, & during the light, to the end she might meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: Notwithstanding all these iust reasons of hers, he commanded his seruant to driue her out of the doores. Shee strangely aggrieued at the outrage and violence that had beene offered her, tore her garment (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the Citie with cries and lamentations, wherein shee expressed what wrong had beene done vnto her. With her thus distracted, her brother Absalon met, enquiring of her what euill hap had befallen her. To whom she reported all the iniurie which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her selfe, and to suffer moderately whatsoeuer had befallen her; and not to suppose herselfe to bee indignified by an act of her brother. Whereupon shee condescended, forbearing her exclaimes, and surceasing to publish the iniuries shee had receiued in the eares of the people. And thus remained shee a long time with her brother Absalon in the quality of a widdow.

Amnon perswadeth his sister to submit to his lust. Amnon notwithstanding his sisters resist, violateth her.

Absalon inuited his father and brethren to his sheepshearing, and commandeth his seruants to kill Amnon, being ouercharged with wine & sleep.

Dauid hauing intelligence of that which had hapned, was sore displeased, notwithstanding hee loued Amnon very entirely, who was his eldest sonne, and would not disquiet him: but Absalon hated him extremely, expecting (without any word speaking) for some fit opportunity, wherein he might reuenge himselfe on the rauisher. Now when as two yeeres were expired since his sister was both derided and deflowred, it chanced that Absalon intending a sheep-shearing in Belsephon, a Citie of the tribe of Ephraim, inuited his father and brethren to come and banquet with him.

him. But when the King refuſed to goe, for feare leſt he might be chargeable vnto him: Abſalon inſiſted and perſwaded him to ſend his brothers thither, which he granted. Hereupon Abſalon commanded his ſeruants, that when they ſhould ſee Amnon charged with wine and ſleepe, they ſhould ſuddenly (vpon a ſigne giuen by him vnto them) kill him without feare or regard of any perſon.

CHAP. VIII.

How through the Domeſticall diſcord of his family, DAVID was baniſhed by his ſonne out of his kingdome.

AFTER that Abſalons ſeruants had thus executed his commandement, a trouble and feare ſeized all the reſt of his brethren, inſomuch as they ſuſpected their owne perſons: for which cauſe mounting themſelues on horſe-backe, they poſted all in haſte towards their father. But a certaine man out-ſtripping them in the way, reported vnto Dauid that Abſalon had ſlaine all his ſonnes. Who ſurprized with a bitter and mortall feare, in ſuppoſing that ſuch a number of his children ſhould be ſlaine, and that by their own brother, neither inquired the cauſe or any thing els which might be ſifted out in ſo grieuous an inconuenient that had hapned, but gaue himſelfe ouer to extreme and ſtrange diſcomforts, and renting his garments, laid him downe on the earth, bewailing all his children, both theſe that were ſlaine, as him alſo that had ſlaine them.

Dauid is certified that all his ſonnes are ſlaine by Abſalon.

But Ionathan the ſonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his paſſion, telling him that he could not be perſwaded that the reſt of his children were ſlaine, in that he could conceiue no probable cauſe of coniecture. But as touching Amnon there needed no queſtion, for that it was very like that Abſalon (by reaſon of the iniury which was offered vnto his ſiſter Thamar) would hazzard himſelfe to kill him. Meane-while a great trample of horſes, and a confuſed troupe of men brake off their diſcourſe. Theſe were the Kings ſonnes, who returned in poaſt from the banquet: Againſt theſe the father iſſued out, accompanying their dolefull teares with a heauy and ſorrowfull countenance: and ſeeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he ſuppoſed to be loſt, returned in ſafetie, they were all of them on euery ſide giuen ouer to teares and lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the king his murthered ſonne. But Abſalon fled vnto Geſſur (vnto his grandfather on the mothers ſide, and Lord of that place) and ſoiourned with him three whole yeeres: at the end whereof Dauid determined to ſend for his ſonne Abſalon, not to the intent to puniſh him, but to retire him vnto him (by reaſon that the indignation he had conceiued againſt him, was at that time aſlaked) Ioab alſo furthered this his reſolution by all meanes that were to him poſſible: For he cauſed a certaine old woman attired in mourning habit, to preſent her ſelfe before Dauid, who ſaid vnto him, that betwixt her two ſons that liued in the countrey, there hapned ſuch a difference, that falling to handy-ſtrokes, they were ſo whet the one againſt the other, that not induring to be parted, the one of them in ſuch ſort wounded the other, that he died; and for that the kinſmen were ſore moued againſt the murtherer, and ſought without mercy to depriue him of life, ſhee humbly beſought the King that he would giue her her ſonnes life, and not depriue her of that hope that remained her to ſuſtaine her old yeers with; which he ſhould bring to paſſe, if ſo be he prohibited thoſe that would kil her ſon from executing their intents: for that except it were for feare which they had of him, they would by no meanes be withdrawne from their fatall and bloody reſolution. Now when as the King had granted her requeſt, the woman began once more to breake into theſe ſpeeches: I moſt humbly thanke your maieſty (ſaid ſhe) who haue had compaſſion of mine age, and doe ſo prouidently foreſee that I be not depriued of my ſonne; but to the intent I may be the better aſſured of thy humanity, I beſeech thee (O King) firſt of all pacifie thy diſpleaſure conceiued againſt thy ſonne, and be no more incenſed againſt him: For how can I perſwade my ſelfe that you will do me this grace, if you your ſelfe euen vntill this day continue your diſpleaſure conceiued vpon the like occaſion againſt your ſonne? For it is contrary to the rules of wiſedome, to adde to the remedileſſe loſſe of one ſon, the hapleſſe death of a fathers liuing hope. Vpon theſe words the King began preſently to ſuſpect that Ioab had ſuborned this woman, & vnderſtanding no leſſe by the old womans report, he ſent for Ioab, and told him that he granted him that which he deſired, commanding him to ſend for Abſalon, aſſuring him that his diſpleaſure was pacified, and choller aſſwaged. Ioab caſt himſelfe downe proſtrate before the King, and reuerently receiuing his word of reconciliation, went vnto Geſſur and fet Abſalon from thence with him, and brought him to Ieruſalem. The King vnderſtanding that his ſonne drew neere, ſent out a meſſenger to meet him, com-

commanding that as yet he ſhould not preſume to preſſe into his preſence, becauſe hee was not G diſpoſed to behold him ſo ſuddenly. Who vnderſtanding the will of his father, forbore to ſhew himſelfe vnto him, and went and dwelt amongſt his owne familiars and houſhold ſeruants: Neither was his beauty any waies decreaſed by the ſorrow he had conceiued, or for that his entertainment was farre different from the bringing vp and nouriſhing of a Princes ſonne; but he rather excelled and grew more famous thereby: ſo that for beauty and goodlineſſe of perſonage, he exceeded all thoſe that liued more deliciouſly and daintily: his glibband or haire was ſo thicke that it could ſcarcely be powled in eight daies, and waighed two hundred ſicles, which amount to fiue pound. He liued alſo two yeeres in Ieruſalem, and was the father of three ſons, and one faire daughter, which Roboam the ſonne of Salomon afterwards tooke to wife, of whom he begat a ſon called Abia. In proceſſe of time he ſent meſſengers vnto Ioab, that now at length he would pacifie H his father, and beſeech him to admit him to his preſence, that he might both ſee and ſubmit him-ſelfe vnto him. But becauſe Ioab made ſmall reckoning of theſe his motions, hee ſent of his ſer-uants, and commanded them to burne and ſpoile Ioabs poſſeſſions that abbutted vpon his: who hearing of that which had hapned vnto him, reſorted vnto Abſalon, accuſing him and queſtioning with him for what cauſe he had done him this iniury. To whom Abſalon anſwered: I haue (ſaid he) inuented this ſtratagem to make thee come vnto mee, ſeeing thou madeſt ſmall account of my commiſſions, whereby I haue charged thee to reconcile mee vnto my father. And at this preſent I beſeech thee that thou wilt mooue my father in my behalfe; otherwiſe I ſhal thinke my returne more grieuous then my baniſhment hath beene, if ſo be my father ſhall as yet continue his diſpleaſure. Ioab was perſwaded through the compaſſion he conceiued of, the neceſſity wher- I in he ſaw him, and went and ſollicited the king, with whom he ſo effectually debated as touching Abſalon, that altering his contrary diſpoſition, he graciouſly and ſpeedily ſent and called for him.
As ſoone as he came vnto his preſence, Abſalon caſt himſelfe proſtrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: But Dauid raiſed and lifted him vp, and promiſed him that from thenceforth hee would no more vpbraid him with thoſe miſ-deeds. After all things had thus falne out, Abſalon within a little ſpace aſſembled a great number of horſes and Charriots, and entertained fifty men for his guard, and euery day early in the morning preſented himſelfe before the Kings Palace, and talked with thoſe that reſorted thither; about the tryall of their differents:
and whereas ſome of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alleadging that his father had no good counſellers, and that perhaps he himſelfe had in K ſome things iudged amiſſe: and by theſe means indeuoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them that if he had the like authority, he would make them know by proofe what his equity was. Hauing by theſe plauſible perſwaſions drawn the hearts of the common people vnto him, he thought himſelf already ſeized of their ſeruices in whatſoeuer he intended. Some 4. yeers after his reconciliation, he came to his father Dauid, requiring of him that he might goe to Hebron & ſacrifice vnto God, according as he had vowed at ſuch time as he fled from his preſence.
Which requeſt of his when Dauid had granted him, he reſorted thither being attended with great affluence and concourſe of all the people (by reaſon he had appointed diuers to meet him others of Ieruſalem, who altogether ignorant of his enterprize, aſſembled themſelues in that L place to be aſſiſtant to his ſacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, according as he him-ſelfe had commanded them to doe. When the newes hereof came vnto Dauids eares, and he was thorowly aſcertained beyond all conceit, how his ſonne had behaued himſelfe; he ſuſpected and doubted his impiety and arrogancy, wondring that he ſhould ſo ſoone & ſo lewdly forget him-ſelfe of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrary to all law plunge himſelfe and hazzard his reputation in more grieuous offences: as firſt of all to peruert the eſtate of the kingdome which God had eſtabliſhed: and ſecondly, in complotting to depriue and degrade his owne father. For which cauſe he determined to flie to the other ſide of Iordan, conducting with him his moſt inward and hearty friends, to whom he reported the vnbridled fury of his ſonne, remitting all things vnto God who iudgeth all things; and leauing the M gouernment of his royall houſe to the diſpoſition of his ſixe concubines, he departed from Ieruſalem. With him iſſued an affectionate and great number of people; beſides thoſe ſixe hundreth ſouldiers, who had followed him in his baniſhment during Sauls life time. And although the high prieſts Abiathar and Sadoc with all the Leuites had concluded to depart with him, yet perſwaded he them to abide with the Arke, aſſuring them that God would deliuer them; yea although the Arke were vnremooued from his place. He commanded Abiathar likewiſe to ſend him priuate

But Ethæus the Gittite by no perſwaſions of the King could be induced to ſtay, but contrary to his command followed him, whereby he more manifeſtly expreſſed his affection towards him. But as he mounted and aſcended on his bare feet vpon the mountaine of Oliuet, and all they of his traine followed him (intermixing their trauell with bitter teares) a certain meſſenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Abſalon, and held on his ſide. Which report aggrauated and increaſed his griefe: ſo that he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to alienate the affection of Abſalon from Achitophel, for feare leſt if he ſhould giue him ſome ſiniſter counſell, he Ethæus departed with Dauid.

B might eaſily be perſwaded thereunto; becauſe that Achitophel was a man of ripe iudgement and ready execution in all that concerned him. As ſoone as he came vnto the top of the mountaine, he beheld the City: and as if he had vtterly been baniſhed from his Kingdome, he began with aboundant teares to call vpon God. There met he with Chuſai his ſincere and vnfained friend, whom when he beheld with his garments rent, with aſhes on his head, and lamenting the vnhappy change which he then beheld: Dauid cheered him, and exhorted him to be no waies diſcomforted; and finally, beſought him to returne vnto Abſalon, as vnder a colour that he had forſaken his part, where diligently prying into his ſecrets, he might oppoſe himſelfe againſt Achitophels counſels, becauſe he might not ſo much pleaſure him in keeping him company, as in ſtaying with Abſalon. Chuſai being after this manner perſwaded by Dauid, returned backe to Ieruſalem, where preſently after he encountred with Abſalon, who repaired thither. C time Dauid marching onward a little further, chanced to meete with Siba Mephiboſeths ſeruant, and Purueior of all thoſe goods which Dauid had giuen him (for that he was Ionathans ſon, who was the ſon of Saul.) This man droue before him two Aſſes loaden with victuals, which he preſented to Dauid and his company, to refreſh themſelues with; and being demanded where he had left Mephiboſeth: In Ieruſalem (ſaid he) where he expecteth to be choſen King, through the occaſion of thoſe troubles that had hapned, and in memory of the benefits that diuers men had receiued at Sauls hands. Dauid diſpleaſed with that which he heard, gaue Siba all thoſe riches wherewith he had gratified Mephiboſeth in times paſt, deeming him more worthy of the ſame then Mephiboſeth. Wherewith Siba was very highly contented.

2 King. 16. Siba accuſing his maſter wrongfully, is made owner of his riches.

D When Dauid drew neere vnto a place which is called Choran, a certaine couſin of Sauls, called Simei, the ſonne of Gera, came out againſt him, and caſt ſtones at him, and reuiled him; and the more Dauids friends inuironed and defended him, the more obſtinately perſeuered he in his reproofes and ſcandalous railings: calling him murtherer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an impure and execrable man to get him out of the Kingdome, giuing God thanks for that he had depriued him of his Kingdome by the meanes of his owne ſonne, and in puniſhment of thoſe crimes which he had committed againſt his owne maſter. This his ſo cruell and vnbridled liberty, moued all Dauids followers to diſpleaſure; ſo that all of them were prepared to reuenge them on Simei; and amongſt the reſt Abiſai would haue ſlaine him: but Dauid pacified his diſ-

Simeies reuiling of Dauid.

Dauid forbiddeth to kill Simei.

E pleaſure, willing him to forbeare, for feare (ſaid he) leſt to our preſent miſeries we annexe a further and new occaſion. For in as much as concerneth my ſelfe, I ſet light by this madde dog, and referre the matter vnto God, who is the cauſe that he is thus deſperately bent againſt vs. Neither is it to be wondred at, that I ſuffer theſe outrages by him, ſith mine owne ſon is ſo wicked, as he taketh a felicity to diſdaine me: but it may be that God will haue compaſſion on vs, and if hee pleaſe, we ſhall haue the vpper hand ouer our enemies. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei ſaid, who ran on the other ſide of the mountaine, railing and reuiling at him. When Dauid was arriued on the banke of Iordan, he muſtered and refreſhed his army, who were ſore wearied: meane while Abſalon entring Ieruſalem with Achitophel his counſellor, was ſaluted and applauded by the whole concourſe of the people; and amongſt the reſt, Dauids friend

Chuſai vnder a colour offereth his ſeruice to Abſalon.

F came vnto them, who proſtrating himſelfe before Abſalons feete, wiſhed him both proſperity and perpetuitie in his Kingdome. Him did Abſalon aske how it came to paſſe, that he who was reputed to be one of Dauids moſt indeared friends, and eſteemed alwaies to be moſt loyall and faithfull vnto him, ſhould at that time (when moſt occaſion was proffered him to expreſſe his loyalty) abandon him, and ſubmit himſelfe to his enemie? To him Chuſai anſwered both readily and wiſely, that it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

Sith therefore (ſaid he, my Soueraigne) that both theſe are for you, it concerneth me to follow you, becauſe you haue receiued the Kingdome from God: If therefore you eſteeme me to be your faithfull friend; I will approue vnto you my loyalty and true affection in like manner, as in your knowledge I haue teſtified in effect vnto your father, who ought not to be diſpleaſed at that which hath hapned, ſince the Kingdome is not tranſported into another houſe, but remaineth in his owne family, becauſe he who was his ſon receiued the ſame. By ſuch like words he reconciled himſelfe to Abſalon, whereas before that time he was inwardly ſuſpected. Hereupon Achitophel was ſent for to conſult with him about their affaires in hand: who gaue him counſell to abuſe all his fathers concubines; and make them his owne. For, ſaid he, from that time forward, the people will beleeue that you and hee will neuer be reconciled; and will be more ready to beare armes and inuade your father for your ſake. For hitherto (ſaid he) they haue vnwillingly profeſſed themſelues to be his enemies, ſuſpecting leſt a peace ſhould be concluded betwixt the father and the ſonne. Abſalon beleeuing this aduice of his, cauſed a Tent or roiall Pauillion to be pitched in the ſight of all the people, whereinto he entred, and had the company of his fathers Concubines. All which fell out, according as the Prophet Nathan had fore-told, at ſuch time as he certified Dauid, that his owne ſonne ſhould make warre againſt him.

CHAP. IX.

ABSALONS warre againſt his father: his death, and the diſcomfiture of his army.

WHEN Abſalon had done that which Achitophel had inſtructed him in, he requeſted him once more to counſell him concerning that warre which he had enterprized againſt his father: who required ten thouſand choſen men at his hand, promiſing him to kill Dauid, and to bring all the reſt that were in his conduct vnder his ſubiection: aſſuring him that Abſalons Kingdome would bee then eſtabliſhed, when Dauids head were cut off from his ſhoulders. When this aduice of his had highly contented him, he ſent for Chuſai, who was the chiefeſt amongſt Dauids friends (for ſo Dauid himſelfe had tearmed him) to whom he diſcouered the aduice which Achitophel had giuen him, and required him to giue his opinion what hee thought thereof: who knowing very well that if Achitophels counſell were followed, Dauid ſhould bee in danger to be apprehended and ſlain, enforced all his arguments and counſels to the contrary. For,

„ ſaid he, my Liege, you are ſufficiently informed both what your fathers valour is, and their vertue „ that accompany him; who hath fought many battels, and hath had the vpper hand ouer all his e„ nemies. It is to be feared alſo leſt he at this preſent be encamped in the field. For, he is well exer„ ciſed in leading armies, and to preuent any ſtratagems, whereby the enemy may inuade him, and „ about the euening hee hath perhaps left his men hidden in ſome ſtraight, or in ambuſh behinde „ ſome rock: and if our men ſhall aſſaile him, his ſouldiers will by little and little retire, and after„ ward recouering courage, by reaſon that the King ſhall be neere vnto them, they will charge vs a-„ freſh; and during their medley, your father will ſuddenly breake out of his ambuſh, and encourage „ his owne men, and diſcomfort yours: wiſely therefore examine mine aduice, and if you finde that „ it be good, neglect that which Achitophel hath giuen you. Send mee thorow all the countrey of „ the Hebrewes, commanding euery one to take armes and march out againſt your father: and „ when you haue gathered together theſe forces, be your ſelfe in perſon the Generall of the army,
„ and commit it not to another mans charge, and aſſuredly expect to haue an eaſie victory ouer him, „ if you aſſaile him in the open field, for that he is accompanied with a very few men, and your „ ſelfe are attended by many thouſands, who at leaſt-wiſe if they loue you, and will ſhew a good af„ fection towards you, may eaſily rid you of that enemy. And if ſo be your father ſhut himſelfe vp
„ in any City, we will and may ſubuert the ſame by Mynes and engines. This aduice of his ſeemed to be better then that of Achitophels, ſo that Abſalon preferred the ſame. For it was God that put this thought into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and reſpect Chuſais counſell.

2 King 17. Achitophels counſell perſwading Abſalon to purſue Dauid. Chuſais oppoſition.

Chuſais counſell accepted: Achitophels reiected.

Now when Chuſai had thus preuailed, he preſently repaired to the high Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, certifying them what Achitophel had complotted, and how he had contradicted him: finally, how his opinion had taken place, giuing them in charge to ſend priuate intelligence vnto Dauid thereof, and to informe him of his ſonnes reſolution, wiſhing him with all ſpeede to paſſe ouer the riuer of Iordan, for feare leſt Abſalon being informed of his aboad in that place, ſhould make haſte and purſue him, and ouertake him before he might recouer a place of ſecuritie.

Now had the high Prieſts before-hand prouided that their ſonnes ſhould lye hid without the Citie, of ſet purpoſe, to the end they might be ſent vnto Dauid to informe him how matters went. They therefore ſent a truſty ſeruant vnto theſe, who brought them newes of Abſalons deliberations, with expreſſe commandement to enforme the King thereof with all ſpeed, Sadoc and Abiathars ſons ſent vnto Dauid.

A who presently vpon this intelligence, like good and faithfull ministers, posted with all speede to report their fathers newes vnto the King.

The yeere of the world, 2920. before Christs Nativitie, 1044.

But scarcely had they trauelled two furlongs, when certaine horsemen discouered them, and brought newes thereof vnto Absalon, who presently sent out scoutes to apprehend them: which when the children of the high Priest perceiued, they forsooke the high way, and incontinently retired themselues into a certaine village neere vnto Ierusalem, which is called Bocchura, where they besought a certaine woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of securitie, who let them downe into a pit, and couered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. She being demanded by those that pursued them, whether she saw them, denied the same, saying, that as soone

The high Priests sonnes being pursued are hidden by a woman in a pit.

B as she had giuen them drinke, they departed from her presently; assuring them that if they presently and speedily pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not finde them, they returned from whence they came. The woman perceiuing that they were departed, and that there was no cause of feare, lest the yong men should be surprized, she drew them out of the pit, and set them onward of their way: who, with as great speede as was possible, resorted vnto Dauid, and declared vnto him exactly what Absalons deliberation was. Hereupon Dauid passed the flood Iordan presently with all his men, and although it were night, could not be withdrawne by reason of the darknesse.

Dauid informed of Absalons deliberation, passeth himselfe and his whole armie ouer Iordan by night.

But Achitophel seeing that his opinion had beene reprooued, tooke his horse and suddainly repaired vnto his coūtrey of Gelmone: there calling together his houshold seruants before him, he

C discouered vnto them what aduice he had giuen Absalon; which since he had not accepted, he told them that shortly they should see him dead, alleadging that Dauid would haue the vpper hand in the war, & should returne into his kingdome. It is better therefore, said he, for me, with a great mind, & as it becommeth a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my selfe to Dauids punishment for partaking with Absalon, and giuing him counsell. This said, he repayred himselfe into the most secret part of his house, and hung himselfe, being both his owne Iudge and executioner: after which, his kinsmen cut him down and buried him. But Dauid (as we said) hauing past Iordan, came and incamped in a strong Citie, the most defenced in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great beneuolence by all the noble men of that coūtry, partly moued thereunto by the mans present necessitie, partly through the reuerēce of his former felicity.

Achitophel perceiuing his counsell was despised, hung himselfe.

Dauid commeth to Mahanaim, where he is royally entertained by the Peeres.

D These were Berzillai the Galaadite, Siphar the Gouernour of the prouince of the Ammonites, & Machir the chiefe of the country of Galaad, who gaue Dauid & his whatsoeuer they wanted, in abundance: so that they lacked neither beds, nor bread, nor flesh, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sicke and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serue for repose or refection. In this estate remained he. But Absalon assembled a great multitude of people to make warre vpon his father; and after he had passed Iordan, he pitched his tents neere vnto his fathers, within the country of Galaad, and made Amasa Generall of his armie, opposing him against Ioab his cousin: for Amasas father was Iethar, and his sister was Abigail, sister to Saruia, mother to Ioab. When Dauid had mustered and numbred his forces, and found that hee had fortie thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently to hazzard battell, & not to expect till Absa-

E lon should charge vpon them.

The diuision of Dauids armie.

Hee therefore ordained Coronels ouer thousands of his men, and diuided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gaue in charge to Ioab; the second to Abisai his brother; and the third to Ethæus his familiar friend (who was of the city of Geth.) In this battel his friends would not admit his presence (and that vpon good and deepe consideration) for they said, that if they should be defeated in his company, they should vtterly lose all good hope: but if one squadron should be ouercome, the rest might haue their recourse vnto him, who might assemble vnto them and strengthen them with greater force; the rather for that the enemies would alwaies thinke it likely, that he had some other army with him. This counsell of theirs seemed pleasing vnto him, for which cause he remained within the City. But at such time as he sent out his friends vnto the battell, he besought them that (in remembrance of all the benefits and fauours hee had bestowed

Dauid's friends dissuade his presence in the battell.

F on them) they would both shew themselues couragious and faithfull men in the fight; & that hauing obtained the victory, they would spare his sonne, for feare lest his death should increase, & redouble his discontents. Thus praying God to giue them victory, hee dismissed them to enter battell. But when as Ioab had planted his armie right ouer against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plaine, hauing a wood vpon their backs; Absalon also drewe out his army against him. So that encountring, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazzarding themselues in all dangers, and employing ployng all their affections, to the intent that Dauid might recouer his kingdome: the others neither refusing to doe or endure any thing, so that Absalon might not be depriued, or exposed to his fathers punishment and displeasure for his insolent attempt. Besides that, they held it an indignitie for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be surmoũted by such a handfull of people as followed Ioab: deeming it to be an vtter disgrace vnto them, that being so many thousands of them in armes, they should be discomfited by Dauids followers. G

The flight and ouerthrow of Absalons armie.

But Ioab and his men being more skilfull and trained in feates of armes then the rest, discomfited and brake Absalons army: so that they fled thorow woods and steepe places. Dauids souldiers pursuing after them, tooke some, and slew other some; so that both in flight & fight, a great number of them were put to the sword: for there fell that day about twenty thousand men. But all Dauids troupes freshly set vpon Absalon, who was easily knowne by reason of his absolute beauty, and high stature: he fearing to be surprized by his enemies, mounted vpõ his royall mule, and fled in great haste. And for that by swift motiõ of his body, his locks were scattered abroad, his bush of haire was entangled in a thicke & branchie tree, where he hung after a strange manner, and his mule ranne onward with great swiftnesse, as if shee had as yet borne her Master on her backe: but he hanging by the haire amidst the brãches, suddainly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certaine souldier perceiued, he brought newes thereof vnto Ioab, who promised him to giue him fiftie sicles, if he would kill him. H

Ioab killeth Absalon.

The souldier answered, that if he would giue him two thousand, he would not commit such a murther on the sonne of his Soueraigne, the rather for that in the presence of them all, Dauid had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Ioab commanded him to shew him the place where he had seene Absalon hang: who no sooner discouered him, but thrusting a Iauelin to his heart, he slew him. That done, Ioabs Esquires arrounding the tree, tooke him downe; and casting him into a deepe and obscure pit, they ouerwhelmed him with stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a tombe, or some great, high, and stately monument. After this, when Ioab had sounded the retreat, he withdrew his souldiers from pursuite, supposing it to be an innaturall thing for one countreyman to flesh himselfe vpon another. I

Absalon had erected in the royall valley two furlongs distant from Ierusalem a Marble pillar, which he had intituled by the name of Absalons Hand; saying, that when his children should be dead, his name should remaine in that pillar. Now he had three sonnes, and a daughter which was called Thamar, as we haue said heretofore, who was married vnto Roboam, Dauids Nephew, and had by him a sonne called Abia, who succeeded his father in the kingdome: of whom we will speake more conueniently in his place. CHAP. X.

Chusai sent to certifie Dauid of the victorie.

AFTER that Absalon was slaine, all the people returned priuately to their owne houses: but Achimaas the sonne of the high Priest Sadoc drew neere vnto Ioab, requiring his licence to repaire vnto Dauid, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods helpe and prouidence he had obtained the victory. This did the Generall denie him, telling him that it was not conuenient that he, who before times was wont to bring ioyfull newes, should now certifie the King of his sons death. He therefore commanded him to stay, & calling Chusai to his presence, he gaue him commission to certifie the King of that which he had seene. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to go, promising him that he would make no mention but of the victory; & that as touching Absalons death, he would not vtter any thing: whereupon he dismissed him also, who chusing the shorter way (which he onely knew) outstripped Chusai. Now as Dauid sate in the gate of the Citie (expecting some messenger that might certifie him of the successe of the battell) one of the Sentinels perceiuing Achimaas, that came running hastily, and vnable to discouer who it was, told Dauid that he saw a messenger comming towards him: who answered that it was some one that brought ioyfull newes. Anon after he told him that a certaine other messenger followed: To whom Dauid answered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceiued that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the high Priests son, & that he was neere at hand, he ran first of all & certified Dauid; who was very glad thereof, saying, that he brought some good & desired newes as touching the euent of the battell: and no sooner had the King spoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himselfe vpon his face before Dauid, to whom he reported that his armie had the victorie. Being afterwards L M

terwards demanded what was become of Abſalon? He anſwered, that he incontinently departed from the campe as ſoone as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certaine cry of ſouldiers that purſued Abſalon: and further then, that he knew nothing, becauſe by Ioabs commandement hee was ſpeedily ſent away to bring tidings of the victory. When Chuſai was come and had humbled himſelfe before the King, and had declared vnto him the ſucceſſe of the battell, the queſtion was asked how Abſalon did? Whereunto he anſwered: The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Abſalon. Theſe words quite extinguiſhed the delight and ioy that Dauid conceiued in the victory, and wholly amated his faithfull ſouldiers: for as touching the King, he aſcending the higheſt part of the City, bewailed his ſonne, beating his breſt, tearing his haire, and afflicting himſelfe in all kindes, and after ſuch a ſort, as may not be expreſſed; and crying out in a mournefull manner: My ſonne (ſaid he) would God, my ſonne, that I were dead with thee, that I might be with thee. For whereas of his owne nature he was a very louing man, yet loued he Abſalon aboue all other moſt tenderly.

Dauid hearing of Abſalons death by Chuſai, grieuouſly bewaileth him.

When the army and Ioab were informed that Dauid lamented his ſonne in this ſort, they had this reſpect, that they would not enter the City after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them moſt tenderly, as if they had returned from ſome diſcomfiture. But when as the King hauing his head couered, perſeuered in his deſire to bewaile his ſonne, Ioab entred in vnto him, and ſaid, O King: you conſider not that in this behauiour of yours, you diſhonour your ſelfe: for it is to be thought that you hate thoſe that loue you, and expoſe themſelues to all perils for your loue; yea, that you hate your ſelfe and your own ſucceſſion: and that contrariwiſe, you loue your moſt mortall enemies moſt entirely, ſith you bewaile them that were no leſſe, & who are iuſtly depriued of their liues. For if Abſalon had had the victory, and had poſſeſſed the Kingdome in aſſurance, there had not any one of vs beene left aliue that loue you, but had all of vs ſuffered a moſt hated death; nay, and in the firſt ranke your ſelfe and your owne children: neither would they being our enemies haue lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea they would puniſh them likewiſe who ſhould haue any compaſſion of our miſeries: yet art thou not aſhamed to lament after this manner, for ſuch a man as moſt extremely hated thee, who notwithſtanding he were thine owne ſonne, was ſo vngratefull and vngracious towards thee. Deſiſt therefore from thy vniuſt lamentation, and offer thy ſelfe in preſence to thy wel-deſeruing ſouldiers, and giue them thanks that by their vertue haue obtained thee this victory: otherwiſe if thou continue as thou haſt begunne, this day will I tranſlate both the Kingdome and the army from thee, and giue thee occaſion more grieuouſly and truly to lament thee of thy misfortunes then thou didſt before. By theſe words Ioab pacified and alaied the Kings lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common-weale: for clothing himſelfe in a royall habit, whereby hee might ſeeme more gracious in the ſight of his ſouldiers, he ſate him downe in the gate: ſo that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to ſalute him.

Dauid is taxed for lamenting his ſon, & vpon Ioabs perſwaſion preſenteth himſelfe vnto the people.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11.

Whileſt theſe things paſt after this manner, they that remained aliue of Abſalons army, returning home vnto their houſes, ſent their meſſengers to euery corporation, aduertiſing them how many benefits they had receiued at Dauids hands, and how after many and grieuous wars, he had brought them to a ſecure liberty, and how vniuſtly expelling him, they had committed the Kingdome vnto another. For which cauſe it behooued them, ſith he was dead whom they had choſen, to make their ſupplication and ſubmiſſion vnto Dauid, that diſmiſſing his wrath, hee would receiue the people into his fauour, and according as beforetime, ſo now alſo he would vouchſafe them his pardon and protection. Of theſe things ſundry intelligences came vnto the Kings eare, ſo that by expreſſe letters he commanded Sadoc and Abiathar the chiefe Prieſts, that they would certifie the Princes of the tribe of Iuda, that it ſhould be a great indignity for them, that other tribes ſhould prefer Dauid to the Kingdome before them, eſpecially ſith he was both of their tribe, and their kinſman alſo. In like manner he commanded them to ſpeake with Amaſa the Generall, and expoſtulate with him, why hee who was his Nephew by the ſiſters ſide, did not perſwade the army to recommend the Kingdome to his hands: willing them to aſſure him that he was not only to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but alſo for the gouernment of the whole army, according as Abſalon had granted him. Hereupon the high Prieſt not onely conferred with the Princes aforeſaid, but alſo informed Amaſa what the King had promiſed in his behalfe, whereby they drew him to their faction. And firſt of all, thoſe of his owne tribe reuoked Dauid very inſtantly into the Kingdome: the reſt of the Iſraelites, by their example and Amaſas authority, did the like alſo; and theſe Ambaſſadors flocked vnto him to receiue him into Ieruſalem. But wonderful and praiſe-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Iuda, who went out as far as the banke of Iordan to meete with him, with theſe came Simei the ſonne of Gera, with a thouſand men, which he had brought with him of the tribe of Beniamin. Sitha likewiſe Sauls freeman came thither with his fifteen ſons, & twenty ſeruants: who made a bridge ouer Iordan, that the King might the more eaſily paſſe ouer, both himſelfe and his army. As ſoone as he came vnto Iordan, he was ſaluted by the tribe of Iuda: and Simei marched onward on the bridge, and proſtrating himſelfe at the Kings feet, asked pardon of his offences, and beſought him to remit his diſpleaſure: and that in recouering his authority, hee would not firſt of all doe iuſtice on him, but that hee ſhould remember this alſo, that he being induced by the repentance of his errour, did with the formoſt march out to meete him vpon his returne. Whileſt thus he beſought and lamented, Abiſai, Ioabs brother, ſpake after this manner: Why ſhould he not dye that hath thus villanouſly outraged the King, whom God hath eſtabliſhed? But Dauid turned backe vnto him, and ſaid: Ye ſonnes of Seruia, will you neuer ceaſe to hatch new troubles; and to adde new diuiſions to your former commotions? Know you not that this is the firſt day of my raigne? for which cauſe I ſware an oath that I will pardon all them that haue committed any impiety againſt me, & that no one man ſhall depart from me in my diſfauour. For which cauſe be of good cheere, Simei, & feare thou not that I will ſeeke thy blood. Wherupon he adored the King & marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboſeth, Sauls nephew came out to meet him, clothed in a deſolate and ſorry raiment, hauing his haires hanging downe, in a neglected & ſorrowfull manner. For ſince the time that Dauid fled and forſooke the city, he had bin in ſuch ſort diſtreſſed, that he neither had trimmed his haire, nor changed or cleanſed his garment, ſuppoſing this calamity & diſpoſition to touch him as neerly, as it did the King: and further, in that by Siba his ſteward, he had bin vniuſtly detracted and accuſed to the King. After he had proſtrated himſelfe, and adored the King, Dauid asked him for what cauſe he forſooke him in his troubles, and offered not himſelfe to accompany him in his flight? Who anſwered, that it was the wickednes of Siba, who was the cauſe thereof: for he, ſaid he, being commanded to prepare my neceſſaries for that iorney, neglected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had beene ſome abiect ſlaue: Otherwiſe had I had the vſe of my feet, and the meanes to haue waited on thee in thy iourney, I had neuer endured to haue forſaken thee. Neither was he contented (my Liege) to hinder my deuout ſeruice toward thee, but furthermore, hee hath maliciouſly incenſed your Maieſty againſt me: yet know I well, that your wiſedome will not admit or giue credit to his detractions, both for that you are iuſt, as alſo for that God and truth which you onely aſpire to, are onely beloued by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers dayes, you were alwayes conuerſant amongſt the moſt difficult dangers, and followed and attempted by him, and whereas all our poſterity by that meanes deſerued to be vtterly extinguiſhed, yet haue you vſed both moderation and meeknes, eſpecially in forgetting thoſe indignities; at ſuch time as the memory thereof affoorded you meanes to puniſh them. And notwithſtanding all theſe things, you haue entertained me like your friend, feaſted me at your daily table, and dignified mee with no leſſe honours, then if I had beene one of your neereſt and deareſt kinſmen. When Dauid had heard theſe things, he thought neither good to puniſh Mephiboſeth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accuſed him; but after he had certified him that he had giuen Siba all his goods, yet did he pardon him, and promiſe him the reſtitution of halfe his poſſeſſions. Whereunto Mephiboſeth replied: Let Siba (ſaith he) poſſeſſe the whole, it onely ſufficeth mee that I ſee your Maieſty reſtored againe into your Kingdome. After this, Dauid inuited Berzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man and of great authoritie, and by whoſe bounty during the time of his warre he was aſſiſted, and who had attended him as far as Iordan) to accompany him vnto Ieruſalem, promiſing him to make no leſſe account of him then of his father, and aſſuring him liberally to allow him all things that concerned his honour and age. But hee being deſirous to liue in priuate, beſought his Maieſty to diſmiſſe him from the Court, becauſe (as hee ſaid) his age was ſo extreme as it made him vnapt for courtly pleaſures, conſidering that he had attained to the age of fourſcore yeeres: alledging that it better became him to thinke of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cauſe, he beſought Dauid to fauour him ſo much, as that he might gouerne himſelfe according to his owne deſire, becauſe that by reaſon of his age, he neither knew how to ſauour meate nor drinke: beſides, for that his hearing was loſt, ſo that he could not diſtinguiſh nor diſcerne the ſound of inſtruments, wherein they who conuerſe in Kings Courts, doe moſt vſually take ſuch delight.

Simei is pardoned.

Mephiboſeth purgeth himſelfe of Sibas ſlanders.

Dauid pardoneth Mephiboſeth, and reſtoreth him to the halfe of his poſſeſſions

Berzillai excuſeth himſelfe, and will not reſort to Ieruſalem.

To this Dauid replied, Sith (ſaid he) thou doeſt ſo inſtantly requeſt me to giue thee leaue to depart from me, I diſmiſſe thee: but leaue thou thy ſon Achimaas with me, who ſhall be maſter of my many fauours. Hereupon Berzillai left his ſon with him, and taking leaue of the King (with prayer prayer that God would grant him the fulnes of all his desires)he returned to his own house.But Dauid went vnto Galgal (hauing already the halfe part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Iuda.) Thither resorted then vnto him the chiefe Gouernours of that countrey,attended by a great multitude of people,complaining vpon the tribe of *Iuda,*for that vnwitting to the rest they had resorted to him,when as by a mutual consent they should all of them haue met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Iuda requested them in no sort to misconstrue their preuention of them.For that by reason of alliance they had done this office,wherby being tied vnto him,they were bound with more feruent study to doe him seruice: for neither in respect of that diligence of theirs receiued they any rewards,whereby they that came after should think themselues preiudiced in profit. This answer of theirs the Princes of the Tribes tooke not in good part, but thus they spake vnto their brethren: We wonder (said they) that you onely challenge the King to be your kinsman, as if he were not to be accounted an allie vnto vs all, whom God hath equally placed to be Gouernour ouer vs all;when as therefore the whole people consisteth of eleuen parts,you onely are but one;besides,we are your elders:so that you haue not dealt vprightly,in that you haue secretly & couertly sought out the King.Whilest the Gouernors in this sort debated the matter with them,a certaine wicked and seditious person called *Siba,*the sonne of Bochri, of the tribe of *Beniamin,*standing vp in the midst of the people,began to cry out with a loud voice,and to exclaime after this manner: We haue no part with Dauid, nor inheritance with the sonne of Iesse. This said,he sounded a trumpet,and proclaimed warre against the King, so that all men followed him,and forsooke Dauid. Onely the tribe of Iuda remained with him, and established him in the royall Throne in Ierusalem: where remooving his concubines (which his son Absalon had knowne) out of his Palace, he neuer after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amasa Generall of the army, and placed him in the same degree which Ioab had,neere vnto the person of the King;commanding him that he should assemble the greatest forces that he might out of the tribe of *Iuda,*and that within three daies he should return vnto him,to the end that hauing deliuered him both the army & the place of Generall,he might send him to make war vpon the son of Bochri. After that Amasa was departed,and emploied his time in gathering vp his army;the King seeing that he failed to returne vpon the third day, told Ioab that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater head by delay,and thereby breed vs more trouble and molestation then Absalon had done.For which cause(said he)stay thou not,but take vnto thee those forces which thou hast in readinesse, and my sixe hundreth men with thy brother Abisai, and pursue thou the enemie, and in what place soeuer thou meetest him, by all meanes indeauour thy selfe to giue him the battell. Haste thee therefore, and ouertake him,for feare lest he seize some of our strongest Cities,and thereby procure vs much trauell and labour. Ioab with all expedition obeyed his commandement,and tooke with him the aforesaid sixe hundreth, with his brother Abisai, and commanded all the forces that were in Ierusalem to follow after him, and in his array issued he after Siba. Now when he came vnto Gabaon (a borough, some forty furlongs distant from Ierusalem) Amasa came and met with him,and brought with him great forces. Ioab hauing his sword girt by his side, and his curets on his backe, whilest Amasa came onward to salute him,subtilly and of set purpose let his sword slip out of his sheath, and taking it vp from the ground with one hand, he drew neere vnto Amasa, vnder pretence to kisse him on the chin,and suddenly thrust the sword that was in his other hand into his belly and slew him. Which action of his was both hainous and detestable, proceeding from a iealousie he had conceiued against a good young man and his cousin, who had in no sort offended him, and onely by reason of the estate of Generall, which the King had giuen him; and because Dauid had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cause before that, he had slaine Abner. Notwithstanding this act of his seemed in some sort pardonable,by reason of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done vnto his brother Azael, yet was not this a sufficient colour to excuse the murther of Amasa. When this was done, he pursued Siba, and left a certaine man to waite vpon the body of *Amasa,*who had commandement giuen him to proclaime with a loud voice thorow the whole army,that he was iustly and deseruedly slaine, commanding those that bare any fauour to the Kings title,to follow their Generall Ioab and his brother Abisai. Now whilest his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is vsuall in such like accidents) flocked round about it,he that had the charge of the body tooke it vp, and bare it into a certaine place out of the way, and couered it with a garment: which done,all the people followed Ioab.

but that he begirt the City, and entrenched it round about; commanding his ſouldiers to vnder- G mine and ouerthrow the walles: for he was ſore diſpleaſed becauſe they had ſhut the gates a-gainſt him. But a certaine honeſt and prudent woman, ſeeing her countrey in extreme perill, aſcended the walles and called Ioab and his ſouldiers to a parlee; who comming forth to conferre with him, ſhe ſpake after this manner: God (ſaid ſhe) ordained Kings and Generals of armies, to the end they might deſtroy the enemies of the Hebrewes, and plant amongſt them an vniuerſall and perpetuall peace; but you inforce your ſelues to deſtroy one of the mother Cities of Iſrael, that hath in no ſort offended you. Ioab praied God to be fauourable vnto them, and ſaid that for his owne part it was not his meaning that any one of the City ſhould die, neither his pretence to raze and deface ſo famous a City; his intent was onely, that if Siba the ſonne of Bochri, and the H Kings aduerſary were deliuered into his hands to do iuſtice on him, he would leuy the ſiege, and cauſe his army to retire from thence. When the Woman had heard what Ioab had ſaid, ſhe prai-ed him to ſtay a little while, promiſing him incontinently to caſt his head ouer vnto him. Wherupon ſhe came downe amongſt the aſſembly of the Citizens, to whom ſhe ſpake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miſerably ſuffer your wiues and children to be ſlaine for a wicked mans cauſe, and a ſtranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of Da- uid your King, from whoſe hands you haue receiued ſo many benefits? thinke you that one only City can reſiſt ſo huge an Army? After this manner perſwaded ſhe them to cut off Sibas head, and to caſt it into Ioabs campe: which done, Ioab commanded the retreat to be ſounded, and leuied the ſiege, and returning backe into Ieruſalem, was once more declared Generall of all the people. The King alſo appointed Banaia Captaine of his guards, and of ſixe hundreth ſouldiers.
Adoram was made Treaſurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achilaus had the charge of remembrancers. Suſa was made Secretary. Sadoc and Abiathar were made the High Prieſts. After this it hapned that the Countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cauſe Dauid beſought God that he would haue compaſſion on his people, and that it might pleaſe him to manifeſt not onely the cauſe, but alſo the remedy of that malady. The Prophets anſwered him, that God would be reuenged of the wrong done to the Gabeonites, whom King Saul had deceiued and traiterouſly ſlaine, without reſpect of the oath, which the Gouernor Ioſuah and the elders made vnto them. If therfore he would ſuffer the Gabeonites to reuenge the death of their ſlaughtered friends according to their deſire, God had promiſed to be appeaſed, and to deliuer the people I from their eminent and preſent euils. As ſoone as he vnderſtood by the Prophets what God required, he ſent for the Gabeonites, and asked them what it was which they required: who wiſhed him to deliuer into their hands ſeuen of Sauls ſonnes to take their reuenge on them: whereupon the King made ſearch after them, onely ſparing and protecting Mephiboſeth the ſonne of Io- nathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold on theſe ſeuen, they executed them according to their pleaſures: and thereupon God incontinently ſent downe raine and diſpoſed the earth to beare fruit; moiſtning and alaying the drouth forepaſſed, ſo that the land of the Hebrewes reco-uered againe his priſtine fruitfulneſſe. Not long after, the King made war vpon the Philiſtines:
and at ſuch time as the battell was ſtriken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chanced that the King hotly purſuing the chaſe was left alone, and diſcouered in his wearineſſe by one of the enemies called Acmon, the ſonne of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beſide his ſword had a iauelin, the point whereof waighed three hundreth ſicles, and a corſelet tiſſued with chaines, who returning backe charged Dauid very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reaſon that he ſaw him ſpent with trauell. But about the ſame inſtant, Abiſai, Ioabs brother, arriued in the place, who ſtept betweene them and reſerued the King, and ſlew his enemy.
The whole Army for a little ſpace were grieuouſly diſcomforted, in regard of the danger wherin the King had been, and the Gouernours ſwore that he ſhould neuer afterwards enter into battell with them, for feare leſt he might fall into ſome diſaſter, by reaſon of his readineſſe and valour, and by that meanes ſhould depriue the people of thoſe gifts which were in him, which he had already made them feele; and whereof hereafter they ſhould be made partakers, if God ſhould M vouchſafe him a long and bleſſed life. The King hauing intelligence that the Philiſtines were aſſembled in the City of Gazara, ſent out an Army againſt them, in which Sabath the Hittite, one of Dauids redoubted and picked ſouldiers behaued himſelfe very valiantly, and gat great reputation: for he ſlew diuers of them that vaunted themſelues to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed vp with preſumption of their valour, and was chiefe authour of that victory which the Hebrewes had.

After this laſt receiued loſſe, the Philiſtines once more hazzarded their fortunes in warre, a-gainſt whom when Dauid had ſent out an army, Nephanus his kinſman ſhewed himſelfe very valiant: For fighting hand to hand againſt him that was accounted the moſt valiant Champion amongſt all the Philiſtines, he ſlew him,and put the reſt to flight; of whom very many dyed in the battell alſo. In proceſſe of time they reincamped neere vnto a City not far from the frontiers of the countrey of the Hebrewes: In which army of theirs there was a man ſixe cubits hie, who had on either foote and either hand, a finger more then accuſtomed bequeſt of nature affoorded him. Againſt him Ionathan the ſon of Sama (one of thoſe that were ſent by Dauid in this army) fought hand to hand and ſlew him: ſo that approuing himſelfe to be the means of that victory,he bare away the honour of the battell, and praiſe of his valour:for this Philiſtine boaſted likewiſe that he was deſcended from the race of the Gyants. After this battell they warred no more on the Iſraelites. Hereupon Dauid,deliuered from war and danger, and euer after enioying a perfect peace, compoſed Odes and hymnes in praiſe of God,in diuers kinds of verſe: for ſome are of three,other ſome are of fiue meaſures. He made inſtruments alſo, and taught the Leuites to praiſe God vpon them,on the Sabbath daies and other feaſts.The forme of theſe inſtruments was after this manher. The Cinnare is compoſed of ten ſtrings, and is plaid vpon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelue ſounds of cords,and is ſtriken with the fingers.The Cimbals were large and great,and made of braſſe, of which it ſufficeth in this ſort to make ſome mention, leſt the nature of thoſe inſtruments ſhould wholly be vnknowne.Now all thoſe that were about the King were valiant men: but amongſtall the reſt,there were eight moſt notable and heroike men. The noble actions of fiue of which I will declare, becauſe they might ſuffice to exemplifie the vertues that were in the other that remained: for they were capable to gouerne a countrey,and to conquer diuers nations. The firſt of them was Eſſemus the ſon of Achemæus, who hauing very oftentimes thruſt himſelfe into the midſt of his diſordered enemies, neuer gaue ouer fighting till he had ſlaine nine hundreth of them. After him was Eleazar the ſonne of Dodeias, who had accompanied the King in Sarphat. He in a certaine battell (whereon through the huge multitude of the enemies,the Iſraelites were affrighted and put to flight)onely kept his place and affronted the enemy,and ruſhing in among them made a great ſlaughter of them: ſo that thorow the great quantity of bloud which he ſhed, his ſword ſtucke faſt to his hand; and the Iſraelites ſeeing the Philiſtins put to flight by him, came downe and ran vpon them,and obtained a miraculous and famous victory ouer them. For Eleazar ſlaughtered thoſe that fled,and the reſt of the army followed and ſpoyled thoſe that were ſlaine. The third was the ſon of Ilus called Sebas,who fighting againſt the Philiſtines,in a place called the Iawe (and ſeeing the Hebrewes to be affraid of their power, and almoſt out of heart) reſiſted them alone,as if he had beene an arraunged army, and ſlew ſome of them,and purſued and put the reſt to flight,in that they were vnable to ſuſtaine his force and violence. Theſe three exploited with their owne hands theſe executions of warre. About that time that the King liued in Ieruſalem, the army of the Philiſtines came out to make war vpon him, and Dauid as we haue declared heretofore) was gone vp into the higher City to aske counſell of God, what the euent of that war ſhould be;and the enemies being incamped in that valley(that extendeth it ſelfe as far as Bethleem, a City ſome twenty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem) Dauid ſaid to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was borne,and eſpecially that which is in the pit which is neere vnto the gate, if any one will bring me of that water to drinke, I ſhall eſteeme it more then if he gaue me great riches. Theſe three men hearing theſe words,inſtantly ran out,and paſt thorow the enemies camp,and went to Bethleem:where hauing drawn water,they returned backe vnto the King, ſallying thorow the midſt of their enemies, bringing newes that the Philiſtines being afraid of their hardineſſe, and great courage, kept themſelues vpon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithſtanding their ſmall number. But the King taſted not of this water which they brought him,ſaying that it was bought with the danger of mens liues,and therefore that it was no reaſon he ſhould drinke thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation vnto God, giuing him thankes becauſe he had deliuered his ſeruants; After theſe three followed Abiſai Ioabs brother, who ſlew ſixe hundreth of the enemy in one day. The fift was Banaia of the race of the Leuites, who being defied by certaine brothers, famous amongſt the Moabites for their vertue, ouercame them. Moreouer, a certaine Ægyptian of a wonderfull ſtature, hauing defied him(notwithſtanding the ſaid Banaia was naked and the other armed) yet charged he him, and tooke away his iauelin and ſlew him. To theſe foreſaid actes of his,a man may annexe this as the moſt valiant, or very neerely equalling the reſt. For it came to paſſe, that after a certaine ſnow,a Lyon toſſing amidſt the flakes thereof, fell into a pit(whoſe mouth was ſo narrow,that a man could not diſcerne where it was,eſpecially for that at the same time it was couered with snow) where being inclozed, and seeing no means to escape, he roared out amaine: which when Banaia who passed that way heard, he followed the voice, and drew neere vnto the place; and afterwards went downe into the pit, where with a staffe he bare in his hand, he fought with, ouercame and slew the Lyon. The thirty three other were of like valour and vertue. But King Dauid being desirous to know how many thousands of men hee could number amongst the people, and forgetting the commandement ordained by Moses (who had giuen order that if the people had beene numbred, there should be paide vnto God for euery head halfe a sicle) he commanded Ioab to goe and number all the people: and although Ioab had manifestly proued vnto him that it was a thing no waies necessary; yet could he not perswade him, but that he enioyned him with all expedition, to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrewes.

Dauid sendeth Ioab to muster the people.

Hereupon Ioab tooke with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuited all the country of the Hebrews, to know how many men there were: and at the end of nine months and twenty dayes, he returned to Ierusalem to the King; and presented him with the list of the people, the tribe of Beniamin onely excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Leui.) This done, the King perceiuing that he had displeased God, was very sorrowfull and pensiue. The route of the other Israelites was of 900. thousand men, able to beare armes, and to follow the warre, besides that the onely tribe of Iuda contained 400. thousand men. When the Prophets had certified Dauid how God was displeased with him, he began to pray and beseech him that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad vnto him, who brought him the choise of three things, willing him to make election which of the three he would endure: either that famine for 7. yeers space should raigne in his countries; or that warre for three months space should afflict the same, wherein he should haue the worst; or that the plague and pestilence should for three daies space range amongst the Hebrewes. Being thus distraught and troubled by reason of his difficult election, amidst these imminent miseries; and the Prophet vrging him to returne a short answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the King bethinking him that if he should aske famine, hee should rather seeme to respect his owne security, then the Common-weale, in that no danger might by that meanes touch him, for that he had great store of corne in his barne, and they vnfurnished; and if for three moneths he should make choise to be ouercome by the enemy, in that case also hee might seeme to haue care of himselfe, in that he had many strong Castles and a valiant guard of men to attend his person: he therefore made choise of a plague, that was both as incident to the Prince, as the subiect; wherein each man was touched with equall and eminent feare: saying, that it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had receiued this answer from him, he reported it vnto God; who sent a plague and mortality amongst the Hebrewes, whereby they died after diuers manners: so that it was very hard to discerne the malady; which being but one kinde, yet notwithstanding seized the people by tenne thousand causes, and vnknowne occasions. For one of them died after another, and the sickneſſe surprizing them at vnawares, brought a suddain dissolution of the spirits, and swouning vpon them; so that some of them gaue vp the ghost with grieuous torments, and most strange dolors. Others were presently parched vp through the burning agonies they endured, and (vnrecouerable by any counsell or remedy) consumed away amidst their languishing fits and tortures. Others died strangled, hauing their eies suddenly darkned and blinded. Othersome giuing order for the buriall of their houshold seruants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day-breake (at which time the pestilent mortality began to rage) vntill dinner time, there died seuenty thousand persons. And now had the Angell of God stretched out his hand ouer Ierusalem, ready to inflict punishment thereon, when as the King put on sackcloth and prostrated himselfe on the ground, beseeching and praying God that it would please him to surcease his wrath, and be pacified with the number of those that were already consumed by the pestilence. Whilest thus he prayed, lifting vp his eyes, he beheld the Angell of God houering in the ayre ouer Ierusalem, with his naked sword: whereupon he besought God and said, that it was he that was the shepheard, who had deserued to be punished, and not his flocke; who ought to be fauoured in that they had not any waies offended, praying him to satisfie his displeasure vpon him and his posterity, and to spare the people.

The summe of the Israelites that were numbred.

Dauid hauing election of three sorts of punishment, chose the plague.

A huge slaughter of those that died of the pestilence that was inflicted by God.

Dauid prayed for the innocent people.

Hereupon God accepting his prayer, surceased the plague, and sent the Prophet Gad vnto him, commanding him that hee should presently repaire to the threshing floore of Oronna the Iebusite, and there build an Altar, on which he should offer sacrifice vnto God. Which when Dauid

uid vnderſtood, hee neglected not this ordinance, but went preſently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threſhed his corne) ſaw the King (accompanied by his ſonnes) comming towards him, he ranne out to meete him, and humbled himſelfe before him. This man was by nation a Iebuſite, and one of the greateſt friends that Dauid had (by meanes wherof he left him vnſpoiled at ſuch time as the fortreſſe of the Iebuſites was taken, as we haue heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cauſe his Lord came thus vnto him, who was his ſeruant? Dauid anſwered him that it was to this intent, that he might purchaſe his threſhing floore, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer ſacrifice vnto God. Oronna replied, that both his floore, Charriots, and Oxen were the Kings to offer vp for a burnt ſacrifice, beſeeching God that he would graciouſly accept that offering. To this the King anſwered, that he highly eſteemed his ſimplicity and magnanimity, and that he fauourably reſpected the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleaſure that he ſhould receiue the price of the ſame, becauſe he held it an inconuenient to offer ſacrifice vnto God vpon other mens charges. To this Oronna anſwered, that his Maieſtie might doe as beſt pleaſed him. Hereupon he bought the foreſaid floore of him for fiftie ſicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place and offered ſacrifice thereon, as well burnt offerings as other ſacrifices for proſperity: and by this meanes the diuine maieſtie was appeaſed, and euer after ſhewed himſelfe fauourable. (Now this place was the very ſame, whereto Abraham in times paſt had brought his ſonne Iſaac to offer him vp for a burnt ſacrifice vnto God, and as he was about to ſacrifice him, a Wether vpon the inſtant preſented it ſelfe vnto the Altar, wch Abraham offered vp in ſteade of his ſonne, as we haue heretofore made manifeſt.) Dauid ſeeing that God had heard his prayer, and fauourably accepted his ſacrifice, decreed that in that place the generall Altar of the people ſhould ſtand, and that on the very ſame floore hee would build a Temple vnto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified. For ſending his Prophet vnto him, he certified him that his ſonne that ſhould ſucceede him, ſhould build a Temple. After this propheticall declaration, the King commanded to number the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, and it was found that they were one hundreth and foureſcore thouſand men: of which number he appointed eighty thouſand to intend the hewing of ſtones; and ordered that the reſt of the common people ſhould beare ſtones vnto them: and he appointed three thouſand and fiue hundreth, who ſhould gouerne them, and haue the ouerſeeing of the works. He gathered alſo a great quantity of yron and braſſe, to worke vpon, with ſtore of huge and mighty Cedar trees, which they of Tyre and Sidon ſent him, whom hee had put in truſt to furniſh him therewith; telling his friends that hee made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his ſonne ſhould fortune to gouerne after him, he might haue ſtuffe in a readineſſe for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet young and vnexperimented, ſhould not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but hauing all things in a readineſſe, might finiſh the building of the Temple.

DAVID during his life time, ſurrendreth the Kingdome to SALOMON.

THEN calling vnto him his ſonne Salomon, he charged him that after his deceaſe, and his enſtalment in the kingdome, he ſhould build a Temple vnto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to performe the ſame; yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had beene ſoyled with ſlaughters, and brought vp in warre. Adding further, that it was foreprophecied vnto him, that the finiſhing of that edifice was by Gods ordinance reſerued to his yonger ſon that ſhould be called Salomon, whom God ſhould not leſſe tender and care for, then the father doth his ſon: and how the whole land of the Hebrewes ſhould be made happy vnder this Prince; and among all other benefits, that they ſhould haue peace (which is an eſpeciall prerogatiue and bleſſing) and not onely be freed from forraine wars, but alſo from ciuill diſſentions. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſince by God thou wert appointed King before thou waſt borne, indeauor thy ſelfe to be capable and worthy to be conducted by his prouidence, by honouring piety, iuſtice and fortitude, and keeping thoſe his ordinances and lawes, which he gaue vs by Moſes, and not permitting others to tranſgreſſe the ſame. And as touching the temple (which he will that thou ſhalt build when thou ſhalt obtain the kingdome) enforce thy ſelf to diſcharge that duty towards God: neither be thou diſmaid or afraid at the greatnes of the work. I shall depart out of this world, I will set all things in a readinesse for thee. Know therefore that I haue already gathered ten thousand talents of gold, and an hundred thousand talents of siluer; of brasse and yron there is as much, which is a thing innumerable; of stone and of wood, a matter most incredible. Moreouer, thou shalt haue many thousands of Masons and Carpenters, and if ought be defectiue besides these, thou shalt thy selfe make prouision thereof: when thou hast performed this, thou shalt be gracious in Gods sight, who shal be thy soueraigne and safe conductor. He exhorted also the gouernours of the people to set to their helping hand, and yeeld their assistance to his sonne in finishing this worke, and in furthering the seruice of God without suspition of any inconuenience; assuring them that they should enioy a firme peace, and a flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth vpon those that studie after pietie and iustice.) Moreouer he charged him to place the Arke within the Temple at such time as it should bee finished, with all other sacred vtensils, for the receit whereof the Temple should long since haue beene builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods command, who had enioyned them, that at such time as they should possesse their enemies land, they should build him a Temple. These were Dauids exhortations, not onely vnto his sonne, but also to the other Princes.

3. Kings 1.

Now when Dauid was very old, so that by reason of his yeeres his body was cold and benumd, that notwithstanding the many couerings and clothes they laid vpon him, yet could hee not be het or warmed: his Physicians assembled themselues together and consulted, and at last concluded, that one of the faireſt virgins that was in the countrey, might be chosen out to lie with the king: because by this meanes she might warme his chill limbes, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damsell called Abisace, which surpassed all other in beauty, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was vnable to haue the vse of a woman. But of this virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

Adonias affecteth the Kingdome.

The fourth sonne of Dauid was a goodly tall yong man, called Adonias, the son of Aegistha, who (resembling Absalon in complexion and ambition) began to vsurpe, with a deliberation to make himselfe king: and amongst his ordinary discourses which he vsed to his friends, he said that it behooued him to take possession of the kingdome. To this intent he prepared many chariots and horses, and fifty men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of these his proceedings, reproued him not, neither crossed this his deliberation; neither demanded of him likewise, wherefore he presumed to attempt such vnseemely actions. Of this his reuolt he had for his coadiutors Ioab the Generall, and the high Priest Abiathar: but they that contradicted him, were the high Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaia the Captaine of the guard, with Simei, Dauids friend: besides all other the valiant men at armes. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the Citie, and in the suburbs neere vnto the fountaine of the Parke royall, he inuited all his brethren vnto the same, except Salomon; and tooke with him Ioab and Abiathar, with the Gouernours of the tribe of Iuda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Banaia, and the rest of the contrary party, he called them not vnto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabe, Salomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King without the knowledge of Dauid, aduising her both to haue care of her owne security, and the estate and Maiesty of her son (who by reason of Adonias vsurpation was like to be supplanted) wishing her in person to certifie the King thereof: and further promising, that while she debated these things with the King, hee would come in the meane while, and confirme that which hee had said. Bethsabe being thus perswaded by Nathan, came vnto the King, and humbling her selfe before him (and afterwards requiring licence to speake vnto him) shee certified him of all those things that had hapned, according as she had bin aduised by the Prophet: particularly deciphering vnto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what guests he had inuited (namely Abiathar and Ioab, with the rest of his sonnes, except Salomon and his particular friends) vrging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should be, whom Dauid would nominate to succeed him: for which cause she earnestly besought Dauid, that he would prouide and foresee, that he who should succeed him in the gouernment, should neither seeke her blood, nor the death of her son Salomon. Whilst Bethsabe discoursed after this manner, the Chamberlaines gaue the King to vnderstand that Nathan attended to speake with him. Wherupon, Dauid commanded that he should be called in, and as soone as he was entred, he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to gouerne & succeed in the kingdome after him? for that (said he) he hath made a sumptuous Feast; whereunto he hath inuited all thy sonnes, but Salomon; thither also hath he called Ioab: where, after the great cheere and banquetting, they haue proclaimed & cried, Long liue King Adonias. Furthermore (said he) he hath neither inuited me, nor the High Priest Sadoc, nor the

As ſoone as Nathan had made an end of his ſpeech, Dauid commanded that Bethſabe ſhould be called in (who had retired herſelfe out of the Kings chamber, at ſuch time as the Prophet entred into the ſame.) As ſoon as Bethſabe re-entred the chamber, Dauid ſaid vnto her, I ſweare vnto thee by that great God, that thy ſonne Salomon ſhall raigne after me, according as before this time I haue already ſworne vnto thee, and he it is that ſhall ſit vpon my throne, yea euen this preſent day. Vpon theſe words Bethſabe humbled herſelfe, and beſought God to grant the King long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc the high Prieſt, and Banaia Captaine of the guard, and

But as touching Salomon, he gaue him inſtructions how he ought to behaue himſelfe with piety and iuſtice, in the gouernment of all the people of the Hebrewes, and of the tribe of Iuda. After this, Banaia beſought God that it would pleaſe him to be

C fauourable vnto Salomon, and with all expedition Salomon was mounted vpon the Kings Mule, and conducted out of the Citie neere vnto the fountaine; where (after he had beene anointed with oyle) they brought him backe againe into the Citie with ioy and applauſe, wiſhing him a long and proſperous gouernment: then reconducting him to the Kings palace, they placed him in his throne; and on the inſtant all the people began to celebrate banquets and feaſts, and to diſport and reioyce themſelues with dances and inſtruments of muſicke: ſo that by reaſon of the multitude of inſtruments, both the earth and the ayre reſounded therewith. So that Adonias and they that banqueted with him, hearing the noiſe, were all of them ſore troubled, and Ioab in particular ſaid, that thoſe tunes and trumpetings did no waies content him.

Whilſt thus they ſate at the banquet, and euery man through amaze forbore to eate his meat

D (being diſtracted through variety of thoughts) Ionathan the ſonne of Abiathar came haſtily in amongſt them. This yong man did Adonias moſt willingly behold, and ſaid that he was a meſſenger of ſome glad tidings: but contrariwiſe he recited vnto them all that which had befalne Salomon, or had beene decreed by Dauid. Whereupon, Adonias and all his gueſts forſooke the banquet, and ſuddenly fled euery man vnto his owne houſe. But Adonias fearing the Kings diſpleaſure (by reaſon of his ambition and arrogancy) ranne vnto the Altar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a ſuppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reaſon had cauſe to doe.

Adonias for feare of the Kings diſpleaſure, flyeth from his banquet, and taketh hold of the hornes of the Altar.

Now when theſe tidings were brought vnto Salomon, and what hee had done, and how hee required that Salomon would aſſure him, that hee would neuermore call to memory that which had hapned, but pardon his offence: Salomon anſwered him graciouſly and moderately, and par-

E doned him that fault; notwithſtanding with this caution, that if hereafter it ſhould appeare that he intended or acted any rebellion, it ſhould be Adonias himſelfe, who ſhould be the author of his miſchiefe: with this anſwer he ſent ſome to deliuer him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Salomons preſence and had ſaluted him, he was commanded to repaire home vnto his houſe, without ſuſpect of any inconuenience: yet by the way was hee admoniſhed to behaue himſelfe vprightly for the time to come, if in any ſort he either reſpected his credit or profit.

But Dauid willing that his ſonne ſhould be accepted for their knowne and anointed King among the people, aſſembled the gouernours in Ieruſalem, with the Prieſts and Leuites; and firſt of all taking the number of them, he found thirty three thouſand men that were aboue thirty three yeeres old; 23000. of which, he appointed to take charge of the building of the temple, ſix thou-

F ſand to be Iudges and Scribes, with the like number of Muſicians to play vpon inſtruments, who were furniſhed by Dauid (as we haue heretofore declared) and diſtributed by him according to their families. So that ſeparating the Prieſts from the reſt of their tribe, he found foure and twenty families of them; ſixteene of the houſe of Eleazar, and eight of the houſe of Ithamar, giuing order that one onely family ſhould for the ſpace of eight daies performe Gods ſeruice. And thus were all the families diſtributed by lot in the preſence of Dauid, of the high Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, and of the Gouernours. The firſt family that aſcended the Temple was written firſt, the the ſecond next, and ſo ſucceſſiuely the reſt to the number of foure and twenty (and this law remaineth in the ſame ſort euen vnto this day.) He made alſo twenty & foure diuiſions of the tribe of Leui (who aſcended according as they were choſen by lot, in the ſame maner as did the prieſts, euery eight day.) He honoured in particular thoſe of Moſes poſteritie: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treaſury, and of thoſe preſents which the kings ſhould offer. He enacted alſo, that all (as well Leuites as Prieſts) ſhould ſerue God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moſes. That done, he diſtributed his whole army into twelue companies, with their Gouernours, Centurions and Conductors: euery ſquadron contained foure and twentie thouſand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Salomon, for the ſpace of thirtie dayes (continuing from the firſt vnto the laſt, with their Captaines ouer thouſands, & Centurions.) He likewiſe eſtabliſhed thoſe men in office and authority ouer euery ſquadron, whom he knew to be moſt reſolute and vertuous. He appointed alſo Surueiors, who ſhould haue the charge of the treaſure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whoſe names in mine opinion it were vnneceſſary to declare.) After that euery one of theſe things were in this manner diſpoſed, he ſummoned all the Gouernours of the Hebrewes (and in generall, all thoſe that had any commiſſion ouer the affaires or demaines of the Kings) to a generall aſſembly, and ſeating himſelfe in a high erected throne, he ſpake after this maner: My brethren & countrimen, I am deſirous that you ſhould know, that hauing determined with my ſelfe to build a temple vnto God, I haue made prouiſion of a great quantity of gold and ſiluer, the ſumme whereof amounteth to a hundred thouſand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the ſame, by reaſon of your warres, and for that my hand hath bin ſoiled with the ſlaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my ſonne (who ſhall ſucceed mee in my kingdome) ſhall erect a temple vnto him. Now therefore, ſith you are aſcertained, that amongſt the twelue ſonnes of Iacob, Iuda, by the generall conſent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongſt my ſixe brethren haue bin preferred and placed by God in the kingdome, and notwithſtanding no one of them ſuppoſeth himſelfe to be iniured: ſo do I alſo requeſt that Salomon hauing obtained the Empire, my other ſons, neither in reſpect of him, nor amongſt themſelues nouriſh any vnnaturall hatreds & ſeditions, but knowing that he is choſen by God, they may willingly ſubiect themſelues to his dominion. For wheras if God ſo pleaſeth, it is not to be miſliked to ſubmit our ſelues to forraine ſubiection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate & fauour your brother no otherwiſe, then if you were partakers of the ſame honours with him? Truly, I deſire nothing more then that Gods promiſes may be brought to effect, & that that felicity which attendeth this region (vnder the gouernment of Salomon) may preſently be diſperſed, and perpetually indure in this countrey. Which without doubt will ſo fall out, and all things ſhall happily ſucceed, if thou my ſonne be a maintainer of piety and iuſtice, and the ancient lawes and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwiſe, if theſe be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortality and miſery. After he had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he gaue his ſonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houſes & chambers, together with the number, height & breadth of the ſame. He alſo limited the waight of thoſe veſſels that were to be faſhioned either of gold or of ſiluer, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the ſame. Hee incouraged likewiſe the Gouernours & the tribe of Leui to aſſiſt him, both for that his yeeres had not as yet obtained their ripe maturity, as alſo for that by Gods diuine prouidence hee was admitted and elected King, and was appointed to build the temple, aſſuring them that the building would be very eaſie, and no waies laborious; conſidering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of ſiluer, and wood, beſides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of ſtone, a great quantity likewiſe of Emeraulds, & other ſorts of precious ſtones. Laſtly, he told them, that now alſo for the preſent, he would beſtow on them to that vſe, other three thouſand talents of pure gold, out of his owne treaſury to adorne the holy place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that ſhould ſtand vpon the Arke, and couer it with their wings.

The Princes of the people gaue a huge ſum of gold, ſiluer, braſſe, and precious ſtone towards the building of the Temple.

Now, when the King had ſpoken after this manner, all the Gouernours, Prieſts and Leuites according together, ſhewed a greater readineſſe, and made many ſignall and heroicall offers. For they tied themſelues to bring fiue thouſand talents of gold, and tenne thouſand ſtateres, of ſiluer a hundred thouſand, and of iron many thouſand talents; and if any one of them had a precious ſtone, he brought it and deliuered it to the treaſurers cuſtody, who was called Ialus, being one of Moſes poſterity. This thing highly contented all the people, and Dauid (ſeeing the affection and readineſſe of the Gouernors and Prieſts, and in generall of all the reſt) began to bleſſe God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator & Father of this whole world, the faſhioner both of diuine and

A and humane things, and the Preſident and Gouernour of the Hebrewes, and their felicity and the kingdome by him committed vnto him. After this, he prayed for all the people that they might be bountifully bleſſed, and priuately he beſought God to giue his ſonne a good and iuſt mind, furniſhed and adorned with all vertue. He commanded the people likewiſe to ſing praiſes vnto God: which they performed, and proſtrated themſelues vpon the earth, and afterwards gaue thanks vnto Dauid, for all thoſe benefits they had receiued during the time of his gouernement. The next day, in way of ſacrifice vnto God, they offered vp a thouſand calues, a thouſand rams, and a thouſand lambes for ſacrifice and a burnt offering: in way of peace offerings alſo, they ſlew many thouſand other beaſts. The King celebrated a feaſt all that day with the whole B people, and Salomon was anointed with oyle the ſecond time, and proclaimed King. Sadoc alſo was eſtabliſhed high Prieſt of all the people, and Salomon was conducted into the Kings houſe, and placed in his fathers throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

CHAP. XII.

NOT long time after this, Dauid fell ſicke through age: and knowing that he ſhould depart out of this world, he called for Salomon his ſonne, and ſpake vnto him after this C manner following; My ſonne, I muſt now depart and ſleepe with my fathers, and enter the common way, which both they that now liue, and thoſe which come after ſhall tract; from whence we may not returne, neither behold and reuiſit thoſe things that are done in this life. For which cauſe, whilſt I yet liue and draw onward to my death, I earneſtly exhort thee (as heretofore I haue counſelled thee) that thou behaue thy ſelfe iuſtly towards thy ſubiects, and deuoutly towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdome; charging thee to keepe his precepts and lawes which he hath giuen vs by Moſes, and to take heede leſt either ſurprized by flattery, or miſ-led by fauour, or ſeduced by couetouſneſſe or any other ſiniſter affection, thou be drawn to neglect and forſake the ſame: for thou canſt by no meanes continue in Gods fauour, except thou keepe his lawes, for otherwiſe he will withdraw his prouidence from thee. But if in ſuch D ſort as it becommeth thee, and we wiſh, thou behaueſt thy ſelfe towards him, thou ſhalt continue the kingdome in our family; and no other houſe at any time but our owne, ſhall obtaine the dominion ouer the Hebrewes. Remember likewiſe the iniquity of Ioab, who through emulation ſlew two good and iuſt Generals, Abner the ſonne of Ner, and Amaſa the ſonne of Iethram; puniſh him according as thou thinkeſt meete, for that hitherto he hath eſcaped puniſhment, by reaſon hee was ſtronger and more powerfull then my ſelfe. I command alſo vnto thee the ſons of Berzillai the Galaadite, whom for my ſake aduance to honour, and adorne with dignities: not in beſtowing any benefits on them, but in repaying thoſe courteſies I haue receiued, which their father with a liberall hand beſtowed vpon mee during the time of my baniſhment, and for which he made vs indebted to him. As touching Simei the ſonne of Gera, of the tribe of Beniamin, who during the time of my flight, and at ſuch time as I retired my ſelfe into my campe, in- E iured mee with great outrages, and afterwards came out to meete mee neere vnto Iordan, and tooke aſſurance of me, that for that time I ſhould not puniſh him; at this preſent ſeeke you after him, and doe iuſtice vpon him.

After he had thus exhorted his ſon, and had communicated with him all his affaires, both as touching his friends, as thoſe alſo whom he thought worthy of puniſhment, he gaue vp the ghoſt (after he had liued ſeuenty yeeres, and raigned in Hebron a City of Iuda for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres and a halfe, and thirty three in Ieruſalem ouer the whole nation.) He was a iuſt man, adorned with all vertue, requiſite in a King that ſhould haue the gouernment of ſo many nations. For he was valiant beyond compariſon, and in thoſe battels which he fought for his ſubiects, he was the firſt that thruſt himſelf into danger, and exhorted his ſouldiers to behaue themſelues valiantF ly, not commanding them like their Gouernour, but trauelling and fighting with them as their fellow ſouldier. Hee was ſufficient both in knowledge and foreſight, both how to accept of the preſent, and how to mannage his future occaſions: he was moderate and iuſt, courteous, and fauourable to thoſe that were afflicted, and both iuſt & gentle, which are thoſe ornaments wherewith Princes ought to be beautified: and in this great authority wherein he was placed, he ſtepped not any waies awry, but in reſpect of Vrias wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, then any other King of the Hebrewes, or other nations had done. His ſonne Salomon buried him him most royally in Ierusalem, with all those ceremonies which were accustomed in royall obsequies, and amongst other things, he buried a great and huge value of riches with him: the incredible estimate whereof may be coniectured by that which followeth. For one thousand three hundred yeeres after, the High Priest Hircanus being besieged by Antiochus surnamed the wicked (who was Demetrius sonne) and willing to gratifie him with some summe of money (to the intent he might leuie the siege, and transport his army some other wayes) and vnable to leuie money by any other meanes, he opened one Cabinet of the monuments of Dauid, from whence he drew three thousand talents, which he deliuered to Antiochus, and by this meanes deliuered the City from the siege (as we haue declared in another place.) And againe a long time after this, Herod also opened another Cabinet, from whence he tooke out a great summe. And as touching the Tombes of Princes, no man defaced them, because they were most magnificently builded, for feare lest they should be esteemed destroyers of Monuments. But for the present it sufficeth that I haue certified thus much.

The yeere of the world, 2931. before Christs Natiuitie. 1033.

2 King. 2. Salomon king of Israel after Dauids death.

WEE haue declared in the former Booke what Dauid was, how great his vertue hath beene, what profits and benefits those of his Nation receiued by him, what warres and battels hee worthily exploited, and how happily at last (through extremity of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Salomon his sonne (being at that time very young) had obtained the Kingdome, aud was placed in his Fathers Throne (according as Dauid had determined, and the diuine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common course in the election of new Princes) with happy acclamations wished him perpetuall felicity in all his affaires, and after his well gouerned estate and royaltie, long, many and prosperous yeeres. But Adonias, who during his Fathers life time, thought thought to poſſeſſe and ſeize himſelfe of the royall eſtate, came vnto the Kings mother, and with all humility & reuerence ſaluted her. To whom Bethſabe ſaid, that if there were any thing wherein ſhe might ſtead him, he ſhould manifeſt it vnto her, and that ſhe would grant it him willingly. Whereupon he began to ſay, that it was a thing very well knowne, that the kingdome appertained vnto him, both in regard of his age, as alſo in reſpect of the fauour and good liking of the people: but ſince that it had beene transferred vnto Salomon her ſonne by the will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his ſeruant, being very glad of the fortunate ſucceſſe of his affaires. He therefore beſought her that ſhe would ſollicite Salomon in his behalfe, and perſwade him to giue him Abiſace to wife, who had ſlept with Dauid, for that he had not any carnall company with her by reaſon of his age, and that as yet ſhe was fully poſſeſſed of her virginitie.

Adonias requireth Abiſace to wife.

Bethſabe promiſed him to further his ſuite to the vtmoſt of her power, and willingly to imploy her ſelfe toward the accompliſhing of the marriage, both for that the king was willing to gratifie her in whatſoeuer ſhe ſhould deſire, as alſo for that ſhee would inſtantly intreat him: ſo that he departed from her with aſſured hope of good ſucceſſe in reſpect of his marriage. Hereupon preſently did Bethſabe addreſſe her ſelfe to the king, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requeſted, and what ſhe had granted. When tidings came to Salomon that his mother came to viſit him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the royall treaſure was, he ſate him downe, and commanded his ſeruants to place a ſeat on his right hand, for his mother: who ſettled by him, ſpake vnto him after this manner. My ſonne, vouchſafe me one fauour that I ſhall requeſt at thy hands, and ſend me not hence diſcontented, and confuſed through thy refuſall. Salomon anſwered her, that ſhe ſhould command him, by reaſon that duty tied him to the ſatisfaction and fauour of his mothers ſuites, reprouing her for that inſinuation ſhe had vſed, by reaſon that thereby ſhee euidently expreſſed that ſhe was not thorowly aſſured to obtaine her demand; but that ſhe feared the refuſall and repulſe in the ſame: ſhe therefore required him to giue the Damſell Abiſace for wife to Adonias his brother. The King diſpleaſed at this her ſuit, diſmiſſed his mother, alleadging that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, and that he wondred that in requiring Abiſace to wife, he had not requeſted Salomon likewiſe to giue him place in the kingdome: for Adonias was elder then he, and had more mightie friends then he had; namely, the Generall Ioab, and the high Prieſt Abiathar. For which cauſe he incontinently ſent Banaia captaine of his guard to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling vnto him the high Prieſt Abiathar: The paines (ſaid he) that thou haſt indured by accompanying my father Dauid, and attending and bearing the Arke with him, make thee eſcape from death: yet notwithſtanding, for that thou haſt bin an aſſiſtant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I condemne thee to depart from my preſence, charging thee not to ſee my face any more, but to retire thy ſelfe to thine owne houſe, and there to liue in thy countrey vntill thou haſt ended thy daies: for hauing in this ſort neglected me, it is not conuenient that thou ſhouldeſt be in honour with mee. For this cauſe was the houſe of Ithamar depriued of the prieſtly dignitie (according as God had fore-propheeied to Eli, one of the anceſtors of Abiathar) and tranſlated to the race of Phinees, and eſtabliſhed in Sadoc. Thoſe of the race of Phinees, who led a priuate life all that time that the Prieſthood remained in the familie of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the firſt) were theſe; Boccias the ſonne of Ioſeph, Ioatham the ſonne of Boccias, Maræoth the ſonne of Ioatham, Aropha the ſonne of Maræoth, Achitob the ſonne of Aropha, Sadoc the ſonne of Achitob, who was the firſt high Prieſt vnder King Dauid.

The genealogie of the High Prieſt Sadoc.

Ioab hauing tidings of the death of Adonias, was ſeized with ſudden and extreme feare: for he loued him more then King Salomon, and by reaſon of that friendſhip which he bare vnto him, he iuſtly and vpon good grounds apprehended his owne danger, and in this reſpect he fled vnto the Altar, hoping in that place to be ſecured in regard of that reuerence which the King bare vnto God. But when Ioabs reſolution was made knowne vnto the King, he ſent Banaia vnto him with commiſſion to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the iudgement ſeat, that he might in that place iuſtifie his actions: But Ioab ſaid that he would neuer abandon the Temple, but that he had rather die in that place then in another. When Banaia had certified the King of this his anſwer, he commanded him to cut off his head in the ſame place, according as he required, and that in that ſort he ſhould be puniſhed by reaſon of the two murthers, which he had curſedly committed vpon the perſons of Abner and Amaſa: commanding that his body ſhould be buried in the ſame place, to the end that his ſinnes ſhould neuer depart from his race, and that both Dauid and Salomon might be held guiltleſſe of the death of Ioab. This command of his Banaia executed, and was afterward made Generall of the men of warre. Moreouer, the King eſtabliſhed blished Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simei also to build him a house in Ierusalem, to keepe himselfe therein, without passing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to breake that commandement, the penaltie which he should incurre, should be no lesse then death; and to the more serious performance of this his iniunction, he tied him by a solemne oath. Simei thanked Salomon for the charge he had imposed on him, and swore that he would fulfill the same: so that forsaking his owne countrey, he came and dwelt in Ierusalem, where after he had soiourned for the space of three yeeres, it hapned that he had newes that two of his fugitiue slaues had fled, and retired themselues into Geth: whereupon he went to find them out, and no sooner returned he backe againe with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandement; and that which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made vnto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cause calling him vnto him, he spake after this manner; Hast thou not sworne (said he) that thou wilt no waies abandon or issue out of this Citie to depart into another? Truly thou shalt not escape the penaltie of thy periurie, but I will see iustice done vpon thee for the same, & for those outrages thou didst offer vnto my father during his flight, at which time thou didst shew thy selfe to be a wicked man in all things: to the end that thou maist vnderstand that the wicked receiue no priuiledge, although that their punishments be for the present deferred, but at such time as they suppose themselues to be assured (because they haue suffred no punishment) their punishment is augmented and made more grieuous, then it had beene, if they had presently beene executed for their offences. Whereupon Banaia slew Semei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward Salomon had his royall estate secured, and after that his enemies had receiued condigne punishment, he tooke to wife the daughter of Pharao King of Ægypt, and afterwards builded the walles of Ierusalem, farre greater and more stronger then they were before: and all the rest of his life, he gouerned his Common-weale in peace; so that his youthfull yeeres hindred him not from the obseruation of iustice, and the maintenance of lawes, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the houre of his death: but behauing himselfe in all things exactly, he executed the affaires of his kingdome with that circumspection, that such as excelled him in yeeres, and were aduanced in prudence, could not surpasse him.

CHAP. II.

Of the wisedome, prudence, and riches of SALOMON, and how first of all he builded the Temple in Ierusalem.

AS soone as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vowes vnto God, on that brazen altar which was erected by Moses, and sacrificed thereon in burnt offerings a thousand head of cattell; which honourable deuotion of his was most acceptable vnto God. For the very same night, after he had appeared vnto him in a dreame, hee commanded him to aske whatsoeuer blessing (as he imagined) sufficient to recompence this his pietie. But Salomon required a most high and excellent thing, which God doth most liberally bestow, and men in like sort very happily receiue. For he demanded neither gold nor siluer, nor any other kinde of riches (such as a youthfull man would require) for these are onely affected by the common sort, when the other are onely worthy of the diuine magnificence: But giue mee (said he) O Lord, a ripe iudgement, and a good vnderstanding, to the intent that by these meanes, I may administer iustice to this people with truth and equitie. With this demand of his, God was greatly delighted, and promised him to giue him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glory, and aboue all these, such an vnderstanding and wisedome, as no one man either King or priuate hath had before him. Moreouer, that he would continue the kingdome in his family for many ages, if so be that he continued in the waies of iustice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers waies in imitating his chiefest vertues.

God appeareth to Salomon by night in a dreame, and willeth him to aske that which most of all he desired.

Salomon requireth wisedome at Gods hands, who with it giueth him riches and honours also.

After that Salomon had receiued these blessings from God, and was made happy by these promises, hee forsooke his bed, and worshipping God returned vnto Ierusalem, where hee offered great sacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnifically feasted all those of his household. About the same time a very difficult iudgement was brought him to decide; the resolution whereof, was very hard to be discouered. And I haue thought it necessary to declare the occasions whereon at that present the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may vnderstand the difficultie of the cause in question, and that if they happen at any time to be assistant in such like affaires, they might draw as it were from the counterfeit of this Kings wisedome, a perfect

module whereby they may directly ſhape an anſwer to ſuch demands as ſhall be offered them. Two women of looſe and luſtfull conuerſation came vnto him, one of the which (who ſeemed to haue ſuffered the iniury) began after this manner: I, O King (ſaid ſhe) and this woman dwell together in one chamber; but ſo it fortuned, that both of vs on one day, and at the ſame houre, bare each of vs a ſon: ſome three daies after we were brought a-bed, this woman lying by her infant, hath in ſleepe ouerlaid it, and ſtifled it, and hath taken my childe from betweene my knees and laid it by her, & ſettled the dead child whileſt I ſlept, in my boſome. Now on the morrow when I thought to offer the teate vnto mine infant, I found not mine owne, but perceiued that her child lay dead by me: for I knew it, becauſe I had exactly marked it. This my childe I haue demanded at her hands, and becauſe I could not recouer it, I haue made my recourſe vnto your Maieſties iuſtice, O King: for in that we were ſole women, and ſhee is obſtinate and feareth not to be conuicted by any, ſhe perſiſteth in her obſtinate deniall of the ſame. After the King had heard this her demand, he inquired of the other if ſhee had any thing to anſwer vnto this accuſation. But ſhee denying the act, and auerring that the childe which remained aliue, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and beſides that, ſince no man appeared that might determine the controuerſie, but all the aſſiſtants were amazed at the obſcuritie and difficultie of the debate; the King at laſt bethought him of this policy: He commanded that both the children ſhould be brought before his preſence, as well the liuing as the dead; and calling one of his guard vnto him, he commanded him with his naked ſword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the halfe of the liuing, and the other, halfe of the dead child. This ſentence of his was ſecretly condemned by all the people, accounting it very childiſh. In the meane time the true mother began to exclaime, and deſire that the matter might not paſſe ſo far, but rather that they ſhould giue the whole child that was aliue, vnto the other: for that it ſufficed her, ſo as ſhe might ſee him aliue, that he might be ſuppoſed to be anothers. The aduerſe part offered her ſelfe to behold the diuiſion of the infant: and moreouer required that the true mother ſhould be puniſhed. But the King coniecturing by the diſcourſe, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was moſt vnfained; adiudged the infant vnto her that cryed firſt, (for that in equitie ſhe was the true mother) and condemned the wickedneſſe of the other, who had murthered her owne childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people tooke this iudgement for an aſſured proofe and ſigne of the Kings prudence and wiſedome; and from that time forwards they reſpected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a diuine ſpirit. The chieftaines and gouernours vnder him thorow all the kingdome were theſe: Vri gouerned the countrey of Ephraim, wherein was comprized the rule of Bethleem. Aminadab commanded ouer the quarter of Dura, and the Sea coaſt, and had eſpouſed the daughter of Salomon. The great Plaine was ſubiected to Banaia the ſonne of Achila, who gouerned likewiſe all the countrey that extended towards Iordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulonites, as farre as the mountaine Libanus, and had vnder him ſixtie great Cities, and Forts. Achinadab gouerned all Galilee as farre as Sadon, and had eſpouſed alſo one of Salomons daughters called Baſima: Banacat had the countrey that confineth the Sea neere to the Citie of Arce: Saphat, the mountaines Itabyr, and Carmel, and the land of Galilee as farre as Iordan: Sonbeia gouerned the whole land of the Beniamites: Tabar had all the gouernment on the other ſide of Iordan, and was elected gouernour generall ouer them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrews wonderfully increaſe in riches, and the tribe of Iuda waxed opulent, by reaſon that the people addicted themſelues wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was vnder ſuch aſſurance, that being diſtracted by no warlike tumults, and beſides that fruitfully enioying a moſt deſired libertie, they eſpecially intended this thing onely, to increaſe their priuate and particular eſtates. The King alſo had other gouernours who ruled the Syrians, & commanded other ſtrange nations, which are extended from Euphrates as farre as Ægypt, who gathered the tribute of thoſe nations for the King. Theſe Barbarians euery day furniſhed the King for his owne Table, and the maintenance of his houſhold, with thirtie Cores of fine floure, and ſixtie of the courſer: ten fat Oxen, and twentie graſſe Beeues, with a hundred fat lambes. All which things, beſides veniſon and buffalles taken in chaſe, birds, and fiſh, were furniſhed daily by the Barbarians to ſerue the Kings houſhold. He had likewiſe a great number of charriots, ſo that he had fortie thouſand mangers wherein his coach-horſes fed; and beſides theſe he had twelue thouſand horſemen, halfe whereof kept alwaies about the King in Ieruſalem, the reſt were billetted in diuers villages belonging to the King, and remained there. And they that had the charge to furniſh the Kings expences, prouided likewiſe neceſſary prouen-

der for the horſes, conueying it to that place whereſoeuer the King ſoiourned. But ſo great was the wiſedome and prudence which God had beſtowed vpon Salomon, that hee ſurpaſſed all his progenitors: and the Ægyptians likewiſe, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt of all men, were farre behind him in wit. For he excelled all thoſe that in that time were in the greateſt account amongſt the Hebrewes, whoſe names I will not omit; and theſe they were, Ethan, Eman, Eman, Chalt and Dodan the ſonne of Imaon. He compoſed alſo a thouſand and fiue hundred bookes of Odes and Canticles, and thirtie thouſand bookes of Parables and Similitudes; for to euery kinde of plant he alluded the parable from Hyſope, vnto the Cedar. The like did he of all liuing creatures that feed on the earth, ſwimme in the waters, or flie in the ayre; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had hee omitted to ſearch their faculties in particular, but examined and diſcourſed on them all, and had an inward ſpeculation and knowledge of their ſeuerall and ſecret properties. Hee obtained alſo by inſpiration the Art of Magicke, for the profit and health of men, and the exorciſing and caſting out of diuels: for he deuiſed certaine incantations, whereby the diſeaſed are cured, and left the methode of coniuration in writing, whereby the diuels are enchanted and expelled; ſo that neuer more they dare returne: And this kinde of healing to this day, is very vſuall amongſt thoſe of our nation. For I ſaw a certaine popular and priuate man amongſt the Hebrewes, in the preſence of Veſpaſian, his ſonnes, tribunes, and other ſouldiers, that cured diuers that were poſſeſſed. And the manner of his cure was this: He applyed to the noſe of the Demoniack a Ring; vnder the ſeale whereof, was a root of thoſe things that Salomon had declared, which drew the diuell out of the noſtrils of the ſicke, as ſoone as he ſmelled the root: and as ſoone as the man was falne, he adiured him neuer more to returne, intermixing ſome mention of Salomon, and rehearſing thoſe incantations that were inuented by him.

After this, the ſaid Eleazar being deſirous to ſhew vnto them that were preſent, the efficacie of his Art, he ſet a pot or pitcher of water not farre from the place where the poſſeſſed ſtood, and commanded the diuell at ſuch time as he forſooke the man, to ouerturne the pot, and thereby to giue a ſigne vnto the aſſiſtants, that he had forſaken the poſſeſſed: which act of his manifeſtly declareth how great the ſcience and wiſedome of Salomon was. For which cauſe I thought good in this place to make mention therof, that the worthy nature of this King might be known vnto all men; and how beloued he was of God, and how ſurpaſſing in all kinds of vertue. When Hiram King of Tyre vnderſtood that Salomon ſucceeded his father in the kingdome, he was glad thereof (for he was Dauids friend) for which cauſe he ſent meſſengers vnto him to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him: by whom Salomon returned an anſwer in theſe tearmes: Salomon to Hiram the King: Know thou, that my father hauing a will to build a Temple vnto God, hath beene withdrawne from the performance thereof, by the continuall warres and troubles he hath had: for hee neuer tooke reſt before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries vnto him. For mine owne part, I thanke God for the peace which I poſſeſſe, and for that by the meanes thereof, I haue opportunitie (according to mine owne deſire) to build a Temple vnto God: for hee it is that foretold my father that his houſe ſhould be builded during my raigne. For which cauſe I pray you ſend ſome one of your skilfulleſt men with my ſeruants to the wood Libanus, to hew downe trees in that place: for the Sidonians are more skilfull in hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleauers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruſe the contents of the ſame, and wrote backe againe vnto him to this effect:

Hirams Embaſſadors to Salomon.

3. Reg. 5. Salomon requireth carpenters and workemen from Hiram.

The King Hiram vnto King Salomon: Thou haſt cauſe to thanke God, in that he hath deliuered thy fathers kingdome into thy hands, to thee I ſay, who art a man wiſe and full of vertue. For which cauſe ſince no newes can come vnto me more gracious, nor office of loue more eſteemed then this, I will accompliſh all that thou requeſteſt: for after I haue cauſed a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut downe, I will ſend it thee by Sea by my ſeruants, whom I will command (and funiſh with conuenient veſſels of burthen) to the end they may deliuer the ſame, in what place of thy kingdome it ſhall beſt pleaſe thee, that afterwards thy ſubiects may tranſport them to Ieruſalem. You ſhall prouide to furniſh vs with corne, whereof wee ſtand in need, becauſe we inhabit an Iland.

Hiram promiſeth Salomon wood, and in ſtead thereof requireth corne.

The copies are yet at this day kept, not onely by thoſe of that nation, but alſo by the Tyrians: ſo that if any man deſire exactly to know what they be, let him ſearch the publike Records of the Tyrians, and he ſhall find in them matters accordant to that we haue ſaid. All which I ſay, to that end that the readers might be aſſured, that I outſtrip not the truth in any ſort, & that I inſert not in this hiſtory matters that are meerely apparant and deceitfull, and onely faſhioned for delight; light;neither feare I that any man ſhall examine my writings; neither deſire I likewiſe that euery man giue credit at the firſt ſight to the ſame,or that I be held blameleſſe in ſuffering my ſelfe any waies to vary or improperly dilate ought in this hiſtory: but contrariwiſe,if I cannot approoue the truth by demonſtration, and ſufficient teſtimonies, I deſire not to be allowed. As ſoone as Salomon had receiued theſe Letters from the King of the Tyrians, hee praiſed his facilitie and beneuolence,and preſently ſent him that which he demanded: euery yeere therefore he ſent him two thouſand Cores of wheat,and the like number of Bads of oyle(this Bad containeth ſeuenty and two ſextaries.) Hee gaue him alſo the like meaſure of wine. From that time forward the friendſhip betwixt Hiram and Salomon increaſed more and more, ſo that both of them proteſted that it ſhould continue for euer. The King impoſed on his people the tribute of thirtie thouſand workemen,whom he gaue in charge to trauell continually,and diſtributed them very diſcreetly. He ordained that ten thouſand of them ſhould cut wood in Libanus for the ſpace of one moneth; and that then they ſhould reſt two moneths, returning euery man vnto his owne dwelling place: vntill ſuch time as the twenty thouſand had in their turne accompliſhed the taske in the time that was prefixed vnto them, and then the firſt 10000. renued their worke, and followed the ſame in the fourth moneth. Adoram was cõſtituted ſuperintendent ouer this tribute. Beſides theſe, there were 70000. men appointed to carry ſtones and wood, who were the inhabitants of that countrey,which Dauid had left. There were foureſcore thouſand hewers of ſtone, ouer which were 3200. commiſſaries; theſe had the King commanded to cut the greateſt ſtones, to make the foundations of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountaine, he commanded ſhould be drawne and brought into the Citie, and not onely commanded hee his countrey-men to performe this,but thoſe workmen alſo that were ſent him by Hiram.

Salomon began this building in the fourth yeere of his raigne,in the ſecond moneth, which the Macedonians call Artemiſium, and the Hebrewes Iar; fiue hundreth ninety and two yeeres after the departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt; one thouſand and twenty yeeres, ſince the arriuall of Abraham in Meſopotamia; one thouſand foure hundred and forty yeeres, after the Deluge: And ſince Adam the firſt man vntill Salomon (who builded the Temple) all the yeeres that are paſſed, haue beene three thouſand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleuenth yeere of the raigne of Hiram, who gouerned in Tyre: and ſince the firſt time that Tyre began to be inhabited,vntill the ſaid building of the Temple,there paſſed two hundred & forty yeeres. The King therefore laid the foundations of the Temple,and made a moſt deepe trench, and fortified it with moſt ſtrong ſtones,which might be able to reſiſt all the iniuries of time. Theſe ſtones were ſo cloſely ioyned the one vnto the other, that for the ſtrength of the foundations, they might ſerue to make the baſe and ground, both to fortifie the worke, as alſo to ſuſtaine that which ſhould be builded thereupon, either for embelliſhment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of leſſe ſtrength and hugenes,which were to ſuſtaine a ſumptuous pile of that height,greatnes,magnificence and ornament. The wals were made of white ſtone,and continued of the ſame matter euen vntill the roofe. The height of the Temple was ſixtie cubites, and the length as much,and the breadth twentie. Ouer that was another edifice, hauing the like dimenſions; ſo that the whole height of the Temple was ſixeſcore cubites: and the entry thereof was to the Eaſt-ward. The porch that gaue entry thereinto, had twenty cubits in length(which was the bredth of the Temple)and in bredth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of ſixeſcore cubits. About the Temple were builded thirtie Cels,which inuironed the circuit of the ſame on the outſide,and ſerued to ſuſtaine all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and paſſable the one into the other. The entries were made after the ſame manner, from whence a man might eaſily paſſe from the one to the other. Euery one of theſe Cels had twenty and fiue cubits in bredth,and as many in length,and twenty in height:and aboue them there were other builded: and others likewiſe aboue theſe of like number, and dimenſion: ſo that they were almoſt as high as the other buildings. Ouer theſe there were no buildings;only this,they were couered with Cedar:Euery Cell had his couer apart,& had no dependance on the other roofs. The reſt of the building of the Temple was couered with long beames,mortized the one within the other, which ſuſtained the whole:ſo that the wals being in this maner faſtned the one vnto the other,were the more ſtronger. To theſe beames were there faſtned certaine roofes of the ſame ſtuffe, which were curiouſly poliſhed,carued and guilded. The walles on the inſide were couered with Cedar planks intermixed with gold: ſo that all the Temple ſhined, and the burniſht gold lightned,& dazled their eyes that entred into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was moſt artificially made of ſtones moſt exactly carued, and moſt cloſely and cunningly ioyned together: ſo that they that curiouſly pried into the ſame,could not any waies obſerue any ſtroke of the hammer,nor other workmans toole,but all the whole maſſe ſeemed to be a naturall,and no artificiall frame; and rather gathered in that place of it ſelfe,then garniſhed by the hands of cunning workemen. As touching the aſcent into the higheſt part of the Temple, the King in that ſort deuiſed it,that in the thickneſſe of the wall he included a paire of winding ſtaires to that purpoſe. This part had not a great gate towards the Eaſtward,as the lower had,but in the ſides there were little dores made: All the whole Temple both within and without was couered with Cedar planks,tied together with ſtrong chains to fortifie & ſtrengthen the ſame. The Temple inwardly was diuided into two parts,the one whereof contained the ſanctum ſanctorum, of twenty cubits(which was vnacceſſible)the reſt of the ſpace,of forty cubits was conſecrated to the vſe of the Prieſts. And in the midſt of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, inriched with ſtore of gold,and diuers curious carued works,and hung them with tapiſtry: wherein where imbrodered diuers flowers of hyacinth,purple,& ſcarlet intermingled with moſt pure,white & delicate linnen. He placed alſo vpon the holy of holieſt(which was 20. cubits broad,& as many long) 2. Cherubins of maſſie gold,each one 5. cubits hie,& each of them had 2. wings that were ſpred 5. cubits broad,by which meanes they were not farre diſtant the one from the other,but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wal of the ſacred place,& the other the Northern wall: the other wings that touched one another,ſerued for a couer for the Arke which was placed betweene them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was,it is impoſſible to expreſſe: he made the pauement of the Temple alſo, of plates of beaten gold. To the gate of the Temple alſo hee faſtned conuenient dores 20. cubits high,anſwerable in height to the wall,& couered with plates of gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garniſhed with gold: he likewiſe adorned the outſide of the gates as he had done the inſide. But the gate of the porch had no ſuch ornament. After this, Salomon ſent vnto Hiram King of Tyre for one,who was a cunning workman called Vram,the ſon of a woman of the line of Nepthali;and of Vrias the Iſraelite. This man had great knowledge in all kinde of works,but his eſpeciall excellency was in working gold, ſiluer and braſſe, who made all that which couered the Temple according as the King commanded. He made two pillars of braſſe,foure fingers thicke,& eighteene cubits high,and twelue in the circumference;on the chapters of each of them,he planted a founded lilly,of fiue cubits in height,which he inuironed with certain grates made of braſſe after the maner of enterlaced nets,which couered the lillies on each ſide,on which there hung downe two hundred Pomegranats in two ranks. Theſe pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch,the one on the right hand called Iachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded alſo the brazen Sea made after the maner of a Hemiſpheare,& this veſſel was called the ſea,by reaſon of the hugenes thereof. For it was a lauer that by meaſured line was ten cubits broad,the thicknes of a hand;the midſt thereof was ſuſtained with a pillar ten times twiſted,whoſe bignes was a cubit. This lauer was ſuſtained by twelue heifers,which by three & three were placed directly oppoſite againſt the quarters of the foure winds: and the hindermoſt part of theſe heifers were ſet ſomewhat ſtooping,to the end that this round and ample veſſell might be the more ſurely ſupported by them. This ſea contained three thouſand Bads. He made alſo ten brazen baſes foure ſquare, for the lauers,each one in length fiue cubits, in bredth foure, in height three; thus were the parts of this work ſeuerally faſhioned. There were foure little pillars ſquare,and erected at euery corner one, in which the ſides of the baſes were adioyned, & diuided into three ſorts,according to the place diſtinguiſhed betweene the ioynts;with Images,here a Lion,there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle. The pillars likewiſe were adorned with the ſame ingrauing: and all this whole work hung vpon foure wheeles, which were made of caſt worke, which had certaine naues or ſpoakes a cubit and a halfe in the Diameter:and it was a wonderfull thing to ſee the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought,& properly ſettled to the ſides of the baſes by their naues,or ſtrakes. They were thus made:the corners or angles on the vpper part were ſuſtained by certaine ſhoulders made after the manner of extended hands,on which was there placed a ſpire,to which the lauer was faſtned, being vpheld by the pawes of a Lion,and an Eagle, which were faſhioned & ſo properly vnited, that they that beheld them,would haue ſuppoſed them rather to be naturall creatures then otherwiſe: and betwixt them alſo there were certaine palme trees figured. Such was the compoſition of the ten lauers. Moreouer,he made ten other brazen lauers after the manner of a round cockle ſhell,each of which contained forty Choes: for they were in height foure cubits, and from brim to brim, there were likewiſe foure cubits: which lauers he placed vpon ten baſes or feet called Mechonoth, fiue of which ſtood on the left ſide of the Temple, that extended to the Northward,the other fiue on the right hand toward the Southward; yet ſo as they affronted the Eaſt. Here likewiſe placed he the Sea full of water, to the intent that the Prieſts

Prieſts entring into the Temple, might waſh their hands and feet before they went vp vnto the Altar. The other lauers ſerued to waſh the inwards and feet of thoſe beaſts that were ſacrificed. He builded likewiſe a brazen Altar of twenty cubits long, and as many in bredth, and tenne in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewiſe all the veſſels that belonged thereunto of braſſe: as kettels, water-pots, hookes and forks, and ſuch like, that in brightneſſe equalled the pure gold. The King alſo dedicated many tables, and amongſt theſe, one great one of gold (on which the ſacred bread was laid) the reſt not farre inferiour, yet made after diuers manners, held ewers and platters of gold, to the number of twenty thouſand, and of ſiluer forty thouſand. He made likewiſe ten thouſand candleſticks (according as Moſes had commanded) whereof one he dedicated in the Temple, that according to the law it might giue light there in the day time. He made a table alſo, on which the loaues of bread were laid, on the North ſide of the Temple, hard by the candleſticke, which was placed towards the Southward. The Altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were incloſed in that part of the Temple that contained forty cubits, before the tapiſtry of the holy of holieſt, where the Arke ſhould be placed. The King alſo cauſed foureſcore thouſand pots, and a thouſand hundreth of ewers of gold, and twice as many of ſiluer, to be made; and foureſcore thouſand plates of gold, and twice ſo many of ſiluer, to offer the kneaded flower in them vpon the Altar; & threeſcore thouſand cups of gold, and twice ſo many of ſiluer, to lay the flower mingled with oyle thereon; and two thouſand meaſures of gold, and twenty thouſand of ſiluer, reſembling a Hin or an Epha of Moſes. Twenty thouſand of Cenſors alſo of gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the Temple; and other cenſors likewiſe in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the leſſer which was within the Temple, to the number of fiftie thouſand. He prepared alſo a thouſand veſtments for the vſe of the Prieſts, with their ſurcots, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithſtanding there was but one Crowne wherein Moſes had written the name of God, which hath continued euen vntill this day. He made alſo ten thouſand ſtoales for the Prieſts of fine linnen, with ſcarlet girdles, for euery one of them; two huudreth thouſand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moſes, and forty thouſand inſtruments of Muſicke to record and praiſe God with (as the Pſaltery and Harpe of a mixt matter, the fift part gold, and the fourth part ſiluer.) All which Salomon moſt magnificently prepared for the ſeruice of God, ſparing no coſt, but imploying himſelfe to the vttermoſt of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple: which he beautified and endowed with all theſe treaſures. Hee enuironed the Temple likewiſe with a certaine wall ſome three cubits hie, which in our tongue we call Giſon, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Prieſts only. Without this wall there ſtood a Temple foure-ſquare with great and broad Iles, which opened with very great gates, euery one according to the quarter of the winde; and the doores thereof were couered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewiſe that kept the ordinances of Moſes. It may not be ſpoken or ſcarcely beleeued, although it were ſeene, how admirable that exteriour Temple was: for he filled huge trenches, which by reaſon of their immeaſurable depth, could not be lookt downe into without vehement apprehenſion of feare (for they were foure hundreth cubits deepe) yet notwithſtanding he filled them, and raiſed them to the height of the hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this meanes it came to paſſe, that the walk without the Temple, was equalled with the foundation of the ſame. This did he begirt with double porches, ſuſtained by pillars of rich ſtone; the roofe whereof were of poliſhed Cedar, and the gates were of Maſſiue ſiluer.

After that King Salomon had in ſeuen yeeres finiſhed theſe ſo huge, faire, and magnificent buildings, and all the other neceſſaries which he had beſtowed vpon the Temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and confirmed his readines to be ſuch, that that which at the firſt ſight might require a mans whole life to finiſh, hee accompliſhed in few yeeres, in reſpect of the greatneſſe of the Temple: He wrote vnto the Gouernours and Elders of the Hebrewes, commanding them to aſſemble all the people in Ieruſalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Arke of God: and although this aſſembly was publikely proclaimed, yet ſcarcely did the people make their appearance in Ieruſalem before the ſeuenth moneth, which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feaſt of Tabernacles, which the Hebrewes moſt religiouſly obſerue and honour with great feſtiuals. They therefore tooke the Arke and Tabernacle that Moſes had beforetimes made, with all thoſe neceſſaries which appertained to the diuine ſeruice, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people with the Leuites marched before, hauing their cattell ready to ſacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of diuers ſlaughtered beaſts, burning an infinit quantity of perfumes, wherewith the ayre was filled round about;

about, the ſent whereof diſperſed it ſelfe farre and neere, to make it knowne that God would be present in that new builded and conſecrated place (if we may ſo ſpeake of diuine things after a humane manner.) Thus ceaſed they not to ſing and dance vntill they came vnto the Temple: and after this ſort conducted they the Arke. But when as it was to be carried into the holy of holieſt, the reſt of the multitude departed, & the Prieſts onely placed it vnder the two Cherubims, who imbraced it with their wings, as if it had bin couered with a pauillion or ſome canapie: for they had bin expreſſely faſhioned after that manner by the workeman. The Arke contained nought els but the two tables of ſtone, in which were kept in writing the ten commandements pronounced by God on the mount Sinai. For as touching the candleſtick, and the table, and altar of gold, he placed them in the Temple before the moſt holy of holieſt, in places correſpondent to thoſe where they ſtood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinary ſacrifices, and placed the brazen altar before the Temple neere vnto the gate: ſo that when it was opened, the other ſtood in ſight, and a man might ſee the ſeruice and magnificence that was vſed in the ſacrifices. And as touching the other vtenſils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the Temple. But after the Prieſts (hauing giuen order for all things about the Arke) were departed from thence, ſuddenly there fell amidſt the Sanctuary a thicke cloud, not pitchy, nor ſuch as reſembleth winter clouds loaden with raine; but defuſed and temperate, which darkned the ſight of the Prieſts, ſo that they ſaw not one another. But thereby euery mans mind was eaſily induced, and his opinion confirmed, that God was deſcended into the Temple, and willingly dwelled in the ſame: In effect all men had no other opinion: But King Salomon ariſing from his throne wherein hee was ſeated, addreſſed his prayers vnto God, in ſuch words as he thought both to be agreeable to the diuine nature, and conuenient for him to vſe: O Lord (ſaid he) thou haſt an eternall houſe, neither are we ignorant that thou haſt builded this whole maſſe of the Vniuerſe for thy ſelfe, which conſiſteth of heauen, earth, ayre and ſeas: which thou altogether filleſt, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore haue we adorned and erected this Temple to thy name, to the end that we might offer vp our ſacrifices and prayers in the ſame, and ſend them vp to heauen (as a ſweet ſacrifice) to obtaine thy fauour, aſſuring our ſelues that thou art here preſent alſo, and wilt neuer be abſent from this place. For whereas thou ſeeſt all things, heareſt all things, yet forſakeſt thou not vs at all: neither doſt thou abandon the place where thou doſt worthily inhabit: but rather thou art alwaies neere vnto all men, but in eſpeciall preſent with thoſe that thinke on thee day and night. Theſe words ſpake he, looking vpwards towards God, and afterwards addreſſing himſelfe vnto the people, he ſpake vnto them as touching his power and prouidence, how he had foretold his father Dauid of all that which ſhould happen: the greater part whereof was already accompliſhed, and the reſt was ſhortly to ſucceed. Furthermore, hee declared how God himſelfe had giuen him his name before he was borne, and that it was known how he ſhould be called: and how at ſuch time as he ſhould be King after the deceaſe of his father, he ſhould build him a Temple; which things they ſaw brought to paſſe according as they were foretold: for which they ought to giue God thankes, and not to loſe any hope of any of thoſe things that had beene promiſed them in regard of their happineſſe, hauing occaſion of beliefe by the ſight of thoſe things which they then beheld.

God is true in his promiſes.

Salomons prayer, wherein he thankes God for his benefits, and beſeecheth his future protection.

When the King had ſpoken after this manner, vnto the people, hee turned againe and beheld the Temple, and lifting vp his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impoſſible (ſaid he) for men to yeeld effectuall thankes vnto God for thoſe benefits they haue receiued of him: for God (who is more abundant then all men) hath no need of them: But (O Lord) it behoooueth vs, that ſince of thy grace thou haſt made vs more excellent then other liuing creatures, we ſhould bleſſe and giue thanks vnto thy Maieſtie, and in eſpeciall it concerneth vs to honour thee for the benefits thou haſt beſtowed on our family, & all the Hebrew nation. But with what other means then ought we to appeaſe thee when thou art diſpleaſed, and when we are to entertaine thy mercy, then by that voice which we draw from the ayre, and which as we know mounteth backe againe into the ayre? I ought therfore firſt of all to giue thee thanks in reſpect of my father, whom from obſcuritie thou haſt raiſed to high maieſtie: next, for that thou haſt fulfilled all thoſe things which thou haſt foreprophecied of me, vntil this preſent day; I beſeech thee for the time to come to furniſh me with thoſe things, that thou maieſt giue vnto men that are deare vnto thee, which is, that thou increaſe our houſe euery way, according as thou haſt promiſed my father Dauid to performe during his life, and at ſuch time as he was neere vnto his death: namely, that the kingdome ſhould continue in our family, and that his race ſhould multiply in innumerable ſucceſſions. Beſtow thou this benefit vpon vs, and bequeath vnto all mine, that vertue wherein thou takeſt delight. Moreouer, I beſeech thee that a portion of thy ſpirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may vnderſtand that thou dwelleſt vpon earth: for not onely this Temple, but the whole heauen, and the depth of things that are vnder the ſame, are too little for thy habitation. I beſeech thee therfore that it may pleaſe thee to continue it for thine owne, to the end it may neuer be deſtroyed by the enemy, but that thou wilt alwaies haue care of it, as of thine owne peculiar inheritance. And if it ſhall ſo fall out that thy people runne aſtray, and that afterwards being puniſhed by thee, by ſome puniſhment of death, peſtilence or any ſuch chaſtiſement (by which thou reclaimeſt thoſe that offend thee, to the obſeruation of thy lawes) they haue recourſe vnto this Temple, aſſembling, beſeeching, and requiring thee of mercy; heare them I beſeech thee, as being preſent in this place, and haue compaſſion on them, and deliuer them from their aduerſities.

Salomon humbly beſeecheth God, that hee will protect this Temple as his owne houſe.

Neither doe I onely intreat thee for the Hebrewes when they ſhall haue offended thee: but if it happen that any one arriue heere from any part of the world, of what country ſoeuer he be, to demand and require the fruition of this mercy, heare thou him, I pray thee, and grant his requeſt: For by this meanes all men ſhall know, that it is thy will that thy houſe ſhould be builded in this place, and that we are not inhumane by nature, but that we haue deſired that thy help and the communication of thy bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed, not only on thoſe of our nation, but alſo on all the world. This ſaid, he caſt himſelfe flat vpon his face, and continued in praier a long time, and afterwards riſing againe, he offered ſacrifices vpon the Altar; and hauing filled the Temple with intire offrings, he knew moſt euidently that God did gratefully account & accept of his oblations: for a fire trilling thorow the aire, and lighting vpon the Altar in the ſight of all men, conſumed and deuoured the ſacrifice. When this viſion had hapned, the people manifeſtly coniectured that Gods aboad ſhould be in that Temple, & with great ioy humbled themſelues on their faces, and lay proſtrate on the pauement. But the King began to praiſe God, and incited the people to do the like, conſidering they had already receiued the teſtimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwaies merciful vnto them, & that he would keep them for euer in cleanneſſe and vncorrupt minds, and that they might iuſtly and religiouſly lead their liues, in obſeruing thoſe commandements which he had giuen them by Moſes. For in ſo doing, the people of the Hebrewes ſhould proſper and grow more happy, then all the nations of the world. Moreouer, he exhorted them to keepe in their remembrance thoſe means, by which the benefits they poſſeſſed had beene gotten; aſſuring them that by the ſame they ſhould retaine continuance, increaſe, and multiplication thereof. For they ought to thinke that they receiued them not, but for their piety and iuſtice; and that it was all one for men to get that which they wanted, as to keep that which was gotten, without defaulting in any thing. When the King had ſpoken after this maner vnto the people, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly (hauing firſt of all accompliſhed the ſacrifices both for himſelfe and the people, by offering vp twelue thouſand Oxen, and ſixeſcore thouſand ſheep.) For then firſt of all was the Temple embrued with the blood of the ſlaughterd ſacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their wiues & children, were banquetted therin. The King alſo feaſting with the whole people, celebrated the ſolemnity of the Tabernacles for the ſpace of 14. daies in great pompe and magnificence. And when as all things were ſufficiently performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned the ſeruice of God, euery one (diſmiſſed by the King) departed to his owne dwelling place, giuing him hearty thanks for the care he had of them, and for the works he had done for them, praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant their King Salomon a long life. And thus they returned home with ioy, praiſing and ſinging hymnes vnto God, ſo that they rid their way, and returned to their families with great rreaſure, and without any trauell.

After then that they had conducted the Arke into the Temple, & had beheld the greatnes and beauty of the ſame, and had celebrated moſt excellent ſacrifices, and made great ſolemnities, they returned euery one vnto his City. But a viſion that night appeared vnto the King during his ſleep, wch gaue him aſſurance that God had heard his praier, & that he would keep his Temple & dwel in the ſame for euer (if ſo be his poſterity & all the people addicted themſelues to liue vertuouſly:) promiſing himſelf in eſpecial, that if he continued in the obſeruation of thoſe aduertiſements which his father had preſcribed him, he would raiſe him to the ful infinity of felicity, and thoſe of his poſterity ſhould obtain the royalty ouer all the country, & ouer the tribe of Iuda: but if he forgot the exerciſes of piety, & exchanged them for the ſeruice of ſtrange gods, he would pluck him vp by the roots, without leauing any remainder here to raign after him. Hedio & Ruffinus. chap. 5. Salomons Palace finiſhed in thirteene yeeres.

Seuen yeeres after the Temple had beene thus builded (as it hath beene heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he ſcarcely finiſhed in thirteene yeers ſpace (for he was not ſo intent and earneſt in building thereof, as he was in the ſtructure of the Temple.) For although the Temple were very great, and of incredible and maruellous magnificence, yet ſo it is, that God (for whom it was made) aſſiſting the workemen, it was thorowly finiſhed within the terme of the yeers aforeſaid. But the royall Palaces, being farre leſſer then was the Temple, were builded more ſlowly, becauſe the ſtuffe had not beene prepared ſo long time before, neither with ſo great affection; and the rather, becauſe the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Notwithſtanding, this houſe was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the countrey and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it ſhall not be amiſſe if I declare all the order and diſpoſition of the ſame houſe, that by the deſcription thereof the Reader may both gather and conſider the whole amplitude thereof: It was a great and goodly lodging, ſuſtained by diuers pillars, prepared to receiue and containe much people at the time of their aſſemblies, wherein they intreated of affaires and held pleas. It was a hundred cubits in length, and in breadth fiftie, and in height thirtie, comprized vnder ſixteene ſquare pillars couered with Corinthian worke, with ſtaires of the like meaſure, and carued gates, both pleaſant for ſight, and fit for fortification. I

The Hall. The Tribunal.

In the midſt of this ſpace, and hard by the Temple, there was another ſquare Pauillion thirty cubits large, ſuſtained with ſtrong pillars, within w^ch there was another magnificent Tribunal, on which the King ſate to giue iudgement: vnto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queene. All the chambers, as well thoſe that were ordinarily in vſe, as thoſe for recreation after he had retired himſelfe from publike affaires, were adorned with planks of carued Cedar, and were builded partly of ſtone ten cubits ſquare, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought (ſuch as are wont to adorne Temples and Palaces) and are found out by the moſt curious and cunning Maſons. And that which made it more beautifull, were three panes of Tapiſtry, and the fourth admirable for the artificiall engrauings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of diuers ſorts, ſhadowed with their branches and leaues, hanging in ſuch ſort, that to behold them, a man would haue thought that they ſhooke, the workmanſhip was ſo exquiſite and curious that couered the ſtone. The reſt, as farre as the roofe, was enchaſed, and flouriſhed with diuers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleaſure, with very long porches to beautifie the Palace; amongſt which, there was one moſt magnificent to make banquets and feaſts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the neceſſaries belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of thoſe that banquetted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugeneſſe and variety of theſe royall lodgings, both greater and leſſer; of thoſe that were hidden vnder the earth, as of thoſe, which being lifted vp in the aire, did moſt apparantly manifeſt their beauty: The pleaſant arbors likewiſe delightfull to behold, and moſt contenting in ſummer, for that they were couered and warranted from the heate. To ſpeake in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of gold, and of ſiluer: the floores and walles were figured with diuerſity of flowers and of precious ſtones, inchaſed in gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which ſhined with ſuch like ornaments. There was likewiſe erected a moſt mighty Throne, made in forme of a Tribunall, with ſixe ſteps of pure Iuory: on each ſide of which there ſtood two ramping Lyons, and the like number were placed aboue. The ſtage of the Throne was after the forme of hands, that laid hold on the King: and he ſate vpon a halfe Oxe looking backwards: and this Throne was all inuironed with gold.

Salomon builded all this that hath beene ſpoken of, in the ſpace of twenty yeers, being furniſhed by Hiram King of the Tyrians for theſe his buildings, with great ſummes of gold, and farre more greater of ſiluer, beſides a quantity of Cedar and Pine-trees. Salomon alſo remunerated him, him,and gaue him great preſents,and ſent him euery yeere ſufficient of corne, wine and oyle(as we haue heretofore declared)whereof he ſtood in great neede, by reaſon that his Countrey was an Iland. And beſides that, he gaue him twenty Cities in Galilee, not farre diſtant from Tyre. Hiram hauing viſited them, and not well pleaſed with them, ſent vnto Salomon to certifie him thereof,that he had no vſe for his Cities:and from that time forward they were called the countrey of Chebal,which is as much to ſay in the Phœnician tongue,as vnpleaſant. Hiram likewiſe ſent vnto Salomon certaine myſteries and difficult queſtions requiring him to decide the ſame, and to diſſolue thoſe doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Salomon being a man of ripe iudgement and vnderſtanding, pretermitted none of them; but after he had attained their reſolution in his owne opinion, and had gathered the ſenſe, he expreſſed and opened the ſame. Of theſe two Kings, Menander (who tranſlated the Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phœnician tongue into the Greeke)maketh mention, ſpeaking after this manner: After the deceaſe of Abibale, Hiram his ſonne ſucceeded him in the Kingdome,who liued fiftie and three yeeres, and raigned thirty and foure. He annexed the field which is called Ample, vnto the Iland,and dedicated a golden pillar in Iupiters Temple. He alſo cauſed a great quantity of wood to be hewed downe in the mountaine Libanus, to make couers and rooſes for Temples. For hauing pulled downe ſome ancient Temples, he builded that of Hercules,and that of Aſtrate,and made this firſt building of Hercules in the moneth Peritien, and made warre againſt the Eucecans, who refuſed to pay their tributes: and after he had once againe brought them vnder his ſubiection, he returned to his owne Palace. In his time liued the young ſonne of Abdimon, who alwaies reſolued thoſe queſtions which Salomon King of Ieruſalem propoſed. Diue alſo maketh mention of him in theſe tearmes: After the deceaſe of Abibale, his ſonne Hiram raigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the City to the Eaſtward, and enlarged the ſame, and conioyned the Temple of Olympian Iupiter to the City, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place betweene them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of Gold: and afterwards going vp to Libanus,he hewed downe timber to build Temples withall. He ſaid alſo,that Salomon raigning at that time in Ieruſalem, ſent vnto Hiram certaine ſubtill queſtions,demanding the expoſition thereof vnder this condition,that if he declared them not,in way of penalty he ſhould pay a great ſumme of money; and afterwards that a certaine Tyrian called Abdimon, expounded that which had beene propoſed: and in lieu thereof propoſed certaine others, which Salomon could not expound, and for that occaſion he paid a great ſumme of money vnto Hiram. This is it that Dius writeth.

The King ſeeing that the City wanted both bulwarks and towers to ſecure the ſame,and that the ſtrength of the ſame was no way anſwerable to the dignity therof,he repaired the wals, and erected great towers on the ſame. Moreouer he builded certaine Cities,which deſerue to be memorized among the moſt renowned, namely,Aſor and Magedon,and for the third, the City of Gaza in the country of the Philiſtins:againſt which Pharao King of Egypt led out his army,and tooke it by force,and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof to the ſword,he deſtroyed the ſame, and afterwards he gaue it in dower vnto his daughter, which married with Salomon. For which cauſe the King fortified it,ſeeing it to be already ſufficiently defenced by nature,& that it ſtood very commodiouſly for the war,and to hinder the inuaſions of the enemy that might happen. Not far from thence he fortified two other Cities,wherof one was called Betachor,and the other Baleth. Beſides theſe he builded others, which were Cities of recreation and pleaſure,by reaſon of the good temperature of the aire,and the pleaſantnes of the fruits,and in eſpecially the ſweete ſtreamy riuers,wherwith they were watered. Afterwards entring into the deſart that is aboue Syria,and conquering the ſame,he builded another great City two dayes iourney diſtant from the higher Syria, a dayes iourney from Euphrates, and ſixe from the great Babylon. The cauſe why this City was inhabited farre from the ciuill and peopled quarters of Syria, was, becauſe in no place of the lower countrey there was water to be found,and in this City only there were fountaines and ſprings. He therefore builded this City, and begirt it with ſtrong walles, and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians tearme it by,euen at this day:and amongſt the Greekes it is called Palmyra.)And theſe were Salomons works in that time. But for that there are diuers that demand the queſtion how it commeth to paſſe, that all the Kings of Ægypt that haue beene ſince Minæus the founder of Memphis, and who raigned diuers yeeres before our great anceſtor Abraham, who (I ſay) haue beene till Salomons time, for the ſpace of more then thirteene hundred yeeres, haue beene called Pharaohs, deriuing that name from one that raigned in the mid-time betweene both: I haue thought it requiſite to manifeſt the ſame to the the intent to resolue that doubt, and expresse the cause of that name. The name of Pharao amongst the Ægyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I thinke that from their childhood they had other distinct names; and that afterwards when they are created Kings, they take vpon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no lesse, then Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria hauing beene before-time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the Kingdome, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first King.) The Romane Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they haue other names at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæsars; because the soueraignty and honour wherunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was giuen them by their fathers, is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I thinke) that although Herodotus of Halicarnesseus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there haue beene three hundred and thirty Kings of Ægypt; yet declareth he not their names, because they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a woman had obtained the Kingdome, he called her by her owne proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who haue beene Kings, were vsually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated vnto this woman: for which cause it was necessary to declare her owne first name. For mine owne part, I haue found in the bookes of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father in law to Salomon, no one of the Kings of Ægypt haue beene called by that name: and that some little while after, the aforenamed woman came vnto Salomon, who raigned in Ægypt and Æthiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I haue made mention of it, to make it knowne that our records, and the Chronicles of the Ægyptians, accord in many things.

But King Salomon conquered the Chanaanites (which till that time were not vnder his subiection) and those that inhabited the mountaine Libanus, as farre as the City of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them euery yeere such, as he might employ in seruile actions, and in domesticall businesse, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slaue: neither was it conuenient, that since God had subiected diuers nations vnder them (whom they might make slaues of) that they should tie those of their owne nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in armes, and rather tooke delight to mount Charriots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaues. Ouer the Chanaanites (whom he employed in his seruice) he appointed fiue hundreth and fiftie Commissaries, who had their charge and authority from the King, and tasked them to those workes and handy labours wherein they imployed them. He builded a Nauy also in the gulfe of Ægypt, in a certaine place of the red sea called Asiongaber, which is named Berenice, not farre from the City of Elana (which countrey in times past appertained to the Iewes.) And toward the building of this Nauy, he obtained of Hiram King of Tyre, a very conuenient furtherance: for he sent him modules of ships, and men that were skilfull in Nauigation, whom he charged to saile with his procurers and factors, to the country at that time called Ophir, and at this present the Land of Gold, in the country of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned backe againe vnto the King, after they had gathered about foure hundreth talents.

About this time the Queene of Ægypt and Æthiopia (a woman adorned with wisedome, and admirable in all other things) hauing heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Salomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person vnto the King, vnder purpose to confirme her beliefe by experience, and not by heare-say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is beleeued by one or other, and is but only grounded on relation. She therfore resolued to come and see him, & especially to make triall of his wisedome: which she narrowly sifted, by proposing certaine difficult questions vnto him, wch she had conceiued in her mind. She therefore repaired vnto Ierusalem with great pompe, glory, and riches; for she brought with her certaine Camels charged with gold, odors, and precious stones of great value. After that the King had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, hee easily comprehended in his minde those doubts which she had proposed vnto him, and gaue her a more speedy solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was rauished with the incredible wisedome of Salomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in especiall she wondered at his Palace, considering the greatnesse and beauty thereof; and aboue all, the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same; wherein shee perceiued the great wisedome of the King: but aboue all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinary table, and the apparell and seruice of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his seruants likewise, and the the goodly order which they obſerued in their ſeruice; Moreouer the ſacrifices that were euery day offered vp vnto God, and the care and diligence of the Prieſts in diſcharging their offices; raiſhed her more then all the reſt, when ſhe obſerued them daily: and not able to containe her ſelfe within the tearms of aſtoniſhment at that ſhe ſaw, ſhe manifeſtly expreſſed how wonderfully ſhe was affected, expreſſing to the King in her plaine and publike diſcourſe, that ſhe knew not what to thinke of thoſe things which ſhe had beheld. O King (ſaid ſhe) all that which a man knoweth by heare-ſay may be miſ-beleeued. But the renowne which is come vnto our eares as touching your riches, both thoſe which you haue in your ſelfe (I meane your wiſedome and prudence) as thoſe alſo which your Kingdome hath brought you, is neither falſe nor fained; which notwithſtanding, yet doth it make your felicity farre leſſe then that which I ſee before mine eyes: for report dependeth only on heare-ſay, neither giueth it ſo certain a notice of things, as the ſight diſcouereth and repreſenteth, when one is neere vnto the ſame. For mine own part, in that I gaue no credit to the greatneſſe and multitude of that I haue heard, I haue ſeene farre more then I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrewes to be moſt happy; and your ſeruants and friends moſt bleſſed, who are continuall witneſſes and hearers of your wiſedome. And each one of you ought to giue God thanks, that hee hath ſo much loued this region and the inhabitants thereof, that he hath eſtabliſhed you in the royal ſeat. I will diſcouer likewiſe, how beſides her words ſhe expreſſed her affection ſhe bare vnto the King, in teſtifying the ſame by diuers preſents wch ſhee offered vnto him. For ſhe gaue him twenty talents of gold, and an innumerable quantity of ſweet odours and precious ſtones. It is ſaid likewiſe, that we haue that plant which diſtilleth balme, and which our country bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princeſſe. Salomon for his part requited her bountiful preſents with the like, wch ſhe made choiſe of according to her own liking: for there was nothing which ſhe could require, which he granted not vnto her: ſhewing himſelfe moſt ready to giue her ſatisfaction with a liberall and royall heart. When the Queene of Ægypt and Æthiopia had receiued theſe fauors at the Kings hands (according as it hath bin ſpoken) and he likewiſe had magnificently requited her, ſhe returned backe againe into her owne countrey.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7.

About the ſame time there was brought vnto the King from the country called the Region of gold, a quantity of precious ſtones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was imployed to make ſupporters in the Temple, and in the Kings houſe, and to make inſtruments of muſicke likewiſe, as Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Leuites might praiſe God. Amongſt all the gifts that were euer preſented vnto Salomon, that which was giuen him at that time, was moſt excellent in greatneſſe and beautie. But let no man thinke, that the Pine-wood (which we ſpeake of) had any reſemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants to delude their chapmen, ſell for the ſame. For they are like vnto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to manifeſt in this place, leſt any man ſhould be deceiued thorow ignorance, in diſcerning the one from the other: becauſe the affaires of Salomon haue drawne vs to make mention of this matter. The weight of gold which this nauy brought vnto the King, was ſixe hundreth, ſixty and ſixe talents: beſide that which the merchants bought themſelues, or that which the kings and princes of Arabia had ſent vnto him in way of preſent. This gold cauſed he to be molten downe, and made thereof two hundreth targets, each one waighing ſixe hundreth ſicles; and three hundreth bucklers, each of them waighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. He cauſed alſo diuers veſſels of gold & precious ſtones to be made for the vſe of his table, laboured with as curious conceit as might be; the reſt of his neceſſaries alſo were of gold: for nothing was either bought or ſold for ſiluer. For the King had many ſhips vpon the ſea called Tharſis, wch vpon his command carried diuers merchandiſe into the remote countries, by vent wherof they brought him home much gold and ſiluer, and much Iuory and Æthiopian Moores, and Apes, and this Nauigation in ſayling to and fro, was finiſhed in three yeeres. The renowne and fame alſo of Salomons vertues and wiſedome ſpred far and neere throughout all Nations: ſo that the Kings of what country ſoeuer they were, had a deſire to ſee his preſence, becauſe they beleeued not the report, & deſired to manifeſt their affection to him by magnificent preſents. They therefore ſent him veſſels of gold and of ſiluer, ſcarlet robes, and all ſorts of aromatique drugges, horſes and charriots, mules and ſumpter-horſes, wherein (as it was reported vnto them) the King tooke pleaſure, by reaſon of their force and beauty: ſo that to the number of horſes and charriots which he had before, there were annexed foure hundreth more, which had bin ſent him in way of preſent. For before that, he had a thouſand charriots, and twenty thouſand goodly horſe, excellent for ſhape and ſwiftneſſe: ſo that the like were not to be found, that were comparable with them for beauty and pace. And that which gaue them the greater grace was, that they had Squires to backe them, who were in their pride of youth, of goodly perſonage to behold, and ſurpaſſing all other in height, hauing long locks which they daily intermixed with wires of gold, that when as the ſunne did reuerberate his beames vpon their heads, they ſhould be more glorious and bright. The King mounted on his Charriot, and apparelled in a white raiment, was accuſtomed to ride abroad about the ſunne-riſe, inuironed with theſe young armed men, hauing bowes and quiuers.

Ittan.

There was a certaine place called Ittan, ſome eight leagues diſtant off of Ieruſalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleaſant fountains of water, whither he vſually and willingly retired himſelfe for his pleaſure, vſing in all things a moſt admirable prouidence and promptitude, and taking pleaſure in thoſe things that were well contriued. He forgot not likewiſe to make cauſeys, but cauſed the hie wayes that led to Ieruſalem (where he made his abode) to be paued with blacke ſtone, both to the intent to make them more acceſſible for thoſe that trauailed to and fro, as to ſhew the magnificence and riches of his gouernment. He then diuided his Charriots, and placed them in ſuch ſort, that in euery City there was a prefixed number, and ſome few he kept about himſelfe, and thoſe Cities he called the Cities of Charriots: he ſtored Ieruſalem alſo with aboundance of ſiluer, ſo that it was as plentifull as ſtones; and with Cedar wood (whereof before that time there was no quantity) he ſtored the countrey, that it was as plentifull to be had as wilde fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Ægypt alſo, to buy him certaine charriots drawne by two horſes, for the price of ſixe hundreth dragmes of ſiluer, which he ſent vnto the Kings of Syria, and to thoſe on the other ſide of Euphrates.

Now although he were the moſt magnificent and entirely beloued of God, ſurpaſſing both in prudence and riches all thoſe that before him had the gouernment of the Hebrewes; yet continued he not in this eſtate vntill the end. For, forſaking the obſeruation of the ordinances of his Fathers, his latter yeers were not correſpondent to his former conuerſation, which heretofore we haue declared: for he grew altogether diſſolute and immoderately giuen ouer to women, and was not content onely with thoſe of his owne country, but tooke alſo ſtrange women for his wiues, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby he tranſgreſſed the lawes of marriage inſtituted by Moſes, who inhibited to marry with thoſe of forraine nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods alſo, to gratifie and expreſſe the loue which he bare vnto them: which thing the Law-maker foreſeeing, he had forbidden the Iſraelites to marry with thoſe that were not of their owne nation, for feare leſt conforming themſelues vnto forraine faſhions, they ſhould fall and tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their forefathers: and vndertake to honour thoſe gods, and forſake and forget the honour due vnto the true God. But Salomon tranſported with theſe brutiſh pleaſures, made no account of theſe things, but tooke him wiues of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundreth concubines, beſides the daughter of Pharao King of Ægypt: by which means he was exceſſiuely ouercome by them, inſomuch as he followed their examples, and was forced to giue a teſtimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordring his life according to the faſhion of their countries. As therefore he increaſed in yeeres, and his iudgement grew weake, he was in ſuch ſort miſ-led, that he could not retaine in memory the cuſtomes of his countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worſhip of thoſe gods which were introduced by his wiues. Before all this he chanced to ſinne and default in the obſeruation of the law, at ſuch time as he made the ſimilitudes of beaſts of braſſe to vnderprop the veſſell called the great ſea, and thoſe of Lyons, which he cauſed to be ſet vnto his Throne: For that action of his ill beſeemed him, who had a moſt excellent and domeſticall example of vertue in the perſon of his father, beſides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithfull ſeruant of God; whence it came to paſſe, that by neglecting to follow his ſteppes (notwithſtanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing vnto him at two ſeuerall times) he died moſt ignominiouſly. There came therfore vnto him a Prophet ſent from God, telling him that his ſinnes were manifeſt and notorious in Gods ſight, threatning him that ere long he ſhould repent the wickedneſſe he had committed. Yet notwithſtanding the Realme ſhould not be taken from him during his life, becauſe God had promiſed Dauid that he ſhould be his ſucceſſour in the ſame: but after his deceaſe his ſonne ſhould beare the penalty of the ſame; not ſo as all the people ſhould reuolt, but that he would giue ten tribes vnto his ſeruant, and leaue two vnto the grand-childe of Dauid, becauſe hee had loued God, and by reaſon of the City of Ieruſalem, where it pleaſed him to make his habitation.

The punishment inflicted on Salomon, for honouring ſtrange gods.

When Salomon heard theſe things, he ſorrowed, and was ſore troubled in that all his felicitie (for

(for which he to-fore-time was admired) began to decline. Neither paſſed there long time after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that (God ſo pleaſing) there roſe vp an enemy againſt him, who was called Ader, by nation an Idumæan, and of the princely ſtocke, who vpon this occaſion grounded his rebellion and inſurrection. For, at ſuch time as Ioab Generall of Dauids army, had conquered Idumæa, and in the ſpace of ſixe moneths defeated all the youth, and thoſe that were capable to beare armes, he fled vnto Pharao King of Egypt: who entertained him very courteouſly, and gaue him an houſe, and lands for his maintenance, and loued him dearely when he came to mans eſtate: ſo that he married him with Taphines his wiues ſiſter, on whom he begat a ſon, who was brought vp with the Kings children: who hauing intelligence in Egypt of Dauid and Ioabs death, addreſſed himſelfe vnto Pharao, and beſought him to giue him leaue to repaire into his owne countrey.

The yeere of the world, 2964. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1000.

Ader, enemy to Salomon.

Ader fled into Egypt.

Ader beſeecheth Pharao to diſmiſſe him, that hee might return into his countrey.

The King asked him what he wanted; or what the cauſe was that mooued him to be ſo haſty to forſake him? Notwithſtanding therfore that he importuned and requeſted him diuers times, yet preuailed he nothing with him for that time. But when Salomons fortunes began to decline (by reaſon of his iniquities aboue mentioned, and the wrath of God prouoked againſt him) Ader by Gods permiſſion came into Idumæa, after he was licenced by Pharao to depart. But being vnable to mooue the people to reuolt from Salomon, by reaſon of the ſtrong garriſons he held, and knowing that without hazzard of his owne perſon, he could mooue no alterations or innouation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himſelfe with a certaine man called Raas (who was fled from his Maſter Adarezer, King of Sophone, and liued like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendſhip with him, and a great ſort of outlawes, and theeues that were his followers, and went into Syria, and taking ſeazure of that countrey, proclaimed himſelfe King thereof. From whence making excurſions into the lands of the Iſraelites, he ſpoiled and pillaged the ſame, during Salomons life time. Thus were the Hebrewes enforced to ſuſtaine theſe outrages at Aders hands.

Raas and Ader enemies to Salomon.

Moreouer, a certaine man called Ieroboam the ſon of Nebat, by nation a Iew, rebelled againſt Salomon, and raiſed his hopes aboue his eſtate, perſwaded therunto by a prophecy that concerned him, and incited him vnto the action. For being left very young by his father, and carefully inſtructed by his mother, as ſoone as Salomon perceiued him to be of a noble and couragious ſpirit, he made him Commiſſary ouer the building of the wals, at ſuch time as he immured and fortified Ieruſalem. In this office he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that the King thought very wel therof, and in way of recompence, gaue him the eſtate of Generall ouer the tribe of Ioſeph. Towards which, whilſt he trauailed from Ieruſalem, a certaine Prophet met him vpon the way (who was of the city of Silo, called Achias) who approching neere vnto him, and ſaluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themſelues were preſent, and there renting the garment which he wore vpon his backe into twelue pieces, he commanded Ieroboam to take ten, telling him that God had ſo decreed, and how he would rent the gouernment from Salomon, and reſerue onely one tribe vnto his ſonne, with that other which was annexed vnto it, by reaſon of the promiſe made to Dauid; and to thee (ſaid he) he giueth the other ten, becauſe Salomon hath offended God, and addicted himſelfe to the loue of ſtrange women, and the ſeruice of forraine gods.

Achias the Prophet foretelleth that he ſhould bee King ouer the ten tribes.

Now ſith thou knoweſt the cauſe wherfore God hath alienated the kingdome from Salomon, be thou iuſt, and obſerue thou the lawes: for if thou behaueſt thy ſelfe in ſuch ſort as thou knoweſt Dauid did, a great reward of thy piety, and recompence of thy obſeruance attendeth thee: ſo that thou ſhalt become as mighty as Dauid hath beene before thee. Ieroboam confirmed in great hopes by theſe words of the Prophet, being by nature haughtie, in yeers young, and beſides that, deſirous of authority: he tooke no reſt, but being poſſeſſed of the place of Generall, and remembring himſelfe of that which had been told him by Achias, he preſently began to perſwade the people to reuolt from Salomon, and to chuſe him for their King. Salomon, hearing newes of this his deliberation and enterprize, ſought the meanes to lay hands on him, and to put him to death: but Ieroboam preuenting him, fled vnto Suſac King of Egypt, with whom he remained vntill the death of Salomon. And thus for that time eſcaped he puniſhment: and thus was he reſerued to the fortune of a Kingdome.

Ieroboam flieth into Egypt, and remaineth there vntill Salomons death.

The death of Salomon. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. al. 4. 3. Reg. 12.

BVT when Salomon was very old, he died, after he had raigned foureſcore yeers, and liued ninety foure, and was buried in Ieruſalem; of all Kings the moſt happy, rich, and prudent, (except that ſinne whereunto he was drawne by women in his old age) of whom and thoſe calamities that preſently after befell the Hebrewes, we haue ſufficiently ſpoken. After the death of Salomon, as ſoone as his ſon Roboam (whom he begat vpon an Ammonitiſh woman, called Nooma) ſucceeded him in the kingdome, the Gouernours of the people ſent certaine meſſengers into Ægypt, to recall Ieroboam: who arriuing in the City of Sichem, Roboam came thither alſo, reſoluing himſelfe in that aſſembly of the Iſraelites, to take the kingdome vpon him by the peoples conſent. To him therefore the Princes of the people reſorted with Ieroboam, beſeeching him that he would remit ſomewhat of their ſeruitude, and ſhew himſelf more mercifull then his father had beene: for that vnder his gouernment they had beene ſorely oppreſſed, aſſuring him that by that meanes his kingdome ſhould be the more aſſured, if ſo be he had rather be beloued then feared. He ſome three dayes after promiſed them to returne an anſwer to their demands, and by that meanes drew them into ſuſpicion, that vpon the motion he miſliked of the offers they had propoſed: for they thought it became his yeers to be affable and ready to deſerue well; yet remained there ſome hope in them, that they had not preſently ſuffered the repulſe. Meane while, he calling about him his fathers friends, conſulted vpon the matter, what anſwer hee ſhould giue the people: Who, for that they wiſhed his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perſwaded him to ſpeake familiarly vnto the people, and remitting a little of his Kingly auſterity, to apply himſelfe to the fauour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability he might the more eaſily draw their hearts vnto him, becauſe that by a naturall inclination, ſubjects take delight in thoſe kings that are courteous, who with a certaine decent familiarity, entertaine themſelues amongſt them. But Roboam rejected this counſel of theirs (which was both good & profitable in all occaſions, but eſpecially at ſuch time, when it is vpon the point to be inſeated in a kingdome) and that not without Gods prouidence, ſince contrary to all reaſon he neglected the right courſe, and followed the peruerſe: ſo that calling vnto him certaine young men of his owne humour and diſpoſition, he certified them what the Elders had counſailed him, and willed them to diſcouer their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods permiſſion ſuffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cauſe they counſailed him to anſwer the people, that his little finger was more great then the loynes of his father, and that if they had experimented and indured grieuances vnder him, that he would be farre more rigorous, and that if his father had chaſtiſed them with the ſtroke of the whip, that they ſhould expect to be puniſhed by him with rude torments. The King delighted herewith, ſuppoſed the anſwer to be anſwerable to the dignity of his Empire. When as therefore the people were aſſembled on the third day to heare his reſolution, and all of them were in ſuſpence, expecting and deſirous to heare him ſpeake, from whom they hoped nought elſe but ſweetnes: Roboam contemning the counſell of his friends, propoſed vnto himſelfe that of the young men. All which happened by the will of God, to the end that that which Achias had prophecied might be fulfilled.

The people require Roboam to mitigate their burthen.

The wholſom aduice of the Elders.

The yeere of the world, 2971. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 993.

Roboam reiecteth the aduice of the Elders, and followeth the counſell of the younger.

The Iſraelites mooued with their repulſe, reuolt from Roboam.

They touched by theſe his anſwers, no leſſe then if they had bin wounded with the ſword, conceiued a moſt harty griefe, and were diſpleaſed with him, and no leſſe moued, then if they had already felt the miſchiefe that was threatned: ſo that they beganne all of them to cry with a loud voice, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Dauids allianee, neither with his ſucceſſion, telling him that they would onely leaue the Temple his father had builded, vnto his charge, & threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were ſo hainouſly and grieuouſly incenſed, (that Roboam hauing ſent vnto them Adoram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perſwade them to pardon his youth, if he had ſpoken any thing lightly, and vnreſpectiuely vnto them) they could not endure to heare him ſpeake, but ſlew and welnigh ouerwhelmed him with ſtones. Which when Roboam perceiued (ſuppoſing that it was himſelfe, who in the perſon of his officer was put to death, and ſtoned by the people) he feared leſt in effect his life, and the fortune of his kingdome ſhould fall into the like diſaſter. For which cauſe he ſuddenly aſcended his charriot & fled to Ieruſalem, where the tribe of Iuda, and that of Beniamin (by their their common ſuffrages)made him King. But as touching the reſt of the people, from that day forward they reuolted from the ſucceſſors of Dauid, and proclaimed Ieroboam King of their eſtates. Roboam the ſonne of Salomon being ſore diſpleaſed herewith, aſſembled the two tribes of his obeiſance, with an intent to muſter one hundreth and foureſcore thouſand choſen men, to make warre on Ieroboam and his people,and to inforce them by warre to acknowledge him for their Soueraigne. But God reſtrained him by the meanes of a Prophet,who forbad him to make warre; ſaying,that it was ill befitting that warre ſhould be waged betwixt two parties of one nation, and the rather for that this their reuolt had hapned by the will of God: by which meanes and perſwaſion he diſmiſſed his army. But firſt of all I will rehearſe that which Ieroboam King of Iſrael did, and afterwards ſubſequently I will declare the acts of Roboam King of the two Tribes, and thus ſhall the courſe of the hiſtory continue in due order euery waies.

Roboam intending to make warre on thoſe tribes that reuolted,is inhibited.

After that Ieroboam had planted his royall Court in the city of Sichem,he made his ordinary aboad in that place,except that ſometimes he ſoiourned in the City of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feaſt of Tabernacles being at hand, Ieroboam (ſuppoſing that if he permitted the people to goe vp and worſhip God in Ieruſalem,and ſolemnize the feaſt in that place,they might either repent themſelues of the reuolt,or being retained and withdrawn by the Temple and ſeruice that was celebrated therein,they might be perſwaded to forſake him,and ſubmit themſelues to their firſt King;and by that meanes he might be drawne into danger of his life)practized and plotted this inuention. He cauſed two golden calues to be caſt, and builded two ſeuerall temples,the one in Bethel,and the other in Dan (which is ſituate neere vnto the ſource of little Iordan.) In each of the chappels of theſe two townes, he placed one of theſe calues, and afterwards aſſembling the ten tribes that were vnder his ſubiection,he ſpake vnto them in maner following:My friends and country-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he aſſiſteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth them not,that ſerue him with true affection: For which cauſe I thinke it not conuenient, that you goe vp vnto Ieruſalem at that time, which is a City enemie vnto vs; neither that you make ſo long a iourney in way of deuotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, euen as I haue conſecrated two golden calues, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that euery one of you that inhabite neere vnto thoſe Cities, tranſporting your ſelues to the ſame,may adore God. Neither ſhall you want Prieſts and Leuites: for I will elect ſome ſuch among you, to the intent you haue no more need of the tribe of Leui, or the ſonnes of Aaron. Whoſoeuer therefore amongſt you would be a Prieſt, let him offer calues and muttons vnto God: which as it is reported, Aaron the firſt Prieſt did. By ſuch like ſpeeches ſeduced he the people,and cauſed them to fall from their forefathers religion,and tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their countrey: and this was the beginning of all thoſe miſchiefes that afterwards fell vpon the Hebrewes: by which meanes being ouercome in warre, they fell into captiuity and ſubiection of ſtrangers (whereof we will intreat further in place conuenient.) Now when the feaſt of Tabernacles(which hapned in the ſeuenth moneth) was at hand; he himſelfe intended to celebrate in Bethel after the ſame manner,as the two other tribes had feaſted in Ieruſalem,and erected an altar before the calfe,and was himſelfe the High Prieſt, aſcending vp to the Altar being aſſiſted by the Prieſts.

Why Ieroboams calues were made.

Ieroboam perſwadeth the people to idolatry.

The neglect of Gods ſeruice, is the cauſe of all euill.

Now at ſuch time as he was about to ſacrifice,and to offer vp burnt offerings in the ſight of the people, there came a Prophet and ſtood by him called Iadon (ſent from Ieruſalem by the commandement of God) who ſtanding vp in the midſt of the people,and in the hearing of the King, turned himſelfe towards the Altar,and ſpake after this maner:Thou Altar,Thou Altar(thus ſaith the Lord)there ſhall a man riſe of the tribe of Dauid,called Ioſias,he ſhall kill vpon thee the falſe prophets of his time,and ſhall burne the bones of the deceiuers and ſeducers vpon thee: And to the intent that each man may beleeue that this prophecie is true, it ſhall be confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar ſhall ſuddenly breake,and the fat of the ſacrifices that are laid thereon,ſhall be powred on the ground. Ieroboam diſpleaſed with theſe words of the Prophet, ſtretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he ſtretched out, became inſtantly withered, ſo that he could no more draw it backe againe to himſelfe,but held it hanging downe aſtoniſhed and mortified.On the other ſide,the altar cleft in twaine,and all that was theron fell downe(according as the Prophet had foretold.) The King perceiuing that the man had a true and diuine ſpirit of Prophecy,beſought him to pray vnto God, that his hand might be reſtored him againe in his full ſtrength and vigor: which he performed: ſo that his hand recouered againe his naturall ability; wherewith Ieroboam was very much contented, and inuited the Prophet to dine with him. But Iadon anſwered him and ſaid, that he neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the City, because God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him that it was not lawfull for him to returne the same way that he came. But the King admiring at the continency of the man, began the more seriously to suspect his estate, and (coniecturing by those things which he had both seene and heard) he diuined the assured disaster of his estate and fortunes. There dwelt in that City a certaine false prophet, whom Ieroboam held in great honour, (in that he soothed him vp in whatsoeuer was best pleasing to his eares.) This man at that time lay sicke vpon his bed, being faint through age; and when he was enformed by his sonne that there was a Prophet come from Ierusalem, and what wonders hee had wrought, and how Ieroboam by his prayers recouered againe his withered hand; hee fearing lest the King should make more account of this stranger, then of himselfe, commanded his sonnes presently to saddle his Asse, and to haue him in a readinesse against his departure. Which when they had hastily performed, he mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom he ouertooke, where he rested himselfe vnder a thicke shadowie Oake; and vpon the first encountry, saluted him, and afterwards expostulated with him, for that he had not visited him, neither accepted of that hospitality which he willingly would haue affoorded him. Iadon answered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taste any kinde of sustenance in any mans house, that dwelt within that city. Truely, said the other, with me thou mightest eate, for I also am a Prophet, and honour the same God that thou doest: and now also come I vnto thee by his commandement, to conduct thee backe againe into my house, and to entertaine thee with a friendly dinner. These words of the false prophet made Iadon credulous, so that he turned backe againe with him. But as they sate at their banquet, and were making merry together, God appeared vnto Iadon and said vnto him; that since he had broken his commandement, he should suffer punishment for the same: and withall expressed vnto him the manner: which was, that in his returne homewards, he should be torne in pieces by a Lyon; and that he should not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Ieroboam should not respect Iadons words, who had been found a lyar. As therfore Iadon returned backe to Ierusalem, a Lyon met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Asse and slew him, yet offered he no violence to the Asse that bare him, which he preserued with the body of the Prophet, standing fast by the same, vntill such time as certain passengers beholding the spectacle, brought newes therof into the towne vnto the false prophet, who sent his sonnes to bring backe the body: which by their assistance he honourably buried, charging them that after his death they should bury his body by him, assuring them that all that which he had prophecied against that City, against the altar, the Priests, and false prophets, was very true. And as touching himselfe, he commanded that after his decease they should bury him by him, because that being buried with him, there might no difference be made betwixt their bones, and his tombe might be more honoured. When as therefore he had interred the prophet and giuen his sonne these things in charge (being other wayes a most wicked and impious man) he addressed himselfe vnto Ieroboam, and said vnto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his hand, and assuring him that he accounted him a true and diuine Prophet, and one sent by God. But the false prophet began most maliciously to ouerthrow his opinion, and disguise the truth of that which hapned, by his perswasiue words. For he inforced himselfe to inferre, that his hand was astonished through the trauel he had taken in bearing the sacrifices, and after that he had a little rested, that it came into his owne naturall estate againe: and that the Altar being freshly built, and diuers great sacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twaine, and fell downe through the waightinesse of the charge. Consequently he declared vnto him the death of him, that had foretold these signes that were to come, and how he had beene slaine by a Lyon: For which cause he perswaded him to thinke that he in no sort was a Prophet, neither any waies partaking with the truth of prophecy. By such like allegations he made the King beleeue that which he said; and hauing wholly distracted his thoughts from God and good works, and obseruation of Gods lawes, he drew him to all wickednesse and impiety: by which act of his he outraged God, and offended his lawes, and sought daily after no other thing, then to inuent some new and cursed wickednes, that was far more hainous then all that which beforetime he had attempted. This is all that at this time we haue to write, as concerning Ieroboam.

Roboams defenced cities. 2 Paral. 11.

As touching Roboam Salomons sonne (who was King of the two Tribes, as wee haue before this declared) he builded these great and strong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethsor, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Maresa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and Hebron, which which being within the confines of Iuda, he builded firſt. He builded alſo other great Cities in the country of the Beniamites, which he walled, and placed Garriſons and Gouernours in euery one of them, and great ſtore of corne, wine and oyle: and generally in euery Citie he made a great ſtore-houſe with all ſorts of prouiſion, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets and launces. To him the Prieſts & Leuites annexed themſelues, who were diſperſed thorow Iſrael, who came and dwelt in Ieruſalem. For they tooke no pleaſure to adore by compulſion thoſe calues that Ieroboam had erected; and during the terme of three yeeres, they increaſed the kingdome of Roboam: who being married to one of his owne line, had three children, and was afterwards married alſo with Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Abſalon, who was of his parentage likewiſe, of whom he begat his ſonne called Abiah. He had alſo diuers other children by other women; but aboue all the reſt, he loued Maacha moſt entirely. He had eighteene legitimate wiues, married vnto him according to the law, and thirty concubines: he had eight and twenty ſonnes and threeſcore daughters, and declared for his ſucceſſour in the kingdome Abiah the ſonne of Maacha, and committed all his treaſures and ſtrong forts vnto his hands. But mortal men moſt vſually are corrupted by the vntoward flatteries of wauering fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Roboam ſeeing his kingdome thus increaſed; he bent himſelfe to all vniuſt and impious actions, and contemned the ſeruice of God: the people alſo conformed themſelues to his impieties. For the life of the ſubiect is oftentimes peruerted, by reaſon of the corrupt and diſſolute life of their Princes; and thoſe that are inferiours, beholding the ryot of their ſuperiours, will eaſily be withdrawne from all modeſty, and follow thoſe vices they profeſſe, as if they had bin their profeſſed vertues: for ſhould they doe the contrary, they ſhould ſeeme to diſanull and miſlike the actions of their Princes: As it hapned vnder the gouernment of Roboam, wherein the ſubiects addicted themſelues to impiety, and all errors: for they would not make profeſſion of honeſty, for feare leſt they ſhould ſeeme to ſtudy the meanes to be offenſiue vnto the King.

CHAP. IIII.

SVSAC King of Egypt, after the ſpoile of Ieruſalem, tranſporteth the riches of that Citie into Egypt.

BVT God ſent Suſac King of Egypt to take vengeance for that exceſſe, which was cõmitted againſt his maieſty by Roboam (whoſe actions Herodotus wrongfully aſcribeth to Seſoſtris.) For this Suſac in the fift yeere of Roboams raigne, aſſembled a huge army of diuers thouſands of men, and brought them out againſt Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelue hundred charriots, threeſcore thouſand horſemen, and foure hundreth thouſand footmen. The greater part of theſe were Libyans, and Æthiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrewes countrey with this power, without ſtroke-ſtriking he ſeized the ſtrongeſt places of the kingdome of Roboam, and fortified them, and at laſt came and incamped before Ieruſalem. But Roboam and his aſſociates, ſeeing themſelues begirt with a ſtrong ſiege on euery ſide by Suſacs army; at laſt had his recourſe vnto praiers: yet could he not mooue God to encline and fauor him with the victory. For the Prophet Samæas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like ſort, as they had forſaken him and his ſeruice. Which when they heard, they ſuddenly loſt their hearts, and ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, they all of them began to confeſſe that God had iuſtly forſaken them, becauſe they had ſhewed their impiety againſt him, and had peruerted all his lawes. But God ſeeing them thus diſpoſed, and making confeſſion of their ſinnes, ſaid vnto the Prophet, that he would not vtterly deſtroy them: yet notwithſtanding that he would deliuer them into the hands of the Ægyptians, to the end that they might learne whether it were more difficult to ſerue God, or men. When as therefore King Suſac had without bloodſhed or reſiſt taken & ſurprized the City, and was receiued into the ſame by diſcomforted Roboam; he kept not thoſe conuentions that were made betwixt them, but ſpoiled the Temple; and tooke away with him thoſe treaſures that were dedicated vnto God, and the ſeruice of the King, rauiſhing from thence innumerable thouſands of gold and ſiluer, not leauing any thing behind him. Hee carried away alſo thoſe Targets and bucklers of gold, which were made by King Salomon: neither left he behind him the quiuer of gold, which was offered by Dauid, and receiued by him of the King of Sophena: Which done, he retired backe again into his own countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnaſſus maketh mention (who differeth only in the name of the King) and ſaith that he aſſailed diuers nations, and ſubdued Paleſtina and Syria, and tooke many men prisoners without any resist: whereby it is manifest that he meaneth no lesse, G then that our nation hath been ouercome by the Ægyptian. For he saith, that in their gates who yeelded themselues vp vnto him without inforcement, he erected pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. But our King Roboam yeelded vp the City into his hands without contradiction. It is said that the Æthiopians haue learnt of the Ægyptians the vse of circumcision of the prepuce. For the Phœnicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confesse that they haue learnt it of the Ægyptians. But it is a matter very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestine of Syria, but our selues. But let each one speake of these things, according as him list.

Roboam for the golden shields and bucklers, maketh new of brasse.

Roboam dyeth, and Abias raigneth after him.

After the retreat of Sisac, King Roboam made shields and bucklers of brasse, in stead of those H of gold, and gaue the like number vnto his guard: and in stead of liuing in a braue army, in a royall and princely estate, he raigned after a seruile and fearefull manner, being all his life time enemy to Ieroboam. He died after hee had liued fiftie seuen yeeres, whereof he raigned seuenteene. He was a haughty and vndiscreet man, who lost his estate, because he would not giue credit to his fathers friends. Hee was buried in Ierusalem in the sepulcher of the Kings, and his sonne Abias succeeded him in his raigne, at such time as Ieroboam had already raigned eighteene yeeres ouer the ten tribes.

Ieroboams impiety.

Thus were these things terminated. It behooueth now at this present to declare that which Ieroboam did afterwards, and how he died. He, obseruing no meane or end of his impietie, im- I ployed himselfe continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrificers. But God with-held not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posteritie. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimes was sicke about that time, he commanded his wife to lay aside her royall garment, and to apparell her selfe like a common woman, and afterwards to goe to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be King: for which cause he willed her to repaire vnto him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her sonne should escape that sickenesse. Whereupon shee disguised her selfe according as her husband had commanded her, and came vnto the City of Silo where Achias dwelt: and as she was vpon entring his house (notwithstanding he had lost his sight through age) God appeared vnto him, and certified him in these two points: first, that Ieroboams wife came K

cc vnto him; and next, all that he should answer to her demand. At such time therefore as she entred into his house, after the guise of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loude cc voice; Enter, thou wife of Ieroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy selfe? Thou canst not hide thy cc selfe from God, who hath certified me of thy comming, and hath informed me what answer I shall giue vnto thee. He therefore said vnto her, that she should returne vnto her husband, and certifie him of Gods answer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I haue made thee great; and hauing dismembred the kingdome from Dauids posteritie, I haue giuen it vnto thee: but thou hast forgotten the same; and hauing forsaken my seruice, hast molten downe new gods, whom thou honorest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posterity, and cast cc them off for a prey vnto dogs, and fowles of the aire. For I will constitute a King ouer my peo- L cc ple, that shal leaue no one of Ieroboams race aliue. The people also shall haue part of this punishcc ment, and shall be depriued of this their fruitfull countrey, and be scattered among the regions cc on the other side of Euphrates, because they haue followed the impieties of their King, and acc doring those gods that were forged by him, haue giuen ouer my sacrifice. And, as concerning cc thy selfe (O woman) haste thee, and certifie thy husband of these things. For thou shalt finde cc thy sonne dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the City, but he shall finish his dayes. Hee cc shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in generall. For he onely was good of cc all the race of Ieroboam.

The punishment of Ieroboam, and the misery of the people foreprophecied.

When Achias had finished his prophecy, the woman started backe, sore troubled and dismaied through the danger of her sonne, and went lamenting onward on her way, wounded with M the future death of him, and by reason of her so earnest affection, she was afflicted with incredible torments. The haste which she vsed was importunate, because of her son whom she should see dead; by so much the sooner she hasted homeward, but it behoued her to vse expedition in the behalfe of her husband. When as therefore she was arriued, she found her sonne expiring, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited the rest vnto Ieroboam.

IEROBOAMS expedition against the sonne of ROBOAM, the ouerthrow of his armie, and how BASANES rooted out the whole posteritie of IEROBOAM, and made himselfe King.

Alias chap. 6. The expedition of Ieroboam against Abias King of Iuda.

Abias leuied an armie against Ieroboam.

BVT Ieroboam was nothing mooued therewith, but leuied a great armie, with an intent to make warre against Abias the sonne of Roboam, who had obtained his fathers kingdome ouer the two tribes. For he despised him because he was young in yeeres. This notwithstanding, the yong King was no whit dismaid (although he vnderstood of Ieroboams comming) but with greater wisedome then was incident to his yeeres, and beyond all expectation of his forward aduersary, hee leuied an army of two tribes, with which hee encountred Ieroboam at the mountaine of Samaria; where incamping his host neere vnto him, hee prouided all things in a readinesse that were requisit for the battell, and had with him foure hundreth thousand fighting men, but Ieroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to giue the allarum and charge, Abias stood vp in a certaine high place from whence he might bee seene and heard, and making a signe with his hand, hee required that Ieroboam and the people would first of all heare him peaceably: which granted to him, and each one attending in silence, he brake out into these words; There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promised the kingdome to Dauid and his posteritie for euer; I therefore greatly admire how you haue reuolted from my father, to submit your selues to Ieroboam his seruant, whom at this present you accompany to warre against those whom God hath ordained to raigne, and to take the kingdome from them, the greater part whereof Ieroboam vsurpeth vniustly euen at this day, and which, as I suppose, he shall not enioy long time. For he shall be punished by God, and shall cease to contradict his lawes, and to dishonour them as he doth continually, in perswading you to doe the like.

Abias Oration to the Hebrewes, wherin he vpbraideth them of their superstition, and forsaking of their religion.

" You haue receiued no iniury at my fathers hands; but by reason that he was mis-led by the sinister counsels of certaine wicked persons, and spake vnto you certaine words which in appearance " seemed vnfitting in your eares, you haue forsaken him in your displeasure: but in effect, you haue " separated your selues from God and his Commandements. Truly you should haue pardoned a " young man vntrained and vntaught in Oratory, not onely for the rude words which he vsed, but " although his youth and ignorance should haue mooued him to commit some churlish and indiscreet action and errour, yet should you haue indured the same. For the fathers demerits ought to " serue and satisfie the childrens defects. But you haue had no regard of all this, neither then nor " at this present, but lead forth a great army against vs. But whereupon ground you the hope of " your victory? Is it on your calues of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountaines, which are " witnesses of your impietie and irreligion? Is it your great number that surpasseth ours by far, that " maketh you confident? Truly, the force of many thousands is of no value, whereas the army " fighteth in an vniust quarrell. For in onely iustice and pietie towards God, consisteth the most assured hope of obtaining victory ouer a mans enemies: which must needs be on our side, who " obserue at all times the ordinances and seruices of our God, whom mens hands haue not fashioned of corruptible matter, nor the subtiltie of a cunning King could not forge to deceiue a communaltie, but such a one, whose worke is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore aduise you, that presently you repent your selues, and that taking a better way, you desist from your " warre, and acknowledge the lawes of your forefathers; finally, those ordinances, which haue aduanced you to so great felicitie.

Thus spake Abias to the people. But whilst he yet continued his discourse, Ieroboam sent certaine of his souldiers by by-waies to inclose Abias within 2. streights, before his followers could discouer them. Now when Abias was thus inclosed in the midst of his enemies, his army began to be discomforted, and to lose their courage: but hee incouraged them, and exhorted them to put their trust in God, who could not be inclosed by his enemies: so that all together hauing called vpon God to assist them, and after that the Priests had sounded the trumpet, they thrust in amongst their enemies with a great shout, and God so blinded the vnderstanding, and abated the force of Ieroboams souldiers, that they fled, & those on Abias side had the vpper hand. Neuer was there war recorded by the historians either amongst the Greeks or Barbarians, that was pursued with so great a slaughter as the army of Ieroboam: whereby it appeared that this wonderfull and admirable victory came from God. For they discomfited fiue hundred thousand of their enemies, and tooke their most defenced places by force and spoiled them. Bethel & Ithan also with their lands lands and ſigniories belonging vnto them: ſo that as long as Abias liued, Ieroboam was neuer after of force to raiſe any power ſince the loſſe he receiued. Abias ſuruiued after this his victory, onely for the ſpace of three yeeres; and was buried in Ieruſalem, in the Sepulcher of his anceſtors, leauing twenty two ſonnes and ſixteene daughters behind him, all which he begat on ſixteene women. His ſonne Aſa ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whoſe mother was called Maacha: vnder his gouernment the countrey of Iſrael enioyed a firme peace for the ſpace of ten yeeres. This is that which we haue obſerued of Abias, ſonne of Roboam, the ſonne of Salomon: Ieroboam the King of the ten Tribes died likewiſe, after he had raigned twenty two yeeres, and Nadab his ſonne ſucceeded him, at ſuch time as Aſa had already raigned two yeeres. The ſonne of Ieroboam gouerned two yeeres, reſembling his father in impietie and wickedneſſe. During theſe two yeeres, he made warre againſt Gaban, a Citie of the Philiſtines, and encamped thereabout to ſurprize it by force: but being betrayed by the trechery of a certaine friend of his called Baaſa, the ſonne of Machil, he died. This Baaſa taking poſſeſſion of the kingdome, exterminated all the poſteritie of Ieroboam: and it came to paſſe that they of Ieroboams race that dyed in the Citie, were torne in pieces, and deuoured by dogges; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey vnto birds, according as Gods Prophet had pronounced. By this meanes the houſe of Ieroboam ſuffered a deſerued puniſhment, for their impietie and wickedneſſe.

CHAP. VI.

BVT Aſa King of Ieruſalem, was a man of vpright and honeſt life, and ſuch a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprized he any thing, that had not a naturall relation to piety, and the preſcript of the lawes. He corrected whatſoeuer was vicious and irregular in his kingdome, redreſſing whatſoeuer was erronious in the ſame, and purging it from all impietie. He had an army of three hundred thouſand men of the tribe of Iuda, armed with bucklers & iauelins, and two hundred and fifty thouſand of the tribe of Beniamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After he had raigned ten yeeres, Zaræus King of Ethiopia came out againſt him, with a great army of nine hundred thouſand footmen, and one hundred thouſand horſemen with three hundred charriots, and deſtroyed all the land as farre as Mareſa, a Citie of Iuda: in which place Aſa came and met with him, and oppoſed army againſt army in the valley of Saphath, not far from the Citie. Where ſeeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he beſought God that he would giue him the victory and ſlaughter of diuers thouſands of his enemies: for he ſaid that he came out againſt Zareus, not aſſuring himſelf in any other thing, except onely of Gods aſſiſtance, who had the power to make a handfull of men ſuperiours ouer many, and the feeble to ouercome the mightie.

Whileſt Aſa prayed thus vnto God, a certaine ſigne of victory was giuen him; ſo that, reioyced and confirmed in that God had giuen him a token that hee would aſſiſt him, hee aſſailed his enemies, and ſlew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the reſt that were put to flight, he purſued them as farre as the countrey of Gerar; and after they had conquered their enemies, they ſacked the Citie of Gerar, and brought from thence a great maſſe of gold, and a huge quantitie of bootie, with Camels, Dromedaries, and herds of diuers kinds of cattell.

Aſas victory.

When Aſa and his had thus by this meanes obtained at Gods hands ſuch a victory, & ſo great riches, they returned back againe to Ieruſalem: and when they drew neere vnto the city, the Prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who ſtayed them, and began after this manner to ſpeake vnto them: That ſith they had obtained from God ſo notable a victory, they ought to behaue themſelues like vertuous men, and ſuch as feared God, conforming themſelues vnto his will in all things; proteſting that if they perſiſted in the ſame, God would giue them the continuall victory ouer their enemies; and beſides that, happy life: but if they forſooke the ſeruice of God, that all things ſhould fal out contrary vnto them. That the time ſhould come, when neither true Prophet or Prieſt ſhould be found amongſt them, that ſhould inſtruct them in righteouſneſſe, when their Cities ſhould be ouerthrowne, and their nation ſhould be ſcattered ouer the face of the whole earth, and liue like wanderers and vagabonds. In the meane while therefore, while they had time, he counſelled them to liue vprightly, wiſhing them that they would not depriue thẽſelues of that fauour which God bare vnto them. When the King and all the people heard theſe words, they were very ioyfull, and euery one both in generall and particular, were carefull to ſerue God. The

3 Reg. 16. A prophecy againſt Baſa.

Now will I returne to Baſa King of the multitude of Iſrael, who (hauing ſlaine Madad the ſon of Ieroboam) vſurped the kingdome. He made his aboad in the citie of Therſa, and raigned foure and twenty yeeres, ſhewing himſelfe more wicked and impious, then either Ieroboam or his ſonne had bin. He plagued the people many waies, & diſhonored God very greatly, who ſent the Prophet Gimon vnto him, to foretell him that his whole race ſhould periſh, and that his houſe ſhould be perſecuted with as many miſeries as himſelfe had inflicted on Ieroboams poſteritie: becauſe that hauing receiued the gouernment from God, hee ſhewed himſelfe vngratefull vnto him for B his goodneſſe, and gouerned his people impiouſly and vniuſtly: whereas iuſtice & piety are both profitable vnto thoſe that practiſe them, and well-pleaſing vnto God. Further, in that he had conformed himſelfe in life, to the diſſolute courſe that Ieroboam vſed, and was wholly contaminated with all his vices, hee might aſſure himſelfe that reſembling him in wickedneſſe, hee ſhould vndoubtedly equall him in puniſhment. When Baſa heard all thoſe euils (that ſhould ſhortly fall on him and his poſterity, by reaſon of his wickedneſſe) he redeemed not the time, neither indeuoured himſelfe to gaine the reputation of a reconciled life, or to obtaine pardon at Gods hands, by repenting himſelfe of his forepaſſed ſins: but euen as they that haue a recompence propoſed vnto them to make them more affectionate in exploiting any thing, do diligently indeuour themſelues to performe the ſame: ſo Baſa, notwithſtanding the Prophet had fore-told him of that C which ſhould happen, perſiſted in his wickedneſſe as if it had beene in vertue, and became worſe and worſe, to the vtter ruine and confuſion both of him and his houſhold: and daily addicted himſelfe vnto all wickedneſſe, with no leſſe greedineſſe, then if he had enterprized to beare away the honour in ſuch a combat. In the end he aſſembled an army, and aſſailed Ramath once more, which was a great Citie ſome foure leagues diſtant off of Ieruſalem: which he tooke, and determined to leaue a garriſon therein, and fortified the ſame; with a reſolution, from thence to make his roads into Aſas kingdome. But Aſa fearing the inuaſion of his enemy, and conſidering that the ſouldiers who were left in Ramath, did moſt grieuouſly ſpoile all the dominions that were vnder him, ſent Embaſſadours to the King of Damaſco with gold and ſiluer, to induce him to a ſocietie in warre, and to renue that amitie betweene them, which was confirmed betwixt both D their fathers. Who willingly receiued thoſe treaſures that were ſent him, and made a league with him, and brake the truce which he had with Baſa: ſo that he ſent the gouernors of his dominions againſt thoſe cities that were vnder Baſaes ſubiection, with commandement to deſtroy them.

Baſa ſurprized Ramath, and fortified it.

Which when the King of Iſrael vnderſtood, he gaue ouer the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition turned to yeeld thoſe of his ſubiects his aſſiſtance, who were vtterly diſtracted. But Aſa in the meane while builded two ſtrong townes, Gabath and Maſpha, of that ſtuffe which Baſa had prepared to build withall. Baſa afterwards (preuented by the common debt of death) had no more opportunitie to make warre againſt Aſa. Hee was buried in the Citie E of Arſane, and his ſon Ela ſucceeded him in his kingdome: who after he had raigned ſome two yeeres, was traiterouſly ſlaine by Zimri, a Captaine of a halfe regiment of horſemen. For whileſt Ela banquetted with Oſa, who was the Steward of his houſe, Zamri wrought effectually, that he perſwaded ſome of his horſemen to aſſault Ela, who at that time was alone, & deſtitute of men of warre and Captaines, for that all of them were at the ſiege of Gabathan, a citie of the Philiſtines.

moſt ſecret and retired place of the palace; where ſetting it on fire, he burned both himſelfe and it, after he had raigned ſeuen daies. Suddenly after this, the Iſraelites fell at controuerſie amongſt themſelues, becauſe that ſome of them ſought to preferre Thaman to the kingdome, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amries ſide had the better, and being of the better ſort, ſlew Thaman, and made Amri ſoueraigne ouer the people. The thirteenth yeere of Asa, Amri began his raigne, and was King for twelue yeeres ſpace; ſixe yeere gouerned he in Therſa, and ſixe in Mareon (which the Greekes call Samaria) himſelfe impoſed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had giuen him the land on which he builded this Citie. He differed in nothing from the other Kings his predeceſſors, but in that he was worſer then any of them: for all of them buſied their heads on this thing onely, that by daily impieties they might alien the people from God. For which cauſe God being diſpleaſed, cauſed the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguiſhed both the poſteritie and name of one another. This Amri dyed in Samaria, and Achab his ſonne was his ſucceſſor.

Hereby a man may truly and eaſily perceiue, what care the diuine Maieſtie hath of humane affaires, and how he loueth the vertuous, and vtterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Iſrael, through their impietie, in a ſhort and ſucceſſiue courſe the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with all their families. But Asa (King of Ieruſalem and the two Tribes) liuing happily in the fauour of God, for his piety and iuſtice attained to a reuerend and old age: and after he had raigned one and forty yeeres, he died a good death. And after his death; Ioſaphat his ſonne (whom he begat on his mother Abida) ſucceeded him; who in all things that concerned either piety or fortitude, ſeemed to emulate and equall his grandfather Dauid, according as it ſhal be declared hereafter. But Achab King of Iſrael made his aboad in Samaria, and gouerned the kingdome for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres, without any alteration of thoſe ordinances which his progenitors Kings of Iſrael had eſtabliſhed; but that he exceeded them daily in complotting worſer wickedneſſes. For he imitated all their impieties and wickednes (but eſpecially the Apoſtaſie of Ieroboam) for he adored thoſe calues that were erected by him; and beſides that, hee added farre worſe impieties then the former. He tooke to wife Iezabel the daughter of Ithobal King of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learned to adore the gods of her nation: for ſhee was a buſie and audacious woman, and of ſuch immeaſurable madneſſe, that ſhe feared not to build a temple in honour of Bell the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furniſhed with all kinde of trees, and to ordaine prieſts and falſe prophets alſo in honour of that god. The King alſo tooke delight to haue theſe kinds of men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other Kings before him in madneſſe and malice. To him came a certaine Prophet ſent by the Almightie God, that was borne in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he foreprophecied, that neither deaw nor raine ſhould fall on the earth a long time, vntill that himſelfe, who was prepared to depart from him, ſhould appeare againe vnto him: and binding the ſame with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himſelfe to the Southward, where he liued by a certaine riuer, from whence he fetcht his drinke: for his meat was daily brought him by certaine Crowes.

Now when the riuer through want of raine was waxen dry, God commanded him to repaire vnto Sareptha (a City not farre from Sidon and Tyre, and ſituate in the midſt betweene them both) where hee ſhould find a widdow-woman, who would furniſh him with food. As ſoone therefore as he drew neere vnto the gate, he ſaw a woman that liued by her labour, gathering of ſticks; and God gaue him to vnderſtand that it was ſhee who ſhould nouriſh him. Whereupon he came vnto her and ſaluted her, praying her that ſhe would bring him ſome water to coole his thirſt; and as ſhee was ready to depart, hee called her backe againe, and willed her to bring him ſome bread alſo. Whereupon ſhee ſwore that ſhee had nothing in her houſe, but a handfull of flower and a little oyle, and that ſhe was come forth to gather ſticks, to the end ſhe might bake the ſame, and make bread for her ſelfe and her ſonne, and when they had eaten the ſame, they muſt needly periſh through famine, becauſe they had not any thing more left them. Go, ſaid the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceiue better hopes, and when thou haſt prepared meat for me, bring it mee: for I tell thee, that thy pitcher of meale ſhall neither faile, nor thy pot of oyle be empty, vntill that God ſend raine vpon the earth. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, ſhee approched neere vnto him, and performed that which he commanded, and ſhee her ſelfe had ſufficient to feede vpon, and ſhee gaue the reſt vnto her ſonne and to the Prophet: ſo that they wanted nothing ſo long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this default of raine, in the acts of Ithobal King of the Tyrians, ſpeaking after this manner: In this time there was a ſeaſon without raine, from the moneth of October

October vntill October in the next yeere after, but vpon his supplication and request there fell great store of thunder. He builded the citie of Botris in Phenicia and Auzate in Libya. Doubtlesse he expressed hereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Ithobale raigned ouer the Tyrians, as Menander testifieth in his history. The woman (of whom we haue spoken heretofore, that nourished the Prophet) seeing her sonne false sicke, and lying senseless, as if he had bin already dead, or yeelding vp of the ghost; wept, and brake out into such passionate laments, as were answerable to her desolate estate; and said, that the cause of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her house, and had discouered her sinnes, and that for the same cause her sonne was dead. But he recomforted her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the childe vnto him, assuring her that he would restore him to life.

The yeere of the world, 2037. before Christs Nativitie, 927.

Now when she had brought him, he tooke the childe and bare him into his lodging where he remained, and laid him on his bed, and cryed out vnto God, saying, that he had but slenderly recompenced her that had receiued and nourished him, if so be her son should be taken from her: he therefore besought him, that he would returne the soule into the body, and restore life vnto the infant. Whereupon, God hauing compassion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might suppose that he came vnto her to endomage her; he restored the childe to life beyond all expectation. For which the mother gaue thankes vnto the Prophet, saying, that by this meanes she was thorowly perswaded, that God had spoken vnto him. Not long after, he sought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him vnderstand that he should haue raine. At that time the famine raigned ouer the whole countrey, and there was great want of necessary victuals; so that men did not onely faint for want of bread; but the earth also for want of raine, could not bring forth that which was requisit for the sustenance of horses and other cattell. The King therefore calling Obediah vnto him (who was the master of his heards) he commanded him that he should each way seeke out for fountaines and brookes, willing him that if he found out any grasse, he should mowe the same, and giue it to his cattell for their sustenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was sought in diuers places, and could not be found: he willed Obediah also to follow him. So taking both of them seuerall waies, the King followed one, and the master of the cattell another.

Elias is sent by God to prophecie raine to Achab.

This Obediah was a godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and sustained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the King, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certified him, he humbled himselfe on his face before him. Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the King, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein he had offended him, that he would make him a minister and messenger vnto him, who had sought to kill him, and had by-laid the countrey to apprehend him? For there was not any streight, whither he sent not some of his men to finde out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they should put him to death. Now it may so be (said he) that whilest I repaire vnto the King, the Spirit of God wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the King not finding thee heere, and frustrate of his desire, will reuenge himselfe on my head. Be thou not therefore so secure by my danger, whereas thou maist know how carefull I am of such holy men as thou art, who haue deliuered a hundred Prophets from Iezabels fury, and now at this time conceale and sustaine them in secret places. Notwithstanding all these words, Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the King, and to cast off all feare, swearing vnto him by an oath, how that day he would make himselfe seene and knowne vnto Achab.

Achab seeketh for Elias. Obediah concealeth and sustaineth a hundred Prophets.

When Obediah had certified the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being fraught with indignation, said vnto him, Is it thou that heapest so much mischiefe on the Hebrewes heads? Art thou the man that art the cause of this sterilitie? To whom Elias replied without flattering him any waies, that it was he & his race that were the occasions of these mischiefes, because they had brought strange gods into their countrey; whom they adored, and had forsaken the true God, who was and is onely to be worshipped. He therefore willed him presently to assemble all the people on the mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife and her prophets, whose number he reckoned vp: the prophets likewise of the woods, who were in number foure hundred. When as therefore all of them being summoned by the King, were gathered together in that place: Elias stood vp in the midst of them and said; How long will you liue thus, hauing both your soules and opinions dismembred and diuided? For if you thinke that the Hebrewes God is the true and onely God, why follow you him not? and why keepe you not his Commandements? But if you thinke that the honour belongeth not to him, but to forraine gods, gods, follow you them. When Elias perceiued that the people replyed nothing hereunto, hee prayed them (in confirmation of that infinite and distinct power of God from that of strange gods) that whereas he was but one onely Prophet of the true GOD at that time present, and the other were foure hundred that worshipped the false; that hee might take an Oxe and kill the same, and lay it vpon wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the sacrifice; and that they also might doe the like, and call vpon their gods, and beseech them to send downe fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they should doe and confirme the same by miracle, that then the true nature of their gods should be knowne.

This counsell of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false prophets first of all to chuse themselues an Oxe, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call vpon the assistance of their gods: and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and inuocation was of no force, Elias began to mocke them, saying, Why call you not out vpon your gods with a loud voice? for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleepe. Whilest thus they had inuocated from the morning vntill mid-day (cutting themselues with kniues and lances, according to the custome of their countrey) Elias that was to make his sacrifice, commanded the false prophets to stand aside, willing the people to draw neere vnto him, and obserue, for feare lest secretly he should conuey fire vnder the wood. When the people were approched, he tooke 12. stones, according to the number of the 12. tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deepe trench round about the same; and afterwards heaping wood vpon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commanded them to fill foure tunnes with fountain water, and to powre it vpon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receiue and drinke vp the water. Which done, hee began to pray and call vpon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power vnto his people, who had so long time run astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heauen vpon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried vp. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fell downe on their faces vpon the earth, adoring one onely God: confessing him to be the most mighty and only true God, and auowing that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an euill and truthlesse opinion; and laying hands themselues vpon their false prophets, they slew them by the commandement of Elias. He willed the King also to depart, & take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him raine; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him downe on the earth, leaning his head vpon his knees: whilest thus he sate, he commanded his seruant also to get vp vpon a certaine rock, and to looke towards the Sea, & to tell him if he saw any clouds arise in any part (for till that time the ayre had bin alwaies cleere.) His seruant hauing often ascended the rocke, and returned him answer that he saw nothing: at length mounting vp the seuenth time, in descending he returned him this newes; that he saw some blacke appearance in the ayre, not much vnlike to a mans footstep. When Elias vnderstood this, he sent vnto Achab, wishing him to retire himselfe within the Citie before the raine fell: who had no sooner recouered the citie of Iezrael, but that the ayre was presently clouded and couered with a showre, and a vehement wind intermixed with raine, fel vpon the earth, and the Prophet seized by the Spirit of God, ranne with the Kings chariot as far as Iezrael a citie of Asser. When Iezebel, Achabs wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slaine her prophets, she was sore displeased, and sent messengers vnto him, threatning him in like sort to reuenge her selfe on him, as he had slaine her prophets. Which for that Elias feared, he fled into the citie of Bersabe, which is vpon the borders of the tribe of Iuda, bounding vpon Idumæa: in which place he left his seruant, and retired himselfe into the desart: where, whilest he prayed God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was no better then others, for which cause he should desire to liue after them; he fell asleepe vnder a certaine tree, and after that some one had awaked him, he arose and found bread and water ready prepared by him. When as therefore he had eaten and was recomforted, he went vnto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses receiued the Lawes from God) where finding out a hollow caue, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certaine voice which spake vnto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he remained in that place, and forsooke the citie; He answered, for that he had slaine the prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cause hee was sought for by the Kings wife, that he might be done to death. The voice replyed againe, and commanded him to shew himselfe openly, assuring him that he should vnderstand that which it behoued him to performe.

God speaketh to Elias in the desart.

Hereupon as ſoone as it was day, he forſooke the caue, hee heard an earthquake, and ſaw a light: and after all things were appeaſed, the heauenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he ſhould in no waies be diſcomforted with that which he ſaw: for that no one of his enemies ſhould haue power to hurt him; charging him to returne vnto his houſe, to the intent to proclaime Iehu the ſon of Nimſi King of the people, and Azael of Damaſco King of the Syrians; certifying him that in his place, Elizeus of the citie of Abela ſhould be Prophet; and that the wicked people ſhould be deſtroyed, the one by Azael, and the other by Iehu. When Elias had heard theſe things, he returned into the countrey of the Hebrewes, and met Elizeus the ſon of Saphat at the cart, and with him diuers others driuing before them twelue couple of oxen: him did he approach, and caſt vpon him his garment, who inſtantly began thereupon to prophetize, ſo that forſaking his oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required he him, that before his departure, he might take leaue of his parents; which licence when he had obtained, he committed them vnto God and followed Elias, attending on him during all the terme of his life like his diſciple and ſeruant. This iſſue had the affaires of this ſo excellent a Prophet. But a certaine Citizen called Naboth of the Citie of Azar, had a vineyard neere vnto the lands of Achab, who required him that he would ſell him the ſame, at what price he thought conuenient at his owne election, to the intent he might annexe the ſame to his owne lands, and make them all but one poſſeſſion: wiſhing him, that if he would not ſell it him for ſiluer, to chooſe in exchange thereof, any one field of his that beſt liked him. Naboth anſwered him, that he would not doe it, but that he intended to gather the fruit of his owne land himſelfe, which hee had receiued as an inheritance from his father. The King no leſſe tormented then if he had loſt his owne inheritance (in that he might not bee maſter of another mans patrimony) would neither waſh nor receiue any ſuſtenance. For which cauſe Iezabel his wife queſtioned with him as touching the cauſe of his diſcontent, and how it came to paſſe that he neither waſht, din'd, nor ſupt: who told her of Naboths rude behauiour, and how hauing vſed all iuſt and reaſonable compoſition vnto him, in abaſing himſelfe more then his royall authoritie permitted, he had beene outraged by him, in that he obtained not the thing which he requeſted at his hands. Hereupon Iezabel willed him to be of good cheere, aduiſing him, that diſmiſſing his diſpleaſure, he ſhould continue his ordinary entertainment, becauſe ſhee her ſelfe would take vpon her to reuenge him on Naboth. Whereupon ſhe preſently ſent Letters in Achabs name to the gouernours of the countrey, whereby ſhee inioyned them to celebrate a faſt, and to aſſemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth ſhould haue a ſeat prepared for him, by reaſon of his birth and nobilitie; willing them afterwards, that ſuborning three impudent and falſe witneſſes to depoſe againſt him, that hee had blaſphemed againſt God and the King: they ſhould by this meanes and for this occaſion, cauſe him to be ſtoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed, according as the Queene had written, and Naboth (conuinced by falſe witneſſe, for ſcandalizing both God and the King) was ſtoned by the people and put to death. When Iezabel had tidings hereof, ſhee repaired to the Kings preſence, and told him that hee ſhould enioy Naboths vineyard, and diſburſe nothing for the ſame.

But God diſpleaſed with this her wickedneſſe, ſent the Prophet Elias purpoſely to meet with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him that hee iniuſtly poſſeſſed the lawfull inheritance of a legitimate heire, whom he had done to death. As ſoone as the King perceiued that he came vnto him, ſuppoſing it to be vnſeemely for a King to be reproued, he firſt of all confeſſed the fault, and offered him to make reſtitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretell him, that in the ſame place where Naboths carcaſſe was conſumed by dogs, that both his and his Queenes blood ſhould be ſhed, and that all his race ſhould be deſtroyed, for that they durſt commit ſuch an impiety, and ſo wickedly ſlaughter (againſt all law) ſo good and guiltleſſe a Citizen. At length Achab vpon theſe words was ſeized with diſpleaſure, and repented for the offence he had committed: ſo that apparelling himſelfe in ſackcloth, and walking barefoot, hee taſted not any meat, but confeſſed his ſinnes, vnder hope to appeaſe Gods wrath. For which cauſe God certified him by the Prophet, that during his life-time the puniſhment of his race ſhould be deferred, becauſe he had repented him of his miſdeeds: but that the threats and menaces ſhould take effect in his ſonnes time; all which Elias ſignified vnto the King.

CHAP. VIII.

ADAD King of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two seuerall times with ACHAB, and is ouerthrowne by him.

3. Reg. 20. Adads warre against Achab.

WHILEST Achabs affaires were after this manner disposed, the sonne of Adad (that raigned ouer the Syrians, and those of Damasco) assembled the forces of his whole countrey, and associated with himselfe two and thirtie other Kings, with whom he came and made warre against Achab. Who being farre inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battell, but closing vp his souldiers in his strongest Cities, he himselfe retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very strong wall, and generally very hard to be surprized.) For which cause the Syrian (taking his army with him) resorted to Samaria, and encamping before the same, intended to scale and batter the Citie. But first of all he sent a Herald to Achab, to require him to giue audience to his Embassadours which he would send vnto him, by whom he should be certified what his resolution was. As soone as the King of Israel had granted them free accesse, the Embassadours came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife should be at Adads command: which if he would confesse, and suffer him to seize so many of them as best liked him, hee would leuy the siege, and batter the Citie no more. Achab gaue the Embassadours commission to certifie the King of Syria, that both himselfe, and all whatsoeuer was his, was at his command. Vpon which answer the King sent a second message vnto Achab, enioyning him the next day to admit such of his seruants as he should send vnto him, to search his royall palace, and the houses of his friends and kinsmen, and take from thence that which was best liking, and in greatest estimate with them, and leaue the rest with him whereof they made least reckoning.

The Syrians Embassage to Achab.

Achab amazed at this second Embassage of the King of Syria, assembled his people, and certified them, that he was ready to deliuer vp into the enemies hands his wiues and children, for their safetie and repose; and to abandon all that likewise which was in his possession (for that the Syrian had demanded no lesse at his hands in his first Embassage: But that now he required that his seruants might be admitted to ransacke all their houses, to the end they may leaue nothing therin that was worthy regard; willing by this meanes to take a pretext of making warre, knowing well (said he) that I will spare nothing that is mine for your safetie. At this present he proffereth and seeketh occasion of hostility, proposing vnto you a thing, which is vnpleasing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithstanding, I will doe whatsoeuer you shall thinke good of. To this the people answered, that they could not endure that any of his demands should be listned vnto, or respected; but that the King should prepare for war. Whereupon he called for the Embassadors and dismissed them with this answer, That they should report vnto their Master, that Achab persisted in those things, which of all were required by him (because he had a desire of the conseruation of his subiects:) but as touching his second demand, that hee would no waies condescend thereunto: and thus sent he them away. When Adad heard this answer, he was sore mooued and sent vnto Achab the third time, threatning him that his souldiers should make a bulwarke more high then the walles (hee so much trusted in) yea though onely each of them should bring but a handfull of earth, with them (which boast he vsed towards him to terrifie him, and to expresse thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppose against him.) But Achab answered, that he ought not to glory in his army, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battell. When the Embassadors were returned backe, they found the King at dinner with 32. Kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achabs answer. Hereupon Adad gaue commandement to begirt the Citie with Palliſadoes, and to raise bulwarks of earth, and busily to intend the siege. Whilest these things were in hand, Achab was grieuously troubled, and all the people with him: but at length he grew confident, and cast off all his feare, through the arriuall of a certaine Prophet, who said vnto him, that God promised to deliuer all those thousands of souldiers, and his boastfull enemies which he beheld, into his hands. The same Prophet being afterwards demanded by him, by whose meanes this victory might be gained: Hee said, that it should be by the sonnes of the gouernors, whom the King himselfe should lead forth, by reason of their vnexperience. Achab therfore calling vnto him the gouernours sonnes, found that their number amounted to two hundreth thirtie and two: and hauing notice that the Syrians intended nought else but pleasure and banquetting, hee opened the Citie gates, and sent these young men out against the. Now when the sentinels of the aduerse part had discouered them, they certified Adad thereof, of, who ſent out certaine ſouldiers againſt them, commanding them that if they were come out in warlike ſort to bid the battell, they ſhould bring them vnto him faſt bound; and if they came in peace, they ſhould doe the like. Now had Achab within the Citie, arranged another army, and kept them in a readineſſe. When as therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard, and ſlaine a great number of them, and had purſued the reſt euen vnto their owne campe, Achab ſpying his preſent victory and aduantage, cauſed his whole army to breake forth; who giuing an vnexpected charge vpon the enemies, diſcomfited the Syrians (who little expected for ſuch a ſtratageme from the Hebrewes) and aſſailed them diſarmed and drunken: ſo that they left both armour and weapon behind them; and fled from their campe; and their King likewiſe was ſo hotly purſued, that he ſcarcely had opportunitie to ſaue himſelfe by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe. Achab made a long chace in following the Syrians, and ſlaughtering them that fled; hee ſpoiled their campe likewiſe; and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantitie of gold and ſiluer. He tooke Adads charriots and horſes alſo, and with them returned backe into the Citie.

Achabs victory againſt the Syrians.

But whereas by the aduice of the ſaid Prophet, he was perſwaded to prepare and keepe an army in readines againſt the next yeer (for that the Syrians were like, nay rather reſolued to charge him againe) the King intermitted no preparation that concerned the warre. For Adad (being eſcaped from the fight with thoſe few forces that remained after the battell) conſulted with his friends, how he might war againſt the Iſraelites. Who aduiſed him from thenceforth neuer more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was powerfull vpon the mountaines, and for that cauſe they had beene ouercome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plaine, both he and his ſhould bee aſſured to haue the vpper hand. Moreouer they counſelled him, that he ſhould diſmiſſe thoſe Kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might returne into his owne countrey, and that in their ſtead he ſhould retaine their forces, ouer which hee ſhould ordaine Chiefetaines; beſides (to ſupply their places that were loſt) they aduiſed him to leuy horſmen & chariots thorow all his countrey. Adad ſuppoſing that they had diſcreetly counſelled him in this matter, ordered and leuied his army according as they had aduiſed him. And as ſoone as the ſpring-time was come, he aſſembled his army, & led them forth againſt the Iſraelites; and arriuing neere vnto the city of Aphec, he incamped in a plaine field. But Achab with his forces (marching out to meet with him) pitched his tents and arranged his battell neere vnto him (although he were farre inferiour both in force and number.) To him the Prophet appeared anew, telling him that God would once more haue the victory, to make it knowne that his power was not onely in the mountaines (as the Syrians perſwaded themſelues) but in the Plaines alſo. Thus continued both the armies, oppoſed and incamped the one againſt the other, for the ſpace of ſixe daies. On the ſeuenth, when the enemy forſooke their trenches early in the morning, and placed themſelues in battell ray; Achab drew out his army and affronted them, and preſently charged them: where after a long and dangerous fight betweene them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them ſlaine in the chace. For ſome of them were intangled with their owne charriots, otherſome ſlew one another pell-mell; and ſome few of them found the meanes to flie vnto their city of Aphec, who periſhed likewiſe to the number of ſeuen and twentie thouſand (being ſlaine by the ruine of the walles that fell vpon them) beſides one hundreth thouſand men that gaue vp the ghoſt in that fight. But Adad attended by ſome of his faithfull friends, went and hid himſelfe in a certaine caue vnder the ground: who proteſting vnto him, and concluding amongſt themſelues, that the Kings of Iſrael were courteous and mercifull, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of ſuppliants they might be attired and ſent vnto him) Adad permitted them: Whereupon they incontinently preſented themſelues to Achab cloathed in ſackecloth, and hauing their neckes wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of ſuppliants amongſt the Syrians, telling him that Adad beſought his maieſty to grant him his life; promiſing on his behalfe, that from thencefoorth he would alwaies continue his ſeruant, and acknowledge his fauour. Achab anſwered them, that it highly contented him that their King was as yet aliue, and had eſcaped from the fury of the fight, offering him by them that good will and honor, which one brother ought to ſhew vnto another. After this they drew an oath from Achab, that he ſhould offer him no wrong, if ſo be he diſcouered himſelfe vnto him, and withall preſently reſorted vnto Adad; whom they drew out of the place where he was hidden, & afterwards brought him vnto Achab, who was mounted vpon a charriot. Adad proſtrated himſelfe before him: but Achab ſtretching out his hand, made him incontinently mount vp with him into his charriot, and kiſſed him, willing him to be of good courage, aſſuring him that hee ſhould receiue neither iniury nor iniuſtice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gaue him thanks, proteſting testing that during his life-time he would neuer be forgetfull of his fauors: promising him moreouer to restore vnto him those cities which his predecessors, Kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gaue him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as before-time his ancestors had the credit to repaire vnto Samaria.) When these accords were made & confirmed by oath, Achab gaue him many worthy presents, and sent him backe into his kingdome. Thus ended the war betwixt Adad and the King of the Israelites. After this, a certaine Prophet called Micheas, came vnto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him vpon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Istaelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, hee prophecied vnto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods Commandement, he should meet with a Lyon, which should rent him in pieces. Which comming to passe, according as it was foretold, the Prophet addressed himselfe againe vnto another, commanding him to doe the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound vp the wound and came vnto the King, telling him that he had beene in warre, and had receiued a prisoner in charge from his Captaines hands: and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) hee feared lest he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he had threatned no lesse. Achab answered him, that he was iustly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discouered his head, and made it knowne who he was. And to this intent vsed the Prophet this policy, that his words might be of greater force and value. For hee told the King that God would bend himselfe against him, because he had permitted the blasphemer Adad to depart vnpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slaine by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian army. The King displeased with the libertie and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison: and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home vnto his house.

Achab was reproued for dismissing Adad.

Chap. IX.

of Iosaphat King of Ierusalem.

The yeere of the world, 3042. before Christs Natiuity, 924.

HITHERTO haue we spoken of Achabs estate: but now I must returne vnto Iosaphat King of Ierusalem; who hauing inlarged his kingdome, & planted garrisons in those cities that were subiect vnto him (and in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Ieroboam raigned ouer the ten tribes. The King had perpetuall assistance and fauour at Gods hands, in that he was a iust and vertuous Prince, studying day & night for nothing more, then how he might please and honor God. The Kings his neighbors round about him honored him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent. In the third yeere of his raigne he assembled the Gouernors & Priests of his country, enioyning them to ride their circuit about the prouinces, and to teach the inhabitants of euery citie the Law of Moses, training them vp in the obseruance thereof, and in the study of pietie. Which all the Citizens imbraced and intertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and striue the one with the other, which of them should exceed the rest in the seruice of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loued Iosaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him euery yeere with sixe hundreth and threescore lambes, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of war and armes against the enemy. He mustered in the tribe of Iuda three hundred thousand men, ouer whom he placed Edraus Generall, & two hundred thousand vnder the conduct of Iohanan. Who besides these had two hundred thousand Archers on foot of the tribe of Beniamin. Another Chieftaine called Ochobat leuied and led for the King one hundred and fourescore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which hee sent into defenced cities.) Hee married his sonne Ioram to Athalia the daughter of Achab King of the ten tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab receiued him very courteously, and magnificently entertained his army with bread, wine, and flesh in all aboundance; requiring him to yeeld him his assistance against the King of Syria, to the intent he might recouer the city of Ramath in the country of Galaad, which Adads father had wonne and conquered from his father. Iosaphat promised to assist him: and being no waies inferiour vnto him in force, he sent his army from Ierusalem to Samaria. When these two Kings were departed out of the city, and each of them were seated vpon their thrones, they distributed their pay to euery one of their souldiers. At that time Iosaphat commanded, that if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to giue

CHAP. X.

ACHAB fighteth againſt the Syrians, and is ouercome and ſlaine in the battell.

HEREVPON Achab called for the prophets (who were in number foure hundreth)and commanded them to enquire of God, whether hee would giue him the victory in that battell which hee enterprized againſt Adad or no, and whether hee ſhould recouer the Citie which he intended to beſiege? Who anſwered and counſelled him to hazzard the battell,in that he ſhould haue the vpper hand ouer the Syrian,and ſhould take him priſoner as he had done beforetime. Ioſaphat vnderſtanding by their words that they were falſe prophets,asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God,who might more exactly certifie him of that which might ſucceed. Achab anſwered,that he had one as yet remaining,but that he hated him becauſe he prophecied nought elſe but miſ-hap & miſery vnto him,and had foretold him that if he ſhould fight againſt the Syrian,he ſhould be ouercome and ſlaine; and for that cauſe he held him at that time in priſon, ſignifying vnto him that his name was Micheas the ſonne of Imlah. Ioſaphat required that he might be brought into his preſence(which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas,that all the other prophets had prophecied to the King victory.)But Micheas told him that it was not lawfull for him to lie againſt God,but that it concerned him to ſpeake that which God ſhould informe him of,concerning the King. As ſoone as he came before Achab,and was adiured to ſpeake the truth,he ſaid that God had ſhewed him the Iſraelites put to flight,and diſperſed by the Syrians, that purſued them no otherwiſe then ſheepe without their ſhepheard. All which ſignifieth no leſſe (ſaid he) but that the reſt of the people returning home in ſafetie, Achab onely ſhould be ſlaine in the battell. When Micheas had ſpoken after this manner; Achab turning himſelfe towards Ioſaphat,ſaid vnto him,I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards mee. But Micheas conſtantly auowed,that he prophecied nothing but that which God had commanded him to ſpeake, aſſuring Achab that he was ſollicited by the falſe prophets vnto warre vnder hope of victory,whereas he ſhould aſſuredly periſh in the battell. Theſe words of his made Achab much diſcomforted. But Sedechias one of the falſe prophets ſtepped forth, and exhorted him to ſet light by Micheas words, the rather for that hee ſpake vntruly. And in confirmation of this his allegation hee alleadged Elias, (who was a farre more skilfull Prophet in foretelling things to come, then Micheas was) yet that the ſame Elias had foretold that the dogs ſhould lick Achabs blood in the citie of Iezrael in the field of Naboth, becauſe Naboth had beene ſtoned to death by the inſtance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifeſtly,that ſince he contradicted a Prophet ſo excellent as he was,he lyed in ſaying that the King ſhould die within three daies. Moreouer (ſaid he)it ſhall appeare whether he be truly ſent from God or no,if as ſoone as he ſhall receiue a buffet from me,he cauſe my hand to wither,according as Iadon made Ieroboams hand ſhrinke,at ſuch time as he thought to apprehend him. For I thinke (ſaid he) O King,that thou art aſſuredly informed hereof: which ſaid, hee ſtrooke him, and for that no inconuenient fell vpon him,by reaſon of that his audacious attempt, Achab aſſured himſelfe,and recouered his courage,and forwardly ſet forth againſt the Aſſyrian army. For as it is to be ſuppoſed,the wil of God was of ſuch power,that it cauſed the falſe prophets to triumph ouer the true: which was the cauſe that the falſe prophets were truſted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained will might be fulfilled. But Sedechias made him yron hornes,and ſaid vnto Achab, that God by them ſignified vnto him that he ſhould ruinate all Syria. But Micheas prophecied to the contrary,that within very few daies Sedechias ſhould walke from caue to caue to hide himſelfe,and auoid the puniſhment of his falſhood. Achab diſpleaſed hereat,commanded that he ſhould be led thence,and kept priſoner with Achmon the Gouernour of the citie,yeelding him no other allowance but bread and water for his ſuſtenance. Thus marched theſe two Kings with their armies againſt Ramath which is in Galaad: which whē the King of Syria vnderſtood, he drew his army into the field, and came out to meet with them,and incamped neere vnto Ramath. Now was it concluded betwixt theſe two confederate Kings, that Achab ſhould enter the battell in a priuate habit, and Ioſaphat ſhould be inueſted with the royall ornaments, and ſupply

3.*Reg.*22.*al.*12. Achab and Ioſaphats war againſt the Syrians.

Achabs perſon in the battell, to the intent that Micheas prediction might be made fruſtrate. But notwithſtanding this popular diſguiſe, Gods iuſtice preuented him: For Adad King of Syria commanded his army, that they ſhould put no one of the enemie to the ſword, but onely the King of Iſrael.

The yeere of the world, 3047. before Chriſts birth, 917.

As ſoone as charge was giuen, the Syrians perceiuing Ioſaphat in the front of the army, and coniecturing that it was Achab, they made head altogether againſt him, and hauing inuironed and preſſed him very neerely, they perceiued that it was not he: for which cauſe they retyred backe againe. But although they had fought from the morning vntill the euening, and had the vpper hand; yet ſlew they no man (becauſe they ſought after no other but Achab to put him to the ſword) whom notwithſtanding they could by no meanes meete withall. At length one of Adads ſeruants called Aman, ſhot at random amongſt the enemies, and by fortune hurt Achab in the breſt, and ſhot him thorow the lungs. This hurt of his concealed he from his ſouldiers, for feare leſt they ſhould be diſcomforted. For which cauſe hee commanded his Coachman to driue his Charriot out of the battell, for that he felt himſelfe grieuouſly and mortally wounded: and although he were terribly pained, yet ſate he in his Charriot vntill Sun-ſet; at which time his heart failed him, and he gaue vp the ghoſt. When night came, the Syrian army withdrew themſelues into their campe: and receiuing tidings by an Herauld, that Achab was dead, euery one retired home vnto his houſe: but Achabs body was conueyed to Samaria, and interred in that place. As for his charriot, it was waſhed in the fountaine of Iezrael, becauſe it had beene bebloodied, by reaſon of the Kings hurt: whereby the truth of Elias prediction was ratified, and confirmed: for the dogs lickt his blood; and from that time forward the common women continually waſhed themſelues in that fountaine. He dyed alſo in Ramath (according as Micheas had foreprophecied.) Whereas therefore all things befortuned Achab, according as two Prophets had foretold him, it appeareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Maieſtie of God in all places, and to reuerence his prophecies deliuered by them, and to aſcribe alwaies more credit vnto them, then to the vaine and plauſible ſpeech of ſuch as curry fauour; and no leſſe to reſpect them, then things of infinit profit, ſince by them we are diuinely admoniſhed what wee ought to take heed of. It behooueth vs alſo to conſider what force the ordinance of God is of, by examining thoſe things which befell Achab. For it is impoſſible to auoid the preordinance of God, notwithſtanding that men flatter and nouriſh themſelues with vaine hopes, which inueigle them ſo farre, that finally they are ouertaken in the ſnares thereof. For this careleſſe inconſideration was fatall to King Achab, in that he beleeued not his death which was foretold him; but being deceiued by the flattering perſwaſions of falſe prophets, ranne headlong vpon his owne danger and death. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Ochozias.

CHAP. I.

IORAM ACHABS sonne, ouercommeth the Moabites in battell.

The yeere of the world, 3048. before Christs Natiuitie, 916.

AS soone as King Iosaphat was returned backe againe to Ierusalem (from the warre wherein he had giuen succour to Achab against Adad the King of Syria, as we haue heretofore declared) the Prophet Iehu (in his returne) came forth and met him, and reproued him, becausse he had giuen Achab (who had bin a man both impious and wicked) his assistance, assuring him that God was displeased with that his confederacy; yet notwithstanding that he of his goodnesse had deliuered him from his enemies, although contrary vnto his dutie, he had demeaned himselfe vniustly. After this admonition, Iosaphat began to celebrate sacrifices, and to offer vp thankesgiuings and peace offerings vnto God: Which done, he rode in progresse and circuit round about those countries that were vnder his dominion, giuing order that the people should be instructed in those ordinances which were deliuered from God by the hands of Moses, and exhorted his subiects to the practice of piety, contained in the same. He planted Iudges likewise in euery city, cõmanding them to execute iustice vnto the people, without respect of any thing, but only iustice. He charged them likewise, that they should not be corrupted with rewards, or seduced by dignity, riches, or nobility, but that they should doe iustice indifferently vnto all men, knowing that God seeth all things, how secretly soeuer they be carried or contriued. Hauing in this sort ordered euery thing in each City of the two Tribes, he returned again into Ierusalem, where he likewise chose Iudges from amongst the Priests and Leuites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to giue vpright and exact iudgement. And if they of other cities had any causes of greater consequence (which should be referred to their finall determination) he charged them with earnest industry, to decide them with as vpright and iust measure as might be: for that it was very conuenient that the most exact and accomplished sentences should be deliuered in that City, whereas God had his Temple, and the King made his ordinary abode. Ouer all these he placed his two friends, Amasias the Priest, and Zabadias of the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did the King dispose of his estate.

4. Reg. 4. 2. Paral. 19. 20. Iehu the Prophet reprehended Iosaphat for helping Achab. Iosaphat reneweth the true seruice of God. Iosaphat placed Iudges and Magistrates in euery City.

About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) assaulted and assembled themselues against him, and encamped themselues neere vnto Engaddi (a City situate neere vnto the lake Asphaltites, and distant from Ierusalem some three hundred stounds) in which place flourish those goodly & wholesome Palme-trees, whence distilleth the pure and perfect liquor of Balme. When Iosaphat had intelligence that the enemies had past the lake, and were already farre entred into his countrey, he was afraid, and assembled the people of Ierusalem in the Temple, and standing vpright, and turning his face toward the propitiatorie, he besought and requested God that he would giue him power and force to ouercome his enemies. For such had beene the forme of their supplication, who in times past builded the Temple: namely, that it might please him to fight for that City, and oppose himselfe against those that durst attempt or assault that place, to the intent to dispossesse them of that country which he himself had giuen them in possession; and in pronouncing this praier he wept: and all the people likewise, both men, women and children made their request vnto God. Presently vpon this, a certaine Prophet called Iaziel arose vp in the midst of the congregation, and cryed out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their praiers, & promised them to fight for them against their enemies, enioyning them the next day to sally out in armes, and go & make head against their aduersaries, whom they should encounter in the mountaine taine ſituate betwixt Ieruſalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillocke of Sis (which place in Hebrew ſignifieth Eminency) willing them not to fight againſt them, but onely to arreſt in that place, and ſee how God would fight and make warre for them. When the Prophet had ſpoken theſe words, the King and all the people proſtrated themſelues vpon their faces, giuing thanks vnto God and adoring: meane while the Leuites ſung continuall hymnes, with inſtruments and voices. About the beginning of the day, the King departed into the deſart that is vnder the city of Thecoa, aduiſing the people to beleeue all that which the Prophet had ſaid vnto them, and not to arrange themſelues in battell ray: he commanded the Prieſts to march before them with their Trumpets, and the Leuites that they ſhould ſing hymnes and thankſgiuing vnto God, as if (ſaid he) our countrey were already deliuered from our enemies.

The manner and weapons whereby Ioſaphat ouercame his enemies.

This aduice of the Kings ſeemed pleaſing vnto them al; ſo that they performed whatſoeuer he counſelled them. But God ſent a great terror & diſorder among the Barbarians: ſo that ſuppoſing themſelues to be enemies the one againſt the other, they ſlew one another in ſuch ſort, that of ſo great & huge an hoſt, there was not one that eſcaped. But Ioſaphat looking down into the valley (wherin the enemies had pitcht their tents) and ſeeing it full of dead men, reioyced greatly at the vnexpected ſuccors that God had ſent him, who had giuen them the victory, not by the dint of their owne ſwords, but by his prouidence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies camp, and to ſpoile the dead; & ſo great was the multitude of them that were ſlaine, that ſcarcely they could gather the ſpoiles of them in three dayes ſpace. On the fourth day, the people aſſembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they bleſſed God for the power and ſuccours he had ſent them, by reaſon whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led backe his army into Ieruſalem, and for diuers daies he ſpent the time in offering ſacrifices and making feaſts. After this diſcomfiture of his enemies was publiſhed abroad in the eares of forrain nations, they were al of them afraid, ſuppoſing that God did manifeſtly expreſſe his power, and extend his fauour towards him. And from that time forwards, Ioſaphat liued in great glory, in iuſtice, and piety. He likewiſe was a friend to the King of Iſrael that raigned at that time, who was Achabs ſon, with whom he aduentured in a voyage by ſea, intending to traffique with certaine Merchants of Tharſis, but he had a great loſſe: for his ſhips were caſt away by reaſon, they were ouer-great; and for this cauſe he had neuer more mind to exerciſe nauigation. Hitherto haue we ſpoken of Ioſaphat King of Ieruſalem.

Ochozias Achabs ſonne king of Iſrael.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs ſonne, who raigned ouer Iſrael, and was reſident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and reſembled his father and mother euery way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Ieroboam in wickednes, who firſt fell from God, and made the Iſraelites reuolt from him. The tenth yeer of his raign, the King of the Moabites rebelled againſt him, and denied to pay him thoſe tributes which he was wont to pay vnto Achab his father. But it came to paſſe that as Ochozias aſcended the ſtaires of his palace, he fell downe from the top thereof: and being ſicke of the fall, he ſent to Accaron vnto the god called the Myiodis or Flie, to inquire whether he ſhould recouer that ſickneſſe or no. But the God of the Hebrewes appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to goe and meet thoſe meſſengers that were ſent by Ochozias, and to aske them if the people of the Iſraelites had not a God, but that the King ſent to forraine gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to returne and declare vnto their King, that he ſhould not eſcape that ſickneſſe. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the meſſengers of the King hauing vnderſtood that which was declared vnto them, returned backe againe with all expedition vnto him.

4. Reg. 1. Ochozias hauing a grieuous fall, ſeeketh to be informed of a falſe Oracle, and is reproued by Elias.

Ochozias maruailing much at their ſudden repaire, asked them the cauſe thereof: who anſwered him, that a certaine man came vnto them, who forbad them to paſſe any further, but to ſhorten their way, to let your Maieſtie know (ſaid they) from God, that your ſicknes ſhall waxe worſe and worſe. Hereupon the King commanded them to deſcribe what manner of man he was that ſpake theſe words vnto them: who anſwered, that he was a hairy man, girded with a leatherne belt. And vnderſtanding hereby that it was Elias, he ſent a Captaine with fiftie ſouldiers vnto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet priſoner vnto him. This Captaine that was ſent, perceiuing Elias ſitting on the top of a mountaine, commanded him to come downe and repaire vnto the King, who had ſent for him; which if he performed not preſently and willingly, hee threatned him to make him doe it perforce. Elias anſwered and ſaid vnto him, To the end thou maiſt know by thine owne experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heauen, and conſume both thee and thy ſouldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell downe from heauen, and conſumed both the Captaine and his ſouldiers.

Elias forme and habit.

Ochozias ſouldiers ſent to fetch Elias, are conſumed with lightning.

When

A When the King had tidings of this losse, he was sore displeased, and sent another Captain to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatned the Prophet that if he wold not willingly come downe, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias praied that fire might fall from heauen, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had vnderstanding likewise how his second messengers had sped, he sent a third vnto him, who being a discreet man, and courteous in condition, arriuing in the place where by chance Elias was, he saluted him very courteously, and said vnto him, that contrary to his owne will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the Kings pleasure, he was come vnto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command: He therB fore required him to haue compassion both of him and of his souldiers, and to vouchsafe to come downe, and to come after them vnto the King. Elias tooke pleasure in this his discreet and courteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as he came before the Kings presence, he prophecied, and told him that God said, that sith he had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had bin no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sicknes; but that he had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the successe of his sicknes: Know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophecy) he died in such manner as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Ioram succeeded him in the Kingdome, because he departed without issue.

This Ioram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the seruice C of the true God, he restored strange gods. In al things else he was a man of execution. In his time Elias was no more seen amongst men, and vntill this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a disciple behind him called Elizeus (as we haue heretofore declared.) It is written in holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath knowne of their deaths. After that Ioram had taken possession of the Kingdome, he resolued to make war vpon Misa the King of the Moabites (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheepe bearing wooll.) When as therefore he had assembled his forces, he sent vnto Iosaphat, requiring him that sith he had been his fathers friend, he would likewise second and send him aide in his intended warre against the Moabites, who had as then newly reuolted from his gouernment. Iosaphat not onely promised him to yeeld him succours, D but moreouer he assured him that he would draw the king of Idumæa (who was his subiect) into their association. When Ioram vnderstood these things by those whom he had sent vnto Iosaphat, he tooke his army with him and repaired to Ierusalem, where he was magnificently receiued and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the desart of Idumæa, and that way to charge the enemy (in that they expected nothing lesse then to bee endangered on that side) these three Kings departed together from Ierusalem, namely, the King of Ierusalem, the King of Samaria, and the King of Idumæa. Now when they had marched some seuen daies iourney, they found a great scarcity of water amongst them, both to water their horses, & to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especiall Ioram, who by reason of the necessity E wherewith he was pressed, cried vnto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his hee would betray three such Kings as were there present, into the hands of the king of Moab without stroke strooken. But Iosaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the armie to know whether there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battell, to the intent (said he) that we may vnderstand by God what we ought to doe: and whereas one of the seruants of Ioram said, that he had seene Elizeus the sonne of Saphat, the disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the sollicitation of Iosaphat) resorted vnto him. Now when they drew neere vnto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the army? and Ioram in especiall questioned with him. To whom Elizeus answered, that he had no reason to sollicite him in this sort, but to repaire vnto his fathers and mothers prophets, who would certifie him the truth. Notwithstanding, Ioram intreated him F that he would prophecy, and continue the preseruation of the army, and the defence of his life: but Elizeus sware by the liuing God, that he would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an vpright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling vnto them a certaine man that could cunningly play vpon instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilst he sung, Elizeus was rauished with a diuine spirit, and enioyned the Kings to make certain trenches in the channell of the riuer: for (said hee) you shall see the riuer full of water without either winde, cloud, or raine: so that both the whole Army and all their Cattell shall be saued, and and ſufficiently ſuſtained: and God wil not onely beſtow theſe benefits on you, but will giue you the vpper hand of your enemies alſo; and you ſhall ſurprize the faireſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of the Moabites; and you ſhall cut downe their trees, ruinate their countrey, and fill vp their fountaines and riuers. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, the next day before Sun-riſe the riuer flowed aboundantly with water: for ſome three daies iourney off, God had ſuffered a very ſtrong and ſettled raine to fall in Idumæa; ſo that both the ſouldiers and their horſes were ſufficiently refreſhed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three Kings came out againſt them, and tooke their way thorow the deſart, their King preſently aſſembled his army, and commanded them to keepe the paſſages of the mountaines, to the end they might hinder the enemy from entring their countrey vnawares. Who beholding about the Sunne-riſe, that the water of the riuer was blood red (for at that time it aroſe in the countrey of Moab, and at this houre the water is red) they conceiued a falſe opinion, that the three Kings being preſſed by thirſt, had ſlaine one another, and that the riuer flowed with their blood. Being in this ſort ſeduced with this imagination, they beſought the King to giue them leaue to gather their enemies ſpoiles: which when they had obtained, they altogether conſiderately marched forth as if to a prey already prepared for them, and came vnto the Kings camps vnder hope to finde no man to reſiſt them. But their hope deceiued them: for their enemies enuironed them round about, and ſome of them were cut in pieces, the reſt turned backe and fled towards their owne countrey, and the three Kings entring into the territories of the Moabites, deſtroyed their Cities, pillaged the champaine countrey, disfigured their incloſures, filling them with ſtones and mud taken out of the riuer, cut downe their faireſt trees, ſtopped vp the ſources of their waters, and leuelled their walles with the ground. The King of the Moabites himſelfe, ſeeing himſelfe purſued and beſieged, and that his Citie was in danger to be taken perforce, ſallied out very valiantly with ſeuen hundred men, hoping by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, to breake thorow the Iſraelites campe on that ſide where he thought it was leaſt defenced. Which when he had attempted and could not execute, becauſe he charged on that ſide which was beſt defended, hee returned backe againe into the Citie, and committed a deſperate and hatefull action: for he tooke his eldeſt ſonne, who ought in right to ſucceed him in the kingdome, and ſet him on the wall of the Citie, and in the ſight of all his enemies offered him for a burnt ſacrifice vnto God. The Kings beholding this wofull ſpectacle, were mooued with compaſſion of his neceſſity, and ouercome with humanitie and mercy, left the ſiege, and returned backe againe into their countries. After that Ioſaphat was returned into Ieruſalem, he enioyed a peaceable gouernment, but liued not long time after this exploit, but died when he was threeſcore yeeres old, in the fiue and twentieth yeere of his raigne, and was magnificently buried in Ieruſalem, according as the ſucceſſour of Dauids vertue and kingdome ought to be entombed.

The yeere of the world, 3050. before Christs Natiuitie, 914.

HE left behind him diuers children, the eldeſt of whom he appointed his ſucceſſor in the kingdome, who was called Ioram (as his vncle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs ſonne whilome King of Iſrael.) The King of the ten tribes turning backe vnto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whoſe actiõs I will here recite, becauſe they are notable & deſerue to be regiſtred in writing, according as we haue gathered thẽ out of holy Scriptures. Obedias wife (who was ſometime ſteward of Achabs houſe) came vnto him & told him, that he was not ignorant that in that perſecution wherein Iezabel ſought to murther the Prophets, how her husband ſaued one hundreth of them, for whoſe priuate maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men; and that now being dead, his creditors ſtroue to draw both her & her children into ſeruitude. For which cauſe ſhe beſought him in conſideration of this act, to haue compaſſion on her husband, and to yeeld her ſome ſuccour. Hereon Elizeus asked her if ſhe had any thing in her houſe: who anſwered him, that ſhe had nothing but a very little oyle left her in an earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow diuers emptie veſſels of her neighbour: that done, he willed her to locke vp her doores, and to powre oyle into the veſſels, in that it was Gods pleaſure to fill them all. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the veſſels were found full, ſo as none of them were emptie: whereof when ſhe had certified the Prophet, he aduiſed her to go and deliuer her oyle, and pay her debts, and

By this meanes Elizeus discharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditors intended against her. He admonished Ioram likewise, by certaine messengers, that he should take heed of a certaine place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: by meanes of which admonition the King went not out on hunting. But Adad being sore displeased, because his ambushment was discouered, began to suspect his owne followers: whereupon calling vnto him his houshold seruants, hee maliciously tearmed them traitors; and furthermore threatned them with death, for that they had discouered a matter, which was only committed to their

Whereupon one of the assistants told him, that he ought not to conceiue that false opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discouered his intended ambush to cut off his enemy: but rather that hee ought to conceiue, that the Prophet Elizeus had discouered and discoursed all that which was intended against him. Whereupon hee sent out his souldiers with an expresse charge, to know in what City Elizeus made his ordinary aboad: who returning backe, brought him newes that he remained in Dothaim: For which cause Adad sent a great number of horsemen and charriots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the Citie by night, and laid watch round about the walles, that no man might escape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets seruant had notice hereof, and was aduertised that the enemies sought to surprize Elizeus, he fearefully hasted and discouered their intent to his master, who encoura-

At that time God hearing his prayer, presented to the Prophets seruants sight, a number of charriots, and horsemen that inuironed Elizeus; so that he laid his feare aside, and was assured when he perceiued these succours. That done, Elizeus besought God againe that he would blind his enemies eyes, and cause a thicke cloud to fall vpon them, to the end they might not discouer him. Which done, he presently thrust himselfe amongst the thickest of his enemies, demanding of them, whom they came to seeke for? They answered him that they sought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promised them to deliuer him into their hands, if so be they would come with

D him into the City where he was. They blinded in eyes, and depraued in vnderstanding by God, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Ioram to locke the gates, and to inuiron the Syrians with his souldiers. This performed, he prayed God that he would cleere the Syrians sight, and take away the cloud that obscured their eies, who being deliuered from their blindnesse, perceiued that they were in the midst of their enemies. Whereat being sore astonied, and vncertaine whence this diuine and vnexpected act had befallen them, King Ioram asked the Prophet whether he should kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbad him to doe so: for (said he) it is a iust and conuenient matter, that they who are taken by order of warre, should lose their life, but that they had done no euill vnto his countrey; but by Gods prouidence came thither without their

Ioram giuing credit to the Prophets words, entertained the Syrians magnificently and with great humanity, and sent them backe vnto Adad their King, to whom vpon their arriuall they declared all that which had hapned vnto them. Adad astonished at this vnexpected euent, and wondring at the apparition and power of the God of the Israelites; lastly admiring the Prophet whom God so wondrously assisted; he concluded from that time forward, neuer more to attempt the King of Israel in secret, because he feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open war against him, hoping to haue the vpper hand of his enemies, by meanes of the great number and force of his army: So that he issued out with a mighty power against Ioram; who supposing himselfe to be ouermatched by the Syrian army, locked himselfe vp within Samaria, putting his trust

F and confidence in the fortification and strength of the wals thereof. Adad hoping to surprize the city, if not by engins, at least wise by famine & default of things necessary, drew neer vnto Samaria to besiege it. But Ioram was so destitute of conuenient supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of victuals, an Asses head was sold in Samaria for eightie pieces of siluer, and a measure of pigeons dung at fiue pieces of siluer, which they vsed in stead of salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the King, then that hee feared lest some one constrained by famine, should deliuer or betray the City vnto the enemy. For which cause hee euery day walked the round round about the walls, and visited the Sentinels of the city, for feare lest any one should lye hid- G den within: and with all care and diligence he gaue order, that if any one had such a sinister intent, the meanes to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certaine woman cryed out vnto him, Haue mercy vpon me, O King; he incensed with wrath, and supposing that she asked him some meat, began to raile on her, telling her that he had neither grange nor presse whereby he might any wayes supply her necessity.

The woman answered him, that she had no neede thereof, and that she was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: Whereupon he commanded her to expresse and declare what shee required. Hereupon she said, that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbour and friend, that sith the H famine and scarcity was such, as they could find no redresse for the same, that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another euery day. As for my self (said she) I haue first of all strangled mine, and we haue both of vs yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt vs, and concealeth her child. Ioram was grieuously tormented to heare these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he deuised in his heart to put him to death, because he praied not vnto God to grant him meanes to escape those euils that inuironed them round about: so that he sent a man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himselfe with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the Kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house, he told them that Ioram the murtherers sonne sent a man to take away his head: but (said he) when as he that hath the matter in I charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend & stay at the gate; for the King will follow him, & will resort to me in his owne person, hauing altered his resolution: and they according as they were commanded, shut him out of the doores whom the King had sent. Ioram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceiued against the Prophet, and fearing lest he that had the commission to murther him should speedily execute the same, hasted himselfe all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and saue Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, for that he had not besought God to deliuer them from those many euils which they suffered; considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnesse, they were miserably consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day (about the same houre that the K King came vnto him) that he should haue so great aboundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicle, and a measure of flower for a sicle.

Ioram threateneth Elizeus death. 3 Reg. 7.

By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficultie to beleeue the Prophet, because that before-time they had beene ascertained by their experience of the truth of his prophecies; and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessitie and misery of the present was more patiently endured. But a certaine friend of the Kings, and the Gouernour of the third part of his army (on whose shoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to leane) spake vnto him after this manner: Prophet, thou tellest vs incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine downe heapes of barley & flowre from heauen, so cannot that which thou speakest come to passe. To whom the Prophet replyed: Thou L thy selfe (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt partake no part thereof. Which prediction of his had a most certaine effect, according as hereafter it appeareth.

3 Reg. 7.

It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie, should liue without the Citie walles, for feare lest their conuersation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreme famine that raigned within the City) they receiued no reliefe or sustenance out of the same, & whether they had licence to returne into the City, or whether they contained themselues in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine; decreed amongst themselues to submit themselues to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they spared them, they might liue; and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with lesse torture. Now hauing resol- M ued vpon this deliberation amongst themselues, they repaired by night vnto the enemies campe. At that time God began to terrifie and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their eares with a noise of charriots and armes, as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspicious and were so moued, that they forsooke their tents, and ranne vnto Adad, and told him that Ioram King of the Israelites had entertained the King of Egypt, & the King of the Iles for his confederates, whom he led out against them, & how already they had heard the noise of thē that approched to bid them the battell. Adad (whose eares were filled with no lesse rumor then those of the people)

people) was amated and amazed at their ſayings: ſo that all of them abandoned their campe, their horſes,beaſts of carriage,and riches,and betooke them to flight with diſorder & confuſion. Thoſe Lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies campe (and of whom wee haue heretofore made ſome mention)being neer vnto the camp,perceiued that there was great ſilence in the ſame,and no leſſe aboundance of all things: for which cauſe approching the ſame,and entring into a tent,they found no body therin:for which cauſe they fell to eating and drinking,and that done,to beare away a quantity of rayment,and gold which they hid without the camp. Afterward reſorting to another tent, they bare away likewiſe that which was therein, and did the like by foure others without any encountry or contradiction of any man:and coniecturing therby that the enemies were retired, they began to accuſe themſelues, becauſe they had not giuen notice thereof to Ioram,and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cauſe drawing neere vnto the walles of the City,they cried out vnto the watch, giuing them to vnderſtand in what eſtate they had found the enemies campe, who ſignified no leſſe to Ioramꝰ guard,ſo that at laſt it came vnto his eares. Whereupon he preſently ſent for his friends and Captains, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him ſuſpect ſome ſtratageme or ambuſh: for they (ſaid he) hauing loſt their hope to ſurprize vs by famine,are retired vnder an intent, that when we ſhall iſſue and fall a ſpoyling of their campe,they may come vpon vs, and kill vs; and afterwards take our city without any ſtroke ſtrooken. For which cauſe (ſaid he) I aduiſe you to keepe good guard within the City, and let this retreat of our enemies make vs the more conſiderate. Some one of his Councell praiſed this aduice of his,& allowed his foreſight,aduiſing him to ſend out two ſcouts vpon horſebacke,to ſearch euery quarter betwixt that and Iordan, to the end that if they ſhould be taken and ſlaine by the enemies ambuſhment,their fall might be a preſident to the whole army to ſtand vpon their guard (for feare leſt they ſhould be ſurprized in like manner:)vrging this for a concluſion, that the loſſe of two horſemen ſhould not be very great, ſince perhaps they might otherwaies haue beene cut off by famine. This aduice of his was allowed by the King,and ratified by his aſſiſtants:ſo that preſently there were two ſpies ſent out,who rode along without encountring any enemy; but they met with great quantity of victuals, and armes caſt away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away the more lightly. Which when the King vnderſtood, hee ſuffered the people to iſſue out, and ſpoile the campe, who recouered things of no ſmall value therein,but much gold and ſiluer,and troupes of all ſorts of cattell: and beſides that,they found ſo great a quantity of wheat and barley,that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they deliuered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was ſo great quantity of corne, that two meaſures of barley were ſold but for one ſicle,and a meaſure of wheat-flower for a ſicle;according as Elizeus had prophecied. Now the meaſure which we call Sat, containeth an Italian buſhell and the halfe. But the Captaine of the third part of the army,was he onely that enioyed no part of this benefit:for being appointed by the King to haue the keeping of the gate,and to reſtraine the multitude from headlong preſſing out, for feare leſt thruſting one another, ſome of them ſhould be trodden vnder foote and ſlaine,he himſelfe was trodden vpon and ſlaine (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he onely amongſt the reſt,would not giue credit to that which he had ſaid,as touching the great aboundance of victuals that ſhould happen.

The truth of Gods oracles. The puniſhment of increduility. 4. *King.*8.

When Adad King of the Syrians was ſafely returned to Damaſco, and knew that God had ſuffered ſuch a confuſion and feare to fall both on him and his army, and that it had not hapned by reaſon that the enemy ſallied out vpon him; he was ſore diſcouraged to ſee that God was ſo diſpleaſed with him, and through anguiſh and agony of minde fell ſicke: And for that (at that very time) Elizeus was come into Damaſco; Adad vnderſtanding thereof, ſent Azael (who was one of his moſt truſty ſeruants)vnto him,to preſent him,and conſult with him vpon his ſickneſſe,whether he ſhould recouer or no.

Hereupon Azael loaded forty Camels with the moſt faireſt and moſt honourableſt preſents, that either Damaſco, or the Princes royall Court affoorded; and repairing to Elizeus, ſaluted him very courteouſly,telling him that he was ſent vnto him by King Adad, firſt of all to preſent him, and afterwards to aske counſell of him as touching his malady, whether hee might eaſily be healed. The Prophet commanding the meſſenger to carry no euill tidings vnto the King,did notwithſtanding tell him that he ſhould die. Azael hearing thereof was ſore grieued,and Elizeus himſelfe began to weepe,ſo that the teares fell from his eyes aboundantly,in that he foreſaw how many euils the people ſhould ſuffer after the deceaſe of Adad. And when as Azael demandedhim the cauſe wherefore he was ſo diſcomforted;I weepe (ſaid he)for the compaſſion that I

haue of the people of Israel, by reason of those calamities which they shal indure by thy means. For thou shalt kill the better sort of them, and shalt burne their strongest cities: thou shalt murther their infants, and dash them against the stones, and shalt open the womens wombes that are with child. Azael answered, What force is there in me to execute these things? Elizeus said vnto him, that God had certified him that he should be King of Syria. When Azael was returned backe vnto Adad, hee signified nothing vnto him but glad tidings, as touching his sickenesse: but the next day he cast a wet net vpon him and strangled him, and seized the Kingdome into his owne hands. This Prince was a man of execution, and well beloued among the Syrians, and common people of Damasco, who euen vntill this day honour Adad and Azael his successour as gods, by reason of their benefits and those Temples which were builded by them, which adorne the Citie of Damasco. For euery day doe they celebrate feasts in memory of these Kings, and honour of them, by reason of their antiquitie, not knowing that they were moderne, and such as raigned not past eleuen hundreth yeeres since. But Ioram King of Israel hearing of the death of Adad, began to giue ouer his feare, and cast off that suspicion which he had conceiued of him, reioycing that yet at last he might haue libertie to liue in peace. The other Ioram King of Ierusalem (for he likewise was so called, as we haue heretofore declared) by murthering of his brethren and his fathers friends, who were Gouernours, obtained the kingdome, and became so wicked and impious, as hee differed in nothing from the Kings of Israel, who transgressed the first lawes and ordinances of the Hebrewes, and peruerted the seruice of God. For Athalia Achabs daughter his wife taught him to execute diuers mischiefes, and amongst the rest to adore strange gods. This notwithstanding God would not altogether abolish his race, by reason of his promise made vnto Dauid: yet intermitted hee not daily to introduce new impieties; and soile the ancient lawes of his forefathers with new corruptions. Meane-while, it came to passe that the Idumæans reuolted and slue their King, who had beene before-time subiect vnto *Iosaphat Ioram*s father, and in his place established another to their owne liking. For which cause Ioram inuaded Idumæa by night with his horses and charriots, and spoyled the countrey round about his kingdome, without passing any farther: yet profited he nothing in so doing; for all of them reuolted from him, and amongst the rest the inhabitants of the countrey of Labina.

But so great was the fury of this man, that hee constrained the people to ascend the high mountaines, and adore strange gods. Yet whilest hee behaued himselfe in this manner, and vtterly rooted out of his thought the lawes of his forefathers, there was a Letter brought vnto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified him that God would doe great iustice vpon him, because hee had forsaken the waies of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the Kings of Israel, constraining the Tribe of Iuda and the inhabitants of Ierusalem to forsake the pure seruice of their God, to serue Idols, as Achab had constrained the Israelites to doe: Furthermore, because he had murthered his brethren, and slaine vpright and vertuous men. The Prophet likewise certified him by Letters, what punishment he should endure, namely, the ruine of his people, the death of his wiues and children, and lastly his owne death: which should happen vnto him by a sickenesse in his belly, wherewith hee should bee so tormented, that his entrailes strangely rotting within him, should drop out of his belly, and that he himselfe should see his misery, which should be such as neither might be recouered by medicine, or should euer leaue him vntill hee had finished his dayes. These things did Elias denounce vnto him by his Letters.

After this aduersitie, he himselfe was strooken with a long sicknes, according as the Prophet had foretold him; for God powred his displeasure vpon his entrailes: whereupon he died miserably, seeing them fall out of his belly. The people likewise handled his body ignominiously; supposing, I thinke, that beeing cut off in that sort by Gods displeasure

Chap. IIII.

The King of Damasco warreth against the King of Israel.

Ioram King of Israel, hoping after the death of Adad to recouer Ramath in Galaad from the Assyrians, after he had made greater preparation and apparation for the war, he led his army against the same. In this siege he was hurt by an arrow which was shot by a certaine Syrian, but not vnto the death, and retired himselfe into the Citie of Iezrael, vntill he were recouered of his wounds (leauing behind him his whole army at the siege of Ramath, vnder the conduct of Iehu the sonne of Nimsi, who tooke the Citie by force) intending vpon his recouery to make warre against the Syrians. But the Prophet Elizeus sent one of his disciples to Ramath, and gaue him the holy oyle, and willed him to anoint Iehu, and to say vnto him that God had chosen and anointed him for King: and after he had informed him likewise in certaine other instructions, he commanded him to depart after the manner of one that flieth, making no man priuy of his departure. When this disciple of his came vnto the appointed Citie, he found Iehu sitting in the midst of the Captaines at warre (according as Elizeus had told him) and drawing neere vnto him, he told him that he would communicate certaine secrets with him, for which cause he arose and followed him into his chamber. Whereupon the young man taking out the oyle, powred it on his head, saying, that God had chosen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and reuenge the blood of the Prophets vniustly murthered by Iezabel: and that both he and his house might be brought to nought in like sort, as the sonnes of Ieroboam the sonne of Nabat, and the children of Basa were extinguished for their impietie; so that no one of the race of Achab might suruiue in the world. As soone as he had spoken thus, he issued out of the chamber with all speed, endeuouring that he might not be discouered by any of the army. Now when as Iehu was come out, he returned to his place where he sate with his Captaines, who demanded of him, and besought him to declare vnto them, wherefore the young man came vnto him (alledging that they supposed him to be out of his wits.) Truly (said he) you haue diuined well: for hee hath talked vnto mee after the manner of a mad man: wherein (they desirous to vnderstand wherefore he came, and beseeching him to expresse the cause) hee told them what he had said vnto him, namely, how God had chosen him to be King ouer the people.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 6. Iorams expedition against Ramath. 4. Reg. 9.

Iehu by Gods Commandement anointed King.

As soone as he had spoken these words, euery one of them cast off their garments and spred them before him, and sounding a trumpet, they proclaimed Iehu King; who assembling his army, determined to conduct them toward the Citie of Iezrael against Ioram (who lay there to recouer his wound which he had receiued at the siege of Ramath in Galaad, as we haue heretofore declared.) Thither also was resorted in the way of friendship and consanguinitie, Ochozias King of Ierusalem, both to visit Ioram, and to see how he was recouered of his wound: for hee was his nephew and sonne vnto his sister, as we haue said before. Iehu desirous to surprize Ioram and his followers on the sudden, made an ordinance, by which he prohibited that none of the souldiers should runne before to giue any intelligence of his repaire vnto Ioram; alledging that it should be a manifest demonstration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwise, they that did otherwise, declared that they held him not for their King.

The men of war were very ioyfull to execute this his ordinance, and guarded the waies, to the intent that no man might secretly steale into Iezrael, and beare tidings to the inhabitants of that which had hapned. Meane-while, Iehu attended by certaine of his choisest horsemen, and mounted in his owne person vpon a charriot, marched towards Iezrael. And when as he drew neere vnto the Citie, the Sentinell that was appointed by Ioram to discouer those that repaired to the Citie, perceiued Iehu resorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Ioram that a troupe of horsemen were at hand. Whereupon a Scout was sent out to discouer who they were; who drawing neere vnto Iehu, asked him what newes there was in the army, telling him that the King was desirous to know the same. Iehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The Sentinell perceiuing this, certified Ioram that the messenger whom he had sent, trouped along with them that came, and followed their Generall. Whereupon the King set out a messenger the second time; and Iehu commanded him to attend him as he did the first: which the Sentinell signified to Ioram likewise, who finally mounted his Charriot to goe out to meet them, accompanied with Ochozias King of Ierusalem, who (as wee haue said) was come into the city, to see how the King recouered vpon his hurt, because he was neerely allied vnto him. But Iehu marched on softly and in goodly array, till Ioram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did? Who in stead of answer, reuiled him bitterly, and called him the sonne of a poysoner and of a harlot. For which cause Ioram (fearing his turbulent spirit, and suspecting lest he hammered vpon some sinister intent) turned his backe, and fled away as swiftly as his charriot could be driuen; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprized by treason: but Iehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Ioram instantly fell vpon his knees, and died. Hereupon Iehu commanded Badac (who gouerned the third part of his army) to cast Iorams body into Naboths field, remembring him of the prophecy of Elias foretold by him to Achab, who murthered Naboth: namely, that he and his race should die in that field. For sitting behind Achabs charriot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophecied. When Ioram was fallen downe, Ochozias was afraid to be slaine: for which cause he turned his charriot to take another way, hoping that Iehu would not discouer him. But he was pursued and ouertaken in a certaine steepy way, and was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forsooke his charriot, and being mounted vpon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had beene searched and dressed some few daies, he deceased, and was carried to Ierusalem and buried there, after he had raigned one yeere, and surpassed his father in wickednesse.

A famous example of Gods iudgement.

AT such time as Iehu arriued at Iezrael, Iezabel being on the top of a tower in her princely robes, cryed out: O trusty seruant (said shee) that hath slaine his Master! Hee looking vpward, asked her what she was, commanding her to come downe vnto him: at length he charged her Eunuches to cast her downe from the top of the tower; who in her falling bebloodied the walles: and no sooner fell she vpon the ground, but that her body was trampled vnder the horses feete, vntill she died. That done, Iehu repaired to the Palace with his friends, and reposed himselfe therein, commanding his seruants that they should bury Iezabel (in respect of the royall race from whence she was descended) but they to whom the charge of the obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was deuoured by dogs. Iehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecy of Elias, who had foretold that Iezabel should die in that sort in Iezrael.

4 Reg. 10.

Now in that Achabs seuenty sonnes were brought vp in Samaria, Iehu sent two letters, the one vnto the Masters of the infants, the others to the Gouernours of the City, giuing them to vnderstand, that they should choose one of the most vertuous amongst Achabs children, to raign as King ouer them, because they had a multitude of strong chariots, horses, armour, men, and strong Cities; to the end that in so doing, they might take reuenge on those that slew their Lord and Master. (This did he vnder a colour to sound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the Gouernours and Tutors had receiued these letters, they were afraid, & made account that they could preuaile nothing against him, who had preuailed already against two mighty Kings. For which cause they wrote backe vnto him, acknowledging him for their Soueraigne; and offering themselues in all dutie, to be vnder his subiection. Whereupon Iehu sent backe vnto them againe, commanding them, that (to expresse their obedience) they should send him the heads of Achabs children, diuided from their shoulders. Which command of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed vp the heads in panniers, and sent them vnto him to Iezrael. As soone as they were brought thither, tidings thereof was carried to Iehu, as he sate at supper with his friends, who cõmanded that they should be laid in two heapes, at the city gates on either side thereof. Which done, he issued out as soone as it was day, to see them; and beholding them, hee began to tell thoſe that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily armed himſelf againſt his maſter, and ſlew him: but as touching thoſe whom they ſaw there, he had no waies laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men ſhould know, that all that which hapned vnto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God, and that his houſe was deſtroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had ſlain and diſpatched both theſe and all thoſe that were found to be of Achabs race amongſt the Iſraelites, he went vnto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias houſhold ſeruants (who was King of Ieruſalem) he asked them whither they went? who anſwered him, that they went to ſalute Ioram and their king Ochozias (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them ſlaine.) Hereupon Iehu commanded his ſeruants to lay hands on them, and put them to the ſword, notwithſtanding they were forty two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Ionadab (who in times paſt had beene his ancient friend) who embracing him, praiſed his forwardneſſe, in that he had performed all things according to the will of God, in aboliſhing Achabs houſe. Iehu cauſed him to mount vp with him in his charriot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him that he ſhould well perceiue, that he would ſpare no one wicked man, but would puniſh all the falſe prophets, and tellers of lies, and abuſers of the people, who had made them forſake the true ſeruice of God, and adore ſtrange gods: becauſe the moſt laudable and allowed ſpectacle that might encounter a good mans eie, was, to ſee the puniſhment of the wicked. Ionadab perſwaded by theſe words, mounted vp into his charriot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Iehu had ſought out Achabs kinred, he put them to death: and intending that no one of his falſe prophets and prieſts ſhould eſcape his hands, he aſſembled them together by a ſubtill policy. For gathering the people together, he proteſted that he would haue twice as many gods as Achab had had: willing that all the prieſts and miniſters that belonged vnto them, ſhould preſent themſelues, for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent ſacrifices to Achabs gods; proteſting that whatſoeuer prieſt ſhould be abſent, hee ſhould loſe his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Hauing in this ſort aſſigned a day wherin he would offer ſacrifice, he ſent thorow all the countrey of Iſrael, charging all Baals prieſts to repaire vnto him, and commanding that each of them might haue their veſtments giuen them. As ſoone as they were apparelled, he reſorted to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Ionadab, and commanded that a ſearch ſhould be made amongſt them, to eſpie whether any one of contrary quality or condition were meddled with them; for that he intended that no ſtranger ſhould be amongſt the prieſts. When as therefore he vnderſtood that none but the prieſts were in that aſſembly, euen at ſuch time as they began to offer ſacrifice, hee cauſed them to be inclozed by foureſcore ſouldiers (whom he eſteemed to be moſt truſty) whom he commanded to kil the falſe prophets, and to puniſh them according to the cuſtome of their forefathers, which had already too long time beene neglected; dreadfully threatning all thoſe, who ſhould any waies intermit to roote out the name and memory of theſe wretches out of the world. They therefore ſlew all theſe prieſts, and inuironed the Kings Palace; and in ſo doing cleered Samaria of forraine gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he aſſigned prieſts, and honoured him with all ſorts of ſacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Iehu ſuffered the Iſraelites to adore golden calues. When this execution was performed in puniſhing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Iehu by his Prophet, that his children ſhould obtaine the Kingdome of Iſrael to the fourth generation. This was Iehues eſtate.

Hedio & Ruffinus. chap. 7. 4 Reg. 11. Athalia rooteth out all the royall blood, onely Ioas Ochozi. as ſon is ſaued

ATHALIA Achabs daughter, hearing newes of the death of her brother Ioram, and her ſon Ochozias, together with the vtter ruine of all the royal poſterity, bethought her ſelfe to extinguiſh Dauids memory, and in ſuch ſort to root it out, that no one of that line ſhould remaine aliue to enioy the Kingdome hereafter: which when ſhe had concluded in her heart, ſhe began to put it in execution. Yet notwithſtanding one of Ochozias ſons eſcaped her bloody hands, by this meanes that inſueth. Ochozias had a ſiſter by his fathers ſide, whoſe name was Ioſabetha, who was married to Ioiada the high Prieſt; who entring into the Kings Palace, and finding Ioas at that time but one yeere of age, hidden with his nurſe amongſt the dead, ſhe tooke both him and his nurſe, and locked them vp in a clozet within the temple, where Ioiada her husband and ſhe did secretly nourish them for the space of fiue yeeres, during which time Athalia raigned in Ierusalem ouer the two Tribes.

Ioas by Ioiadas meanes, who was the High Priest, is created King.

About the seuenth yeere, Ioiada entred into discourse with fiue Centurions, and perswaded them to oppose themselues with mutuall consent against Athalias proceedings, and to assure the Kingdome to little Ioas. Whereupon giuing and receiuing faithfull promises of secrecy the one vnto the other, they confidently addressed themselues to execute their intended purposes, after this manner: They whom the High Priest had chosen to execute this act, went thorow all the country, and gathered the Priests and Leuites together, with all the Gouernours of the tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Ierusalem to the High Priest, who made them sweare an oath, that they would keepe secret that which he should enforme them of, as a thing that required silence, and men of execution to performe the same. As soone as he had assured them by oath, he brought forth the little childe whom he had nourished (who was of Dauids line) and said vnto them: Behold your King, who is of that race which (as you know) was chosen by God to raigne ouer you for euer: I therefore thinke it fit that the third part of your guard shall keepe him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the same. Another company shall haue the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the rest of the people, let them remaine disarmed within the Temple, and suffer no armed man to enter therein-to, except the Priest onely. Hee appointed also another company of Priests and Leuites to be about the King, with Iauelins, and drawn swords, charging them that whosoeuer durst be so bold to enter the temple armed, they should presently put him to the sword; and laying all feare aside, to attend the safety and guard of the Kings person. They being obedient to that which the high Priest had commanded them, in effect expressed their readinesse: whereupon Ioiada opening the Arcenall, (which in times past was prepared by Dauid) distributed amongst the Centurions, Leuites and Priests, all the iauelins, quiuers, and all other sort of armes that were therin, and disposed all them that were armed, round about the people, ioyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entring in amongst them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the Infant Ioas into the midst of the company, they set the royall Crowne on his head, and Ioiada, after he had anointed him with oyle, proclaimed him King: whereupon all the people reioyced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God saue the King.

The yeere of the world, 3067. before Christs Nativitie. 897.

Athalia hearing this noise and applause, beyond all hope, was grealy troubled, and with those souldiers which she had about her, she hastily issued out of the Palace, & arriuing in the Temple, the Priests admitted her: as for the rest of the men of war that followed her, they that by the high Priests ordinance circuited the Temple, would not suffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia saw the child standing before the Tabernacle with the royall Crowne on his head, she rent her garments, & storming through despite, she cried out and commanded that the traitor should be slaine, that had thus betrayed her and sought to dispossesse her of her Kingdome. But Ioiada called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out vnto the brooke Cedron, and there to kill her (because he would not permit that the Temple should be defiled with her cursed blood.) Moreouer he charged them, that if any one should attempt to rescue her, they should kil them likewise. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) tooke her, and led her without the gates of the Kings Mules, and there slew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Ioiada assembled the people and the men of warre in the Temple, binding them all by an oath, to yeeld the King their faithfull seruice, and to procure the prosperity and increase of his kingdome. Secondly, he made the King sweare in like maner, that he would maintaine the seruice of God, and in no manner disannull Moses lawes. That done, they ranne vnto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Ioram had built to the dishonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and leuelled it with the ground, and put to death their high Priest called Mathan. The charge and guard of the Temple, Ioiada committed to the Priests and Leuites, according to the order establisht by Dauid, with cõmandement twice a day to offer their ordinary burnt offerings, and consequently to make perfumes according to the law. He appointed also certaine of the Leuites to be porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no vncleane thing should enter the same vnespied: and after he had ordained these things, with the Centurions & Gouernors and with all the people, he tooke Ioas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace, and hauing placed him in his royall throne, all the people cried, God saue the King, and banquetted and feasted for diuers daies. Thus after the death of Athalia the citie was in quiet. Ioas was 7. yeeres old at such time as he was made King, his mother was called Sabia, & was of the towne Bersabe. He carefully obserued the lawes, & highly affected the

CHAP. VIII.

AZAEL King of Damasco leuyeth an army, and first of all assaulteth the Israelites, and after marcheth forward against Ierusalem.

B BVT Azael King of Syria making warre against the Israelites, and against their King Iehu, destroyed the countrey on the other side of Iordan, and all the Easterne tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manassites. Furthermore, he burnt and spoiled Galaad, and Bathanæa, violenting and outraging all those that he met withall. For Iehu went not out against him to resist him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a despiser of pietie, and his lawes) he died after he had raigned seuen and twenty yeeres ouer the Israelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Ioas his sonne to succeed him in his kingdome. But Ioas King of Ierusalem conceiued a certaine desire to renew the Temple: for which cause, calling vnto him Ioiada the high Priest, he commanded him to send thorow all the countrey the Leuites and Priests, and C to leuie vpon euery one of their heads halfe a sicle of siluer for the building and reparation of the Temple, which was falne to decay in Ioram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the high Priest would not obey him herein, knowing well that no man would willingly disburse money. But in the three and twentieth yeere of his raigne, the King sent both for Ioiada, and the Leuites also, and expostulated with them for disobeying his commandement, enioyning them from that time foorth to prouide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the high Priest vsed present dispatch in leuying the money, wherewith the people were highly contented. He therefore made a chest of wood closed on euery side (except that on the vpper lid thereof, there was a little cranie left open) which he placed neere vnto the Altar, commanding that euery one should offer according to his deuotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranny into the coffer, to be imployD ed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people shewed themselues affectionate: so that they gathered together a great quantitie of gold and siluer, with great zeale; and when the coffer was filled, it was emptied, and the account thereof taken & sum'd vp by the Secretary, and high Priest in the Kings presence, and afterwards was brought together into one assigned place: which order was obserued euery day. And when as it was supposed that there was sufficient money gathered, the high Priest Ioiada and King Ioas hired Masons, and Carpenters, and prepared great beames of excellent Timber.

The restoring of the Temple.

After that the Temple was repaired, they imployed the remainder of gold and siluer (which was of no small quantity) to make cups, pots, and vessels, and other vtensils: and euery day offered they sacrifice of great value vpon the Altar, and this custome was continued so long as Ioiada E liued. But after his decease (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth yeere of his age, after he had liued a iust and vpright life, & was interred in the sepulcher of Dauid in Ierusalem, because he had established the kingdome in Dauids posterity) King Ioas had no more care to serue God, and with him the rest of the Gouernours of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the lawes and ordinances, which they knew were very conuenient for them. For which cause God being prouoked by this change, and incensed against the King & the rest, sent his Prophets vnto them, to protest, to expostulate with them for their offences, & to withdraw them from their iniquity. But they pursued sin the more vehemently; so that neither the punishments, by which they, who had offended GOD before-times, had beene plagued, with all their posterities; neither all the aduertisements giuen them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend, or to forsake those F sins wherein they were engaged: but that which is worst; King Ioas stoned Zachary Ioiadas son, and put him to death in the Temple, forgetting himselfe most vngratefully of the benefits he had receiued by his father. And the occasiõ was, for that Zachary hauing receiued a charge from God to prophecy, came into the midst of the people, & counselled both them & him to follow iustice, foretelling them that they should be grieuously punished except they did beleeue. This Zachary did at his death call God to witnesse & iudge of those calamities he endured, in dying grieuously and violently for the good counsell which he had giuen them, and the benefits which his father had in times past done vnto Ioas. But many daies passed not, before the King suffred due punishment niſhment for theſe miſdeeds. For Azael King of the Syrians inuaded his countrey, and after he had firſt of all ruinated Girta, he marched forward with an intent to beſiege him at laſt in Ieruſalem. Ioas deſperate of all ſuccours, emptied all the treaſures of God, and thoſe of the Kings, and tooke away the preſents that were hung vp in the Temple, and ſent them to the Syrian, redeeming the ſiege by this meanes, leſt he ſhould be drawne into hazzard to loſe all. The Syrian pacified with ſuch and ſo great riches, and aboundant treaſure, ſuffered not his army to paſſe to Ieruſalem. After this, Ioas was ſeized with a grieuous ſickneſſe, and (to the intent that the death of Zachary the ſonne of Ioiada might not eſcape vnreuenged) his friends conſpired againſt him, and he dyed by their hands. He was entombed in Ieruſalem, but not in the ſepulcher of his anceſtors, becauſe he had falne from God: He liued ſeuen and forty yeeres.

AMASIAS King of Ieruſalem made warre againſt the Idumæans and Amalechites, and obtained the victory.

4. Reg. 14. Amaſias King of Ieruſalem.

AMASIAS his ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome. But in the 21. yeere of Ioas raigne, Ioachas, the ſonne of Iehu, tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Iſrael in Samaria, and was ſeized thereof for the ſpace of ſeuenteene yeeres. But he followed not his fathers ſteps, but rather behauing himſelfe impiouſly, according as his predeceſſors in the kingdome, and contemners of God had done: For which cauſe the King of Syria ſubdued him, and cut off a great part of his dominions, and tooke his greateſt cities from him, and defeated his armies: ſo that at length he had but ten thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen. All which hapned to the Iſraelites (according to the prophecy of Elizeus, which he foretold vnto Azael at ſuch time as he prophecied vnto him, that he ſhould raigne ouer the Syrians, and them of Damaſco, after that he had murthered his maſter. Ioachas being in this extremitie, had his recourſe to God in prayer and ſupplication, beſeeching him that it might pleaſe him to deliuer him from the hands of Azael, and not ſuffer him to be vnder ſubiection and thraldome vnto him.

The forces of Iſrael weakned and reſtored by God.

God (that reſpecteth the repentant, as if they had bin innocent, and that gently checketh thoſe whom he might vtterly exterminate, if he ſo pleaſed) gaue him aſſurance againſt the warre and danger, ſo that the countrey (hauing obtained peace) recouered preſently her former eſtate and proſperitie. When Ioachas was dead, his ſonne ſucceeded him in the gouernment, and began to raigne ouer the Iſraelites in Samaria, in the 37. yeere of Ioas King of Iuda. (For this King of Iſrael was called Ioas, as well as hee that raigned in Ieruſalem) hee gouerned the kingdome ſixteene yeeres. He was a good man, and had no correſpondence with his father in diſpoſition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell ſicke: to him reſorted the King of Iſrael to viſit him, and finding him in the extremitie, and paſt hope of recouery, hee began to weepe and lament himſelfe, calling him his father, and his armour, becauſe that during his life, he had neuer occaſion to vſe the ſword againſt the enemy; but that by meanes of his predictions, he had alwaies the vpper hand of them without ſtroke ſtriking: that now he departed this life, and left him diſarmed to the mercy of the Syrians, and other his enemies; ſo that he had neither ſecuritie of libertie, nor life, but that he rather wiſhed to die with him, then to liue in thoſe dangers.

Elizeus being mooued with theſe complaints, comforted the King that lamented in this ſort, and commanding him to draw his bowe that he had brought with him (for the King had bent the ſame) Elizeus ſaid vnto him, Draw: and he ſhot three arrowes, and gaue ouer at the fourth. Oh ſaid Elizeus, if thou hadſt ſhot more arrowes, thou hadſt vtterly ruinated the kingdome of the Syrians: and ſith thou haſt contented thy ſelfe with three ſhoots onely, thou ſhalt ouerthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou ſhalt fight againſt them, and ſhalt recouer the countrey they haue taken from thy father. After the King vnderſtood theſe things, he departed, (and not long after the Prophet died) who was renowned for his iuſtice, and manifeſtly beloued of GOD, who ſhewed miraculous and incredible workes by his prophecies, and ſuch and ſo worthy as the Hebrewes ought to keepe them in perpetuall remembrance, and was buried magnificently, according as it behooued a man, who was ſo highly fauoured by God as himſelfe.

Elizeus foretelleth that Ioas ſhould ouercome the Syrians thrice. Elizeus death & the raiſing of a dead man to life that was caſt into his tombe.

It chanced about that time, that certaine theeues hauing caſt the body of a man that was murthered by thē, vpon the body of the Prophet where he lay buried, the dead body returned to life. This is all that we haue to ſpeak as touching Elizeus, both in reſpect of his prophecies during his life time, as of that which hapned after his death, in witneſſe of his diuine power. After the death of Azael King of Syria, Adad his ſonne obtained the kingdome, againſt whom Ioas King of Iſrael made

After that Ioas had forſaken this world for another, the kingdome fell to Ieroboam his ſonne. The yeere of the world, 3103. before Chriſt's Natiuitie, 861.

CHAP. X.

AMASIAS making warre againſt IOAS King of Iſrael, is ouercome.

THE tenth yeere of the raigne of Ioas King of Iſrael, Amaſias raigned ouer the Tribe of Iuda in Ieruſalem: his mother was called Iudah, and was a citizen of Ieruſalem. Hee was wondrouſly carefull to maintaine iuſtice (notwithſtanding hee was very young.) And hauing taken vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome, hee reſolued with himſelfe, that hee ought firſt of all to reuenge the death of his father Ioas, who was traiterouſly ſlaine by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them all to the ſword (yet extended he not his diſpleaſure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the lawes of Moſes; which ſaith, that it is not lawfull to puniſh the children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards leuyed an army of the tribes of Iuda & Beniamin, and choſe the men that were in their flowring yeeres, and about twenty yeeres of age: the number of whom amounted to three hundred thouſand men, whom he diuided into Centuries. Hee ſent alſo to the King of Iſrael, and waged a hundred thouſand of his armed men for a hundred talents of ſiluer, becauſe hee intended to make war vpon the Amalechites, Idumæans, and Gabelites. Now whileſt he made this preparation, and was in a readines to vndertake this exploit; a certaine prophet counſelled him to diſmiſſe the Iſraelites that he had with him, becauſe they had no piety in them, ſignifying vnto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that war, he ſhould be ouercome: and contrariwiſe, that he ſhould haue the vpper hand ouer his enemies, if he fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Hereupon the King was ſore mooued (becauſe hee had already payed the Iſraelites their wages) but the Prophet ceaſed not to exhort him to doe that which was pleaſant in Gods ſight, who would giue him ſiluer in aboundance. For this cauſe hee diſmiſſed them, telling them that he freely gaue them their pay; and hee with the forces of his kingdome marched out againſt thoſe nations, and fought with them, and ouercame them, and ſlew ten thouſand of them, and tooke no leſſe number of priſoners aliue (whom he afterwards cauſed to be led to a high rocke that bounded vpon Arabia, and from thence caſt them downe headlong) and from all theſe nations he recouered a great bootie, and brought home much riches.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. Amaſias King of Ieruſalem. 4 Reg. 14. Deut. 24. The yeere of the world, 3106. before the Natiuitie of Chriſt, 858. The diſmiſſion of the Iſraelites. 2. Paral. 25. Amaſias victory ouer the Amalechites.

Whileſt Amaſias ſtood vpon theſe tearmes, the Iſraelites (that had taken wages of him, and were caſhired by him) conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt him, ſuppoſing themſelues to be iniured by him, as if he had diſmiſſed them for men of ſmal reſolution. For which cauſe they inuaded his countrey, and ſpoiled it as farre as Bethſemer, and carried away a great quantity of cattell, and ſlew three thouſand men. This victory and proſperitie made Amaſias proud, ſo that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof, and continued the honor of thoſe gods which he brought from the countrey of the Amalechites. For which cauſe a Prophet came vnto him and ſaid, that he wondred that he ſhould eſteeme them for gods, who had ſo little auailed them who honored them, and had deliuered them into his hands; ſo that diuers of them were put to death, and diuers led away priſoners, which they themſelues had brought vnto Ieruſalem, according to the cuſtome of war. Theſe words moued the King vnto diſpleaſure, ſo that he commanded the Prophet to ſilence, threatning him to puniſh him, if he intermedled with his affaires any more. Who anſwered him, that he would no further vrge him; yet withall he foreprophecied vnto him, that God would not ſuffer this his innouation to reſt vnpuniſhed. Anon after, Amaſias (not able to keepe a moderation amidſt his affluence & proſperity: but waxing more inſolent againſt almightie God, by whom he poſſeſſed the bleſſings he inioyed) in height of his pride wrote to Ioas King of Iſrael, commanding him and his to yeeld him homage, according as in times paſt the Iſraelites were ſubiect to Dauid and Salomon; threatning him, that if he refuſed to doe him voluntary ſeruice, he would enforce him to decide the different by armes: to whom the Iſraelite replyed thus: King Ioas to King Amaſias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres tree of great height, to whom a little thiſtle wrote, demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his ſon. But during this interparlee betwixt them, there came a certaine wild beaſt, that troad downe the thiſtle. Let this example admoniſh and diſſwade thee from attempting of too mighty matters, neither growing ing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, lest through thy presumption thou expose both thy life and fortune to the incertaine hazzard of warre. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more whetted vnto warre (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore he had drawne his army into the field, and both the armies were vpon the point to wage the battell, a sudden feare and discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias armie turne their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceiued) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Ioas threaten, that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Ierusalem to open their gates, and to receiue both him and his armie into the city, hee would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessity and feare of death) wrought so much as his enemies were receiued into Ierusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; and there-thorow Amasias was led captiue into Ierusalem. In this manner was Ioas made master of the City, who afterwards carried away the treasures of the Temple, and tooke away the gold and siluer that Amasias had in his Palace: and hauing in this sort ransomed him from captiuity, he returned backe againe into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth yeer of the raigne of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the Citie of Lachis, to auoide the conspiracy of his domesticall friends, by whom notwithstanding hee was surprized, and slaine by them that were sent to doe the deed: his body was brought and royally entombed in Ierusalem. Thus died Amasias for introducing inuocations in contempt of God; he liued fiftie foure yeeres, and raigned twenty and nine: his sonne Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

The yeere of the world, 3120. before Christs Nativitie. 844.

BVT in the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of Amasias, Ieroboam, Ioas sonne, began to raigne ouer the Israelites in Samaria, and enioyed the Kingdome for the space of fortie yeeres. This King dishonoured God, and offended him grieuously in obseruance of Idols, and diuers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped ten thousand mischiefes and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certaine Prophet called Ionas, who prophecied vnto him, that he should make war against the Syrians, and that he should ouercome them, and enlarge his kingdome to the Northward, as farre as the City of Amatha; and to the Southward as farre as the lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the countrey of Chanaan, according as the General Iosuah had confined them.) Ieroboam encouraged by this prophecy, led foorth his army against the Syrians, and spoiled all their country (according to the prophecy of Ionas.) And for that I haue promised to yeeld an exact history in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, me thinks it shall not be amisse to declare that, which I haue found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man (being commanded by God to repaire vnto the kingdome of Ninus, and to proclaime that which should happen to the city of Niniuie; namely, thar the gouernment therof should be abolished) through feare which he conceiued repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a city called Ioppa; where finding a shippe, he entred the same and sailed towards Tharsis in Cicilia. But there arose so vehement a tempest vpon the sea, that the vessell was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master, and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thankesgiuing vnto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Ionas hid himselfe, and couered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waues incensed by violent winds, increased more and more; the Mariners and passengers began to imagine amongst themselues, that some one of them in that Barke had caused that tempest: whereupon they agreed amongst themselues to cast lots, to know which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fell vpon Ionas: who being demanded whence he was, and for what businesse he trauelled: answered them, that he was an Hebrew by Nation, and a Prophet of the most high God; and counselled them, that if they would be warranted from that danger, they should cast him into the sea, because it was hee onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not performe that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impiety, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had beene committed to their trust. But for that the storme more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little of imminent shippewracke; and being besides that incited by Ionas himselfe, and whetted on

It is likewiſe ſaid, that being ſwallowed vp by a great fiſh (for the ſpace of three daies and three nights) he was at the laſt vomited out, and caſt by the ſame fiſh vpon the ſhore of the Euxine Sea aliue, and without any maime in any of his members. There beſought he GOD that hee would pardon him the ſinne which he had committed: and afterwards he reſorted to the Citie of Niniuie, where aſcending a place from whence he might bee heard, hee publiſhed with a loud voice vnto them, that they ſhould loſe the Empire of Aſia: which after he had pronounced, he returned backe againe. This recitall haue I made according as I haue found it regiſtred in writing.

King Ieroboam hauing paſſed all his life time in proſperitie, and raigned for the ſpace of forty yeeres, departed this life, and was intombed in Samaria, and Zachary his ſonne ſucceeded him in his kingdome. At the ſame time, Ozias the ſonne of Amaſias raigned in Ieruſalem ouer the two tribes, after that Ieroboam had already raigned foureteene yeeres; his mother was called Achia, and was of the City of Ieruſalem. He was a man of a good nature, and ſuch a one as loued iuſtice, of noble courage, and very laborious in prouiding for all occurrences: he made warre againſt the Philiſtines, and after that he had ouercome them in battell, he tooke Ita, and Amnia, two of their ſtrong forts, and raced them. This exploit done, he ſet vpon the Arabians that neighboured vpon Ægypt, and after that (hauing built a citie vpon the red Sea) he planted a garriſon therein. He afterwards diſcomfited the Ammonites, conſtraining them to pay him tribute, and ſubdued all as farre as the marſhes of Ægypt. After that, he began to prouide for the citie of Ieruſalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the walles thereof, that had beene beaten downe or decaied, either by continuance of time, or by the negligence of thoſe Kings who were his predeceſſors: he repaired thoſe alſo which the King of Iſrael had beaten downe, at ſuch time as hauing taken Amaſias priſoner, hee rode in triumph into the Citie. Beſides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fiftie cubits high. Theſe incloſed he with walles to ſet garriſons therein, and in diuers barren places he cauſed diuers fountaine heads to be made: for hee had an infinite multitude of beaſts of carriage and other cattell, in that the countrey was fit for paſture. He tooke pleaſure alſo in tillage, for which cauſe he was often buſied about his land, ſowing, and planting the ſame. He had about him a choſen army, to the number of three hundred and ſeuentie thouſand fighting men, whoſe Generals, Conductors, and Captaines, were valiant and inuincible men, and were in number two thouſand.

Ozias riches and army.

He taught his ſouldiers to march in a ſquare battell (inmanner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with ſwords, targets, and corſelets of braſſe, with arrowes and darts. Hee made alſo great preparation of diuers engins to batter Cities, and to ſhoot ſtones and darts, beſides diuers hookes, and other ſuch like inſtruments. But whileſt hee was intent on theſe ſtudies and preparations, he grew inſolent and proud, and being puffed vp with mortall arrogance, hee contemned the immortall force, which endureth for euer (which is pietie towards God, and the obſeruation of his commandements.) For which cauſe he was ouerthrowne by his proſperitie, and fell into his fathers ſins, through the happineſſe and greatneſſe of his eſtate, wherein he could not moderately containe himſelfe. So that vpon a certaine ſolemne feaſt day wherein all the people were aſſembled together, he attired himſelfe in the high Prieſts veſtments, and entred into the Temple to offer ſacrifice vnto God vpon the golden Altar; which notwithſtanding the high Prieſt Azarias (accompanied with foureſcore Prieſts) inhibited him the ſame, telling him that it was not lawfull for him to ſacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in thoſe that were of the poſteritie of the high Prieſt Aaron.

Ozias tranſgreſſeth his vocation, and is puniſhed with a leproſie, and compelled to depart out of the Citie.

Whileſt after this manner Azarias expoſtulated with him, commanding him to goe out of the Temple, and not to contradict the ordinances of God; the King waxed wroth, and threatned to take his life from him, except he kept himſelfe quiet. Whereupon there fell a great trembling and earth-quake, and the Temple cleft in twaine, and a great light of the Sunne entred thereinto, and reflected on the Kings face in ſuch manner, that all his body was inſtantly couered with a leproſie, and before the Citie (in a place called Eroge) the halfe of a mountaine (that ſtood to the Eaſtward) brake and fell, and rowled and remooued for the ſpace of foure ſtadia, towards the Orientall mountaine, where it reſted: ſo that the publike waies were ſhut vp, and choaked, and the Kings gardens of pleaſure were wholly ruinated & disfigured. When the Prieſts beheld the Kings face couered with a leproſie, they told him what inconuenient had hapned vnto him, and enioyned him to depart out of the towne, according to the cuſtome of men that were polluted. Whereupon he (wholly confuſed at ſo grieuous an accident, and hauing no more audacitie to ſpeake) obeyed obeyed the commandement that was giuen him, enduring a pittifull and lamentable puniſhment for being elate and proud more then became humanitie, and for that he committed ſuch impietie againſt God. He therefore remained without the Citie for a certaine time, and led a priuate life, and his ſonne Iotham ſucceeded him in the kingdome. Finally, he died through griefe and diſcontent, after he had accompliſhed threeſcore and eight yeeres, whereof he raigned fiftie two, and was onely buried in his garden.

Zacharias ſlaughter. 4. Reg. 35.

Zachary, Ieroboams ſonne, hauing raigned ſixe moneths ouer the Iſraelites, was ſlaine by Treaſon complotted againſt him by a familiar friend of his called Sellum, the ſonne of Iabes, who poſſeſſing the kingdome after him, enioyed not the ſame aboue thirtie daies. For the Generall Manahem, being at that time in the Citie of Tharſa, and vnderſtanding of that which had hapned to Zachary, departed thence with all his force, and came to Samaria, and in a battell which hee fought, he ſlew Sellum: And afterwards obtaining the Crowne, he went from thence towards the Citie of Tapſa, the inhabitants whereof locked & barred their gates againſt him, and would not receiue him: in reuenge whereof he ſpoiled all the countrey round about, and tooke the Citie by force, and (being highly incenſed againſt the Tapſians for their inſolence) he put them all to the ſword, not ſparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous crueltie in him.) Manahem raigned in this manner for the ſpace of ten yeeres, continuing a moſt cruell and vnbridled tyranny ouer the people. Afterwards being aſſailed by Phul King of the Syrians, hee went not out againſt him, neither practiſed to reſiſt him, but procured his peace for the ſum of a thouſand talents of ſiluer, which in way of compoſition he paid vnto him. The people furniſhed Manahem with this ſumme, in way of contribution, paying fiftie drachmes apiece.

Anon after he died, and was buried in Samaria, leauing behind him a ſonne to ſucceed him in the kingdome, whoſe name was Phaceias, who imitating his fathers crueltie, poſſeſſed the Soueraigntie but two yeeres: for he was ſlaine at a feaſt in the midſt of his friends, by a Treaſon practiſed againſt him by Phaceias the ſonne of Romelias, who inioyed the kingdome for the ſpace of 20. yeeres, addicting himſelfe to all impietie and wickedneſſe. But Teglaphalaſſer King of Aſſyria, led forth his army againſt the Iſraelites, and ſpoiled all the countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Iordan, and Galilee, Cydida and Aſor alſo, and led all the inhabitants thereof priſoners, and tranſported the kingdome to himſelfe. This is that which wee haue thought good to write as touching the King of Aſſyria.

Phaceias. The tranſlation of the Iſraelites.

Iotham the ſonne of Ozias raigned in Ieruſalem ouer the tribe of Iuda: he was the ſonne of a daughter of Ieruſalem called Ieresa. There was no vertue deficient in this King, for he was deuout towards God, iuſt towards men, and carefull to repaire the Citie: for he willingly imployed himſelfe in reſtoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built galleries and porches about the Temple, and repaired the walles that were falne downe: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he reſtored all that which was deficient in his kingdome. Hee made warre vpon the Ammonites; and ouercomming them in battell, he made all their nation tributary, and conſtrained them to pay him yeerely a hundred talents, and ten thouſand Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his kingdome in ſuch ſort increaſed, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the ſame time there liued a certaine Prophet called Naum, who prophecied the ouerthrow of the Aſſyrians, and of the Citie of Niniue, and ſpake to this effect. All the people thereof ſhall be toſſed and troubled, and be put to flight; and ſhall ſay the one vnto the other: Stay and abide, take gold and ſiluer, and there ſhall be none that will receiue it. For they ſhall haue more care to ſaue their bodies, then their goods: for there ſhall be a great debate amongſt them with lamentation: their members ſhall loſe their vigour, and their faces ſhall bee altogether ſwart through feare: where ſhall the repaire of Lyons be? or where ſhall the mother of Lyons whelpe reſt her? Niniue (God ſaith vnto thee) I will deſtroy thee, neither ſhall the Lyons that iſſue from thee, gouerne the world any more. To this effect did he prophecy, and ſpake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeate. For I haue omitted it purpoſely, becauſe I would not be troubleſome to the Readers. But all thoſe things which hee foreſpoke as touching Niniue, came to paſſe one hundred and fifteene yeeres after. But this is ſufficient for the manifeſtation of this matter.

RASIN King of Damaſco maketh warre againſt Ieruſalem: ACHAZ ſendeth for the King of Aſſyria to aſſiſt him.

AFTER that Iotham had liued one and forty yeeres, and raigned ſixteene, he died, and was buried in the ſepulcher of the Kings: after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his ſonne, who was a contemner of God, and a tranſgreſſour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himſelfe to the cuſtomes of the Kings of Iſrael: for he erected Altars in the Citie of Ieruſalem, and ſacrificed vnto idols, offering vp his owne ſonne vnto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated diuers ſuch like offences. During theſe impious idolatries of his, Raſin King of Syria and Damaſco, and Phaceias King of Iſrael made warre againſt him: (for theſe two were confederates) leading therefore both their armies againſt Ieruſalem, they beſieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reaſon the walles were very ſtrong. But the King of Syria hauing ſeized the Citie of Elath, neere vnto the red Sea, and ſlaine all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garriſons likewiſe to the ſword, and all the Iewes round about, and carried away with him a great bootie into Damaſco, and afterwards returned home with his army. The King of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding that the Syrians were retyred, and ſuppoſing himſelfe to be ſufficient to fight againſt the King of Iſrael, led foorth his forces againſt him, and was ouercome in battell (becauſe that God was incenſed againſt him for his wickedneſſes, which were both deteſtable and infinite.) For in that battell the Iſraelites ſlue about ſixeſcore thouſand men: amongſt whom was Zacharias the ſonne of Achaz, whom the Generall of the armie of the Iſraelites called Amias, ſlue, with Ericam the Gouernour of the whole Realme, and he tooke Elcan the Generall of the tribe of Iuda priſoner alſo. They led away likewiſe a great number of women, and children, with a great bootie, and afterwards returned vnto Samaria. At that time there was a certaine Prophet liuing in Samaria, whoſe name was Obel, who comming out to meet the armie, cryed with a loud voice vnto the people, that the victory which they had, did not happen vnto them through their valour, but by reaſon of the wrath of God conceiued againſt Achaz King of Iuda. He furthermore reprooued them, for that not contenting themſelues with the good hap of that victory, they had ſo farre preſumed as to hold them of Iuda and Beniamin priſoners, who were of their owne alliance: he therefore counſelled them to ſend them backe vnto their houſes, without any iniurie by vniuſtice offered vnto them, threatning them, that if they did the contrary, they might be aſſured that God would puniſh them.

After this admonition, the Iſraelites aſſembled themſelues together to conſult vpon this matter, at which time Barachias, one of the principall Gouernours of the ſtate, and three others with him alleadged, that it was not lawfull for the Citizens to lead their priſoners into the Citie, for feare (as they ſaid) that God ſhould vtterly extinguiſh them all. For thoſe ſinnes (ſaid they) which we haue already committed, and againſt which the Prophets haue exclaimed, are cauſe enough to incenſe God; ſo that we haue no cauſe to annexe new impieties to the precedent. When the ſouldiers heard theſe words, they permitted them to execute all that which they held conuenient to be done. For which cauſe the aboue-named tooke the priſoners, and diſcharged them, and entertained them courteouſly, and gaue them meanes and money to furniſh them in their iourney, and ſent them home without offence: and beſides that, theſe foure perſons conducted them onwards of their iourney, as farre as Iericho; and when they drew neere vnto Ieruſalem, they returned backe to Samaria.

WHEN King Achaz had receiued this ouerthrow by the Iſraelites, he ſent vnto Theglaphalaſar King of Aſſyria, requiring him to aſſiſt him in the warre, which he intended againſt the Iſraelites, Syrians and them of Damaſco; promiſing to giue him great ſums of money, and at that preſent alſo he ſent him very bountifull preſents. He wrought much miſchiefe likewiſe in the countrey of Iſrael, and led away a great number of priſoners from thence. After that the Syrians had beene ſubdued and weakned after this manner, Achaz tooke all the gold and ſiluer that was in the Kings treaſury, and in the Temple of God, and carried it vnto Damaſco, and gaue it to the King of Aſſyria, according to thoſe promiſes he had made him, and after much gratuity and thankeſgiuing, he returned backe againe to Ieruſalem.

Achaz giueth the gold and ſiluer of the Temple to the King of the Aſſyrians.

Achaz ſhutteth the dores of Gods Temple, and honoreth ſtrange gods.

This King was ſo ſenſeleſſe and ignorant of his owne profit, that although he were ouerpreſſed by warre by the Syrians, yet ceaſed he not to adore their gods, but perſiſted in their honour, as if he expected the victory by their meanes. And although he were ouercome againe, yet intended he the honour of the Aſſyrian gods; chooſing rather to reuerence any, then the true God, whom his forefathers worſhipped: Yea, ſo farre grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true pietie, that at length he ſhut vp the Temple gates, and prohibited the ordinary ſacrifices, hauing before that taken all the precious preſents out of the ſame. After hee had in this ſort committed theſe outrages againſt God, he died, when he was thirty and ſixe yeeres old; and after he had raigned ſixteene yeeres, and left his ſon Ezechias to ſucceed him in the kingdome. At that very time died Phaceias King of the Iſraelites, by the meanes of a certaine conſpiracy, which Oſeas his intended friend wrought againſt him: who held the kingdome for the ſpace of nine yeeres, ſhewing himſelfe both to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Againſt him Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria mooued warre, and ouercame him, becauſe God was not fauourable vnto him, neither aſſiſtant in his enterprizes: he was therefore ſubdued, and conſtrained to pay a certaine tribute impoſed vpon him. The fourth yeere of the raigne of Oſeas, Ezechias the ſonne of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Ieruſalem, raigned ouer the two tribes. He was a man of a vertuous diſpoſition, and one that loued iuſtice and piety: for as ſoone as he came vnto the kingdome, he reſolued with himſelfe firſt of all, that the chiefeſt and moſt neceſſary and moſt profitable thing that might be, was the eſtabliſhment of the ſeruice of God. When as therefore he aſſembled the people, the Prieſts, and the Leuites, he began to diſcourſe and deuiſe with them in theſe or ſuch like words. There „ is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irreuerent regard and „ ſeruice towards God, ye are falne into many and mightie calamities, becauſe through your ex„ treame madneſſe, you haue ſuffered your ſelues to be perſwaded to adore thoſe, whom he eſtee-„ med to be gods. Since therefore you haue learnt (to your owne miſery) how pernicious a thing „ impiety is, I exhort you, that (forgetting the ſame) you purifie both your ſelues, your Prieſts, and „ your Leuites from your former pollutions, that yet at length you may aſſemble together, and „ open the Temple, and cleanſe the ſame with ordinary ſacrifices, to the end it may be reſtored to „ the ancient honour which earſt it poſſeſſed: for by this meanes wee ſhall haue God fauourable vnto vs, when his wrath ſhall be appeaſed that was kindled againſt vs. As ſoone as the King had ſpoken after this manner; the Prieſts opened the Temple, and after they had gathered the ſacred veſſels, and caſt all vncleanneſſe out of the ſame, they offered ſacrifice vpon the Altar, according to the cuſtome. Afterwards the King ſent to all the prouinces vnder his dominion, and gathered together the people of Ieruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of vnleauened bread (which had beene intermitted a long time through the impietie of the Kings his predeceſſors.) Hee ſent alſo vnto the Iſraelites, exhorting them to forſake the cuſtomes which of long time they had wickedly obſerued, and to returne to the true and ancient manner of ſeruing God, certifying them that he would permit them to repaire to Ieruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of vnleauened bread, promiſing them that hee himſelfe would ſolemnize the ſame with them alſo: proteſting that hee did this, not in reſpect of his owne profit, but through the deſire hee had to further their felicitie, who ſhould be happy, if they obeyed this his counſell.

Ezechias Embaſſadours, that were ſent to the Iſraelites to exhort them to celebrate the feaſt of vnleauened bread, are ſlain by them.

2 Paral. 29.30.

The Word of God is neuer without fruit.

When Ezechias Embaſſadours came vnto the Iſraelites, and had deliuered vnto them the meſſage that they had in charge: ſo farre were they from conformity, that they mocked them, and eſteemed them to be mad, and ſpit vpon thoſe Prophets that exhorted them to pietie, and foretold them the euils they ſhould ſuffer, vnleſſe they ſubſcribed to the ſeruice of God; and finally they laid hold on them, and put them to the ſword. And not contenting themſelues with this preſumption, they attempted yet farre worſer things, and neuer gaue ouer vntill that God (in puniſhment of their impiety) made them ſubiects vnder the hands of their enemies, as ſhall appeare manifeſtly hereafter: But diuers of the tribes of Manaſſe, Zabulon, and Iſſachar (reſpecting the good counſels of the Prophets) ſubmitted themſelues to the ſeruice of God, and repaired altogether to Ieruſalem to King Ezechias to honour God. As ſoone as they were arriued there,

Ezechias

Ezechias aſcended into the Temple, accompanied with the gouernours and all the people, and offered there ſeuen Bulles, ſeuen Rams, and as many Goates: and after that hee and all the gouernours had laid their hands vpon the heads of the ſacrifice, they deliuered them to the Prieſt, according as it appertained to them, and they ſacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Leuites alſo (aſſiſting round about with inſtruments of Muſicke) ſung Hymnes and Songs vnto God, according as they had beene taught by the ordinance of Dauid. The other Prieſts had Trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their Hymnes. Which done, the King & all the people caſt themſelues proſtrate vpon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards ſacrificed ſeuen oxen, a hundred ſheepe, and two hundreth lambes. The King likewiſe beſtowed ſixe hundreth oxen, and three thouſand ſheepe vpon the people to feaſt withall. And when as the Prieſts had ioyfully performed all things (according to the cuſtome contained in the law) the King tooke great pleaſure and banquetted with the people, giuing thanks vnto God. And when the feaſt of vnleauened bread was come, they ſacrificed the Paſſeouer, and during the ſeuen other daies, they offered vp their other ſacrifices. The King gaue in way of gratuitie vnto the people (beſides that which had beene offered) two thouſand oxen, and ſeuen thouſand ſheepe. The Gouernours did the like, and gaue the people a thouſand bulles, and one thouſand foure hundreth ſheepe: and thus was the feaſt ſolemnized, which had not beene ſo magnificently and deuoutly celebrated ſince Salomons time. When the ſolemnitie of this feaſt was paſt, they iourneyed and went thorow the countrey, and purified it. They purged the Citie likewiſe of all vncleanneſſe of idols, and the King ordained that the daily ſacrifices ſhould be made according to the law, vpon his charge. He enacted alſo that the people ſhould pay the tenths to the Prieſts and Leuites, with the firſt fruits, to the intent they might wholly intend pietie, and neuer eſtrange themſelues from the ſeruice of God. By which meanes it came to paſſe, that the people brought all kinde of fruit to the Prieſts and Leuites: which the King put vp in certaine ſtore-houſes, which he had built, to be diſtributed to euery one of them, their wiues, and children, and by this meanes they returned againe to their former puritie in religion. After the King had diſpoſed all things in this ſort, he made warre vpon the Philiſtines, and ouercame them, and ſeized all their Cities (betweene Gaza, and Geth.) About this time the King of Aſſyria ſent vnto him, and threatned him, that if hee would not pay him thoſe tributes which his father before him had paid vnto him, he would deſtroy all his countrey. Neuertheleſſe Ezechias ſet light by his threats, aſſuring himſelfe in that pietie and zeale he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Eſay, by whom he was exactly inſtructed as touching all thoſe things that were to ſucceed. And for this preſent it ſhall ſuffice that we haue ſpoken thus much of this King.

SALMANASAR ſlayeth the King of Iſrael, and leadeth the Iſraelites captiue into the countrey of Media.

WHEN tydings was brought to Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria, that the King of Iſrael had priuily ſent vnto Soan King of Ægypt, to requeſt his aſſiſtance in warre againſt the Aſſyrian, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and drew forth his army againſt Samaria, in the ſeuenth yeere of the raigne of Oſeas. But the King of Iſrael withſtood his entrance into the city, by which meanes he was beſieged therein for three yeeres ſpace, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth yeere of Oſeas, and the ſeuenth of Ezechias raigne. At which time all the kingdome of Iſrael was deſtroyed, and all the people tranſported into the countries of Media, and Perſia; and amongſt the reſt King Oſeas was taken priſoner. The King of Aſſyria cauſed certaine Nations of a Countrey, which (by reaſon it abutteth vpon a certaine riuer in Perſia called by that name) was called Chut, to remoque their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabit the Countrey of Iſrael. As for the ten Tribes of Iſrael, they were tranſported out of their Countrey (nine hundreth forty ſeuen yeeres, ſince their predeceſſors (departing out of Ægypt) poſſeſſed the Country of Chanaan; eight hundreth yeeres after the gouernment of Ioſuah; and two hundreth and fortie yeeres, ſeuen moneths, and ſeuen daies, ſince they reuolted from Roboam Dauids nephew, to giue the kingdome to Ieroboam.) This was the end of the Iſraelites, who tranſgreſſed the lawes, and diſobeyed the Prophets, who foretold them of that calamitie which ſhould happen vnto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The ſedition that they moued againſt Roboam, eſtabliſhing his ſeruant for their King, was the originall of their miſchiefes. For Ieroboam committing impietie againſt God, and they imitating his wickedneſſe, preuailed ſo much, as the Maieſtie of God grew displeased with them, so that he punished them according as they deserued. But the King of Assyria rauaged and spoiled all Syria and Phœnicia with his army, and his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for he made warre against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulat raigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greeke tongue. The King Elulat (said hee) raigned sixe and thirtie yeeres, and pursued the Cutheans that were reuolted from him by Sea, and made them subiect. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his army, and inuaded all Phœnicia, and afterwards hauing couenanted a peace with them, hee returned backe againe. The Cities of Sydon, Arce, and Paletyr, and diuers other Cities reuolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselues to the King of Assyria. For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his army forth once more against them; and he was furnished by the Phœnicians with sixtie ships, and eight hundreth rowers. The Tyrians changing their ships with twelue of their vessels, ouerthrew the Nauy of the Assyrians, and tooke about fiue hundreth men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the King of Assyria returning backe againe, planted a garrison vpon the riuer, and fortified the fountaine heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of fiue yeeres) they were inforced to finde and digge new fountaines to sustaine themselues. These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselues, as also the exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chutheans from the Region of Chut which is in Persia, (where there is a Riuer of that name) for that they were in fiue nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honored in their nation, to the number of fiue gods, whom they serued after the manner of their countrey. Whereupon the true and supreme God was grieuously displeased, and prouoked against them: for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could finde no remedie, vntill such time as they had notice that it behooued them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safetie. They therefore sent vnto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in warre. Which done, they learning the law, and the manner of Gods seruice by them, began very diligently to obserue both: by which meanes the plague ceased suddenly. And now euen vnto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrewes Chutheans, and Samaritans by the Greekes. These as often as they finde the Iewes in prosperitie, call them their cousins (according to the varietie and changes of time) but if they perceiue their fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abiure they consanguinitie, and renounce any lawfull parentage or amitie, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawne thither from a forraine nation. But in time and place conuenient, we shall speake of them more amply.

CHAP. I.

SENACHERIB King of Aſſyria beſiegeth EZECHIAS in Ieruſalem.

IN the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacherib King of Aſſyria drew forth a huge army againſt him, and ſurprized all the Cities of Iuda and Beniamin by ſtrong hand. To him Ezechias ſent Embaſſadors, promiſing him obedience, and ſuch a tribute, as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe. When Senacherib had heard and conſidered vpon the Embaſſadours inſtructions, hee reſolued on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promiſing that he would depart in peace as ſoone as he had receiued three hundreth talents of ſiluer, and thirty talents of gold: ſwearing an oath vnto the Embaſſadours, that vnder theſe conditions hee would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giuing credit to theſe words of his, emptied the treaſuries, and ſent the prefixed ſumme to Senacherib, hoping to be deliuered from his enemy, and the hazzard wherein his countrey ſtood. But the Aſſyrians hauing receiued the money, ſet light by their promiſes, ſo that Senacherib went in perſon to make warre againſt the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, and left Rapſaces his Generall in Iudæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeſt Minions and Courtiers, with commiſſion to ſpoile Ieruſalem: The names of theſe two were Tharata and Anachares. As ſoone as they were encamped neere vnto the walles, they ſent vnto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and ſpeake with them: but he through feare which he had conceiued, went not vnto them, but ſent three of his moſt familiar friends, Eliacim the ſuperintendent of his Realme, Sobna and Ioachus that had the commiſſion of his Regiſters. Theſe three preſented themſelues before the Chiefetaines of the Aſſyrian armie: whom when Rapſaces had beheld, hee commanded them to returne vnto their Maſter, and to tell him that the great King Senacherib was deſirous to know vnder what hope he thus neglected his gouernment, and obſtinately refuſed to obey him and receiue his army into the Citie? Is it perhaps, becauſe he hopeth the Ægyptians will haue the vpper hand of the Kings armie? If that be his hope, doubtleſſe he is deceiued, ſhewing himſelfe to be like vnto a man that ſtayeth himſelfe vpon a broken reede; by which hee is not onely not ſuſtained, but in his fall alſo, hath his hand pierced therewith. Hee likewiſe wiſhed him to conceiue, that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times paſt hath giuen them the victory ouer the Iſraelites; ſo now alſo is pleaſed to humble Ezechias, and to make both him and his ſubiects ſtoope vnder the Aſſyrian gouernment. Whileſt Rapſaces ſpake thus in the Hebrew language (wherein he was very skilfull) Eliacim (fearing leſt the multitude ſhould be ſtriken with feare vpon the hearing of theſe words) beſought him to ſpeake in the Syriacke tongue. But he ſufficiently inſtructed what it was that hee feared, anſwered him with a lowder voice in the Hebrew tongue, and told them that they ought to giue eare vnto the Kings commandement, and to yeeld themſelues to his mercy, becauſe it concerned their ſecuritie. I am not ignorant (ſaid he) that both you and your King doe perſwade the people vnder a vaine hope, and fraudulently allure them to beare armes againſt vs. But if your valour be ought at all, and you ſuppoſe that you can leuy the ſiege from your walles, I am ready to furniſh you with two thouſand horſe, giue you vs ſo many horſemen to approoue their valours: but you cannot giue them that you haue not. Why therefore delay you? why yeeld you not to thoſe that are too ſtrong for you? and are able euen in ſpite of your reſiſt to ranſacke your Citie? whereas you know that a willing ſubmiſſion is alwaies ſecure: contrariwiſe whereas dutie is inforced, there wanteth no perill of calamitie.

When both the Embaſſadours and the people had heard that which the Aſſyrian had ſpoken, they reported the ſame to Ezechias, who incontinently caſt his royall garments off, and cloathed himſelfe in ſackcloth, carrying the countenance of a diſconſolate man; and caſting himſelfe proſtrate vpon the earth after the manner of their countrey, he beſought God to be aſſiſtant vnto him, ſince all other hope was vaine. Hee ſent alſo certaine of his friends, and ſome Prieſts vnto the Prophet Eſay, requiring him to pray vnto God, that ſince the ſacrifice was offered vnto him for publike securitie, it might please him to frustrate the enemies hopes, and to haue pitie and compassion on his people. When the Prophet had performed no lesse then he required, he receiued an answer from God, by which he assured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies should be ouercome without stroke strooken, & should retire with shame, and not with that aduantage which they brag'd of at this present, because God had already determined how they should be ouerthrowne. Hee foreprophecied also that Senacharib himselfe (the King of Assyria) should faile of his enterprize in Ægypt, and that vpon his returne to his owne Court, he should be slaine. At that very time the Assyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in which he called him foole and mad man, to thinke that he could warrantize himselfe from being his slaue, yea his in especiall, who had conquered diuers and far greater nations: threatning him with vtter ruine at such time as he should surprize the Citie, if he opened not the gates of Ierusalem willingly, to entertaine his armie. When Ezechias had read these Letters, he set light by them, by reason of the confidence he had in God: and hauing opened them, he spred them in the Temple. And whilest he renewed his prayers vnto God for the saluation of the Citie, and his subiects, Esay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewise they should manure their lands in peace and security, and should enioy their possessions without feare. Not long after, the King of Assyria hauing but cold successe in his expedition against Ægypt, turned backe againe without doing any thing, for this cause that ensueth. Hee had lost much time in the siege of Pelusium: and at such time as hee had already raised certaine bulwarks as hie as the wall, so that he wanted nothing but to giue the assault; newes was brought him that Tharsices King of Æthiopia brought an army to rescue the Ægyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the desart, and suddenly to charge the Assyrian armie. Senacharib troubled with these tidings, speedily departed thence with his army. But Herodotus saith, that he made warre with Vulcans priest, especially for that he was both a king and a priest: Besieging Pelusium (said he) for this cause he gaue ouer the siege. The King of Ægypt called to his God for assistance, by whose power the Arabians suffered much misery. But in this also he erreth, in that hee setteth downe the Arabian for the Assyrian. In one night (said he) there was such a multitude of Mice, that they gnew all the enemies bowes and other armes: whence it came to passe that the King being disarmed, withdrew his siege from Pelusium. But Berosus a writer among the Chaldees maketh mention of Senacharib, and how he raigned among the Assyrians, and troubled both Asia and Ægypt with warre, and declareth the manner in these words: But Senacharib returning from the Ægyptian warre came, before Ierusalem, and receiued the army that was there, at the hands of his Gouernour Rabsace, and God caused a pestilent sickenesse to fall vpon his army, which was so violent, that the first night of the siege there died an hundreth fourescore and fiue thousand men, with the Gouernours and Chieftaines. With which losse he was so affrighted, and troubled, that fearing to lose his army, he fled with those that remained, and retired himselfe into his kingdome to the Citie called Niniue, where after he had liued for a time, he was traiterously slaine by Adramelech, and Selenar his two elder sonnes: and being dead, was carried into his owne temple called Arusche, and his children were driuen out of the kingdome for committing the murther, and retired themselues into Armenia, and Asseradochus succeeded Senacharib. Such was the end of the Assyrian army that came before Ierusalem.

EZECHIAS hauing for a time remained in peace, dieth: and leaueth his sonne MANASSES to succeed him.

KING Ezechias (being in this sort beyond all hope deliuered from his feares) offered thankesgiuing and sacrifices vnto God, with all the people, acknowledging that there was no other cause that had slaine part of his enemies, and put the rest to mortall feare, neither that had deliuered Ierusalem from thraldome, but onely Gods succour and assistance. And whilest he altogether intended and was occupied about the seruice of God, he fell sicke of a grieuous disease, so as the Physicians despaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This sicknes of his was accompanied with a grieuous care, because he had no children, and saw that he was now to depart the world, & to leaue his house desart, and his kingdom desolate. Being therefore in this sort toyled with discontents, he lamented and besought God, that it would please him to lengthen his life a little time, vntil he had children to succeed him, & that he would vouchsafe that his soule might not be taken from him, before he were the father of a sonne.

Ezechias sicknesse, and the prolongation of his life assured by miracle.

A ſonne. Hereupon God taking compaſſion of him (and the rather, becauſe he was not grieued for that the pleaſures of his kingdome were taken from him; but for that he ſought for a lawful heire to ſucceede him in the Princedome) he ſent the Prophet Eſay vnto him, to aſſure him, that after three dayes he ſhould be recouered of his ſickneſs, and that after he had liued ſome fifteene yeers more, he ſhould depart out of this life, and leaue a lawfull heire behind him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought theſe tydings to the King; he doubted both the vnexpected meſſenger, and the mightineſſe of his diſeaſe: for which cauſe he required ſome prodigious ſigne at Eſaias hands, to the intent that he might certainely beleeue, that he was ſent as a meſſenger from God vnto him: for the truth of thoſe things, which either exceede our hope, or reaſon, are wont to be confirmed by theſe meanes. Whereupon Eſay asketh him what ſigne he required, and it ſhould be giuen him. For which cauſe he requeſted, that ſince the declining ſun had already aduanced his ſhadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cauſe it to returne vnto the place where it was before, and ouerrun againe the ſame lines of ſhadow. On this occaſion the Prophet beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to confirme the King by this miracle: who ſeeing that which he deſired, was ſuddenly deliuered from his ſicknes, and aſcended the Temple to worſhip and praiſe God. At that time it hapned, that the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was deſtroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will ſpeake in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon ſent an Embaſſadour to Ezechias with preſents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiuing his meſſengers, willingly feaſted them, and ſhewed them his treaſures, his arcenall, and C all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious ſtones: and after he had giuen them preſents for Balad, he diſmiſſed them. Whereupon the Prophet Eſay came vnto him, asking him from whence thoſe Embaſſadours came? To whom Ezechias anſwered, that they were of Babylon, and came vnto him from the King, telling the Prophet how he had ſhewed them all that which he had, to the end that hauing ſeene and obſerued his riches and power, they might afterwards certifie the King therof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, ſaying: Know thou, that within a little time thy riches ſhall be tranſported into Babylon, and thy children ſhall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) ſhall be ſlaues vnto the King of Babylon. All which God gaue him to vnderſtand before it hapned. For which cauſe Ezechias was ſore troubled, to heare theſe tidings, ſaying, that he deſired that his people might not fall into thoſe miſeries: but ſince it was impoſſible to change the decree of God, he required that he might haue peace during his life time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Beroſus maketh mention. This Prophet truely diuine, and admirable for the verity of his prophecies, is accounted to haue ſpoken nothing that was vntrue, but to haue left in writing all that which he prophecied: the truth wherof hath afterwards in effect appeared to poſterity. Neither did he alone performe thus much; but beſides him, twelue otherrs haue done the like: and all that which is hapned vnto vs, either good or euill, hath fallen out truly according to their prophecies. But hereafter we will ſpeake of euery one of them. Now when as Ezechias had liued his prefixed time (according as wee haue foreſpoken) and gouerned his Kingdome in peace, he died when he was fiftie foure yeeres old, and in the nine and twentieth yeere of his raigne.

The Kings of Chaldæa and Babylon warre againſt MANASSES, and take him priſoner.

HIs ſon Manaſſes (the ſonne of Achiba, a woman borne in Ieruſalem) ſucceeded him in the kingdome. This man forſooke his fathers waies, and followed ſiniſter cuſtomes, expreſſing in his manners all kindes of miſchiefe, not omitting any impiety, but addicting himſelfe to all the iniquities of the Iſraelites, who were deſtroyed becauſe of their ſins committed againſt God. He was ſo impudent, as he ſpared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the City and the whole countrey: for making his entry, in deſpite of God, he ſlew afterwards all thoſe that were vertuous men amongſt the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets; yet ſo it is, that he killed euery day ſome: ſo that Ieruſalem was ouerflown with blood. For which cauſe God being prouoked vnto wrath by theſe his ſo hainous offences, ſent diuers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatned to inflict the ſame calamities vpon them, which (for contempt of religion) the Iſraelites their brethren had a little before that ſuffered. But they vnwilling to giue truſt to theſe ſpeeches of theirs (whoſe admonitions had they reſpected, they might haue auoided their imminent euils) at length in effect experimented rimented the truth therof. For whereas they perſeuered in their accuſtomed and diſſolute manners, God incenſed the King of Chaldæa and Babylon againſt them; who ſending his army into Iudæa, and ſpoyling the whole region, at length ſurprized and led away Manaſſes priſoner, and made him ſubiect to what puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe them to inflict vpon him. At laſt the wretch (taught by his own miſchiefe) acknowledged his ſin, and humbly beſought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy courteous and mercifull: neither did God ſhew himſelf inexorable; but hauing compaſſion on his miſeries, gaue eare vnto him; and after ſome ſpace of time, the Babylonian ſending him home, reſtored him to his former gouernment. As ſoone as he was returned backe to Ieruſalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to ſhew the fruits of repentance, and to feare God in all things, cleanſing his ſpirit of all thoſe ſinnes, whereunto before-time he was addicted. He purged the Temple alſo, and cleanſed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himſelfe wholly to thinke how he might giue God thanks, for that he had thus retyred him from ruine, and how he might paſſe all the remnant of his life in his fauour. He taught the people likewiſe to do the like, telling them what miſeries they had endured within a few yeers, for that they had demeaned themſelues impiouſly. He repaired the Altar alſo, and according to Moſes preſcript offered thereon ſolemne ſacrifices: and after that he had purueyed thoſe things that concerned the ſeruice of God, as it appertained; he bethought himſelfe likewiſe of the ſecurity of the City of Ieruſalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined wals, annexing alſo another incloſure thereunto, and erecting high Towers likewiſe, furniſhing the ſame with munition and victuall ſufficient for a City of defence. And ſo much was he changed during the reſt of his life, that he was held moſt happy; and after that time he began to ſerue God, diuers tooke example of vertue by imitating him. After he had liued ſixty and ſeuen yeeres, he dyed in the fiue and fiftieth yeere of his raigne, and was buried in his garden. His kingdome came into the hands of his ſonne Amos, the ſon of Emalſema, of the City of Iabath; who imitating his fathers youthly courſe, was ſlaine in his owne houſe, by a conſpiracy plotted by his own houſhold ſeruants, after he had accompliſhed the yeers of foure and twenty, and raigned two. After his death the people ſlew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdome was giuen to his ſonne Ioſias, who was onely eight yeeres old.

The Hiſtory of IOSIAS.

IOSIAS mother was of the City of Boſceth, and was called Ieda: he was a man of a good nature, and of his owne inſtinct inclined to vertue, conforming himſelfe to the cuſtomes and manners of his progenitor Dauid, both in the ſcope and rule of all his life. When he grew to be twelue yeeres old, he gaue manifeſt approbation of his pietie and iuſtice: for he drew the people to a conformable courſe of life, and to the deteſtation and aboliſhing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the ſeruice of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And conſidering the actions of his predeceſſors, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no leſſe circumſpection, then if he had beene an old man; and that which he found to be correſpondent and aduiſedly done by them, that did hee both maintaine and imitate. All theſe things did he both by reaſon of his innated wiſedome, as alſo by the admoniſhments and counſails of the Elders: for following orderly the lawes (both in reſpect of publique policy, as alſo in religion) he walked vprightly, in that by obſeruing them, he could not erre. For circuiting both the City and the whole country, the King razed downe and defaced the woods that were made for ſtrange gods, and ouerthrew their altars; and all thoſe gifts that had been offered vnto them by his predeceſſors, were defaced in a mockerie: and in this manner cauſed he the people to returne to the ſeruice of God, and to forſake the honour they did vnto Idols. Hee offered likewiſe the ordinary ſacrifices and burnt offerings vpon the altar, and eſtabliſhed Iudges and Magiſtrates to determine publike debates, and to doe each man right, charging them to haue no leſſe reſpect of equity, then they had of their owne liues. He ſent alſo thorow all the country, cõmanding all thoſe that would be contributors, either in gold or ſiluer, towards the reparation of the temple, ſhould bring in their beneuolence according to their wils, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, hee appointed ſuperintendents, both ouer the Temple, as alſo ouer the charges that were defraied in the reparation thereof: namely, Amaſias, who was already Gouernor of the City, & Saphan the Secretary, and Ioata Committee ouer the Regiſters, with the high Prieſt Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence prouided workmen, & all that which which was requiſite for the building, and began the worke. This ſudden and ſpeedy reparation of the Temple gaue a manifeſt teſtimony of the Kings piety: who when he had attained to the eighteenth yeere of his age, ſent Elcia the High Prieſt, and cauſed him to melt downe the remainder of the money that was giuen towards the building of the Temple, and to make veſſels, cups, and ewers, for the ſeruice of the Altar. He commanded alſo, that all the gold and ſiluer that was in the treaſury ſhould be brought forth, and employed after the like manner in cups, and other veſſels. Now whileſt the High Prieſt ſearched the treaſurie, he found the ſacred books of Moſes in the Temple, which he brought and deliuered the Scribe Saphan; who after he had peruſed the ſame, preſented them vnto the King, giuing him to vnderſtand, that all that which he had commanded, was accompliſhed: beſides that, he read the books vnto him; which when the King had heard, he rent his clothes, and called Elcia the High Prieſt vnto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certaine other of his inward friends, and ſent them vnto the Propheteſſe Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignity, and famous, by reaſon of his nobility: commanding them that when they came vnto her, they ſhould endeauour to appeaſe Gods wrath, and labour to recouer his fauors, becauſe it was to be feared, that by reaſon that their anceſtors had tranſgreſſed the lawes of Moſes, they ſhould be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of their countrey; and abandoned by all men, ſhould at length periſh miſerably.

Olda the Propheteſſe ſent vnto by Ioſias.

The Prophecy of the Iewes miſery.

When the Propheteſſe had heard the Kings commandement, ſhee willed thoſe that were ſent vnto her, to returne vnto the King, and to certifie him from her, that God had giuen a ſentence againſt them, which might not be reuoked, by any praiers whatſoeuer; namely, that ſince they had tranſgreſſed the law of Moſes, the people ſhould periſh, & ſhould be caſt out of their country, and depriued of all their goods that they had, and for that they haue not grown to amendment in ſo long time; notwithſtanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, & had foretold the puniſhment of their impieties, wch ſhould happen vnto them, to the end that they migh teleeue that God is God, & that he failes not in any thing that he hath foretold by his Prophets. Furthermore ſhe ſaid, that he forbore as yet to ſend theſe afflictions vpon them, for Ioſias ſake, who was a vertuous man: but that after his deceaſe God would powre his intended puniſhments vpon the people. This prophecy of the woman they ſignified vnto the King: who ſent into all parts, and aſſembled the people in Ieruſalem, commanding the Prieſts and Leuites, and generally all men without diſtinction of age, or perſon, to be preſent in that conuention. Now when they were aſſembled, he firſt of all cauſed the ſacred bookes to be read, and afterwards ſtanding aloft vpon his Throne, he cauſed all the people to ſweare and promiſe that they ſhould ſerue God, and keep Moſes lawes. Whereupon all of them did willingly approue whatſoeuer he ſaid, promiſing to doe that whereunto they were exhorted. And therewithall offering vp preſent ſacrifices vnto God, they beſought him to ſhew himſelfe fauourable and mercifull towards them. The King likewiſe commanded the High Prieſt, that if there were any neceſſary in the Temple which were made by his predeceſſors, in honour of idols and ſtrange gods, he ſhould caſt it out. And after that a great quantity was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the aſhes afterwards were ſcattered here and there. And as touching the Prieſts (that appertained to idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When theſe things were thus executed in Ieruſalem, he came afterwards to the plaine countrey; and all that which Ieroboam had erected there in honour of idols, he vtterly defaced it, and the bones of the falſe prophets were burnt vpon the Altar that Ieroboam had builded. This had the Prophet foretold that came to Ieroboam, at ſuch time as he offered ſacrifice, and told him in the preſence of all the people, all that which ſhould happen: namely, that one of Dauids poſterity called Ioſias, ſhould doe thoſe abouenamed things: which prophecy tooke effect three hundreth ſixtie and one yeere after. After this, King Ioſias tranſported himſelfe to the Iſraelites (who had auoided the captiuity and ſeruitude of the Aſſyrians) and perſwaded them to forſake their impieties, and the ſeruices they had performed to ſtrange gods, and to honour the Soueraigne and true God of their fathers, and to cleaue vnto him. He made a ſearch alſo thorow euery houſe, borough and city, fearing leſt as yet there ſhould be an idoll hidden. He likewiſe ſought out the charriots that were made by his anceſtors, in honour of the Sunne, and all that which was adored whatſoeuer it were, and vtterly aboliſhed the ſame. After he had in this ſort purged the countrey, he aſſembled all the people in Ieruſalem, where he celebrated the feaſt of vnleauened bread, and the ſolemnity of Eaſter. Towards the performance whereof, he gaue the people young kids and lambes, to the number of thirty thouſand, and three thouſand bullockes for burnt offerings: and the chiefe among the Leuites diſtributed amongſt the other Leuites fiue hundreth lambs, and fiue hundreth bullocks, bullocks. Hauing therefore ſuch an abundance of beaſts, they ſacrificed according to the Law of Moſes, (the Prieſts taking charge thereof, and confirming the reſt of the people by their example.) Neither was there euer ſuch a ſolemnity kept by the Hebrewes, ſince the time of Samuel the Prophet; becauſe all things were done according to the lawes and ancient cuſtomes, which were obſerued in the time of their fathers. After this, Ioſias liued in peace, riches, honour, and eſtimation amongſt all men: and thus finiſhed his life.

NEchao King of Egypt hauing gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the floud Euphrates, to warre againſt the Medes and Babylonians, who had deſtroyed the Empire of Aſſyria: for Nechao affected the gouernment of all Aſia. Now when hee drew neere vnto the City of Mende (which was vnder Ioſias ſubiection) King Ioſias denyed him paſſage, and would not ſuffer his army to march thorow his countrey. For which cauſe Nechao ſent a Herauld vnto him, to let him vnderſtand, that it was not againſt him that he made war, but that he bent his courſe towards Euphrates: for which cauſe he wiſhed him in no ſort to hinder his intended iourney, leſt thereby he ſhould be conſtrained to make warre vpon him. But Ioſias reſpected not this demand of his, but reſolued himſelfe to hinder his paſſage thorow his country: And truly I ſuppoſe that the deſtinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might haue ſome occaſion to doe ſome thing againſt Nechao. For whileſt he diſpoſed his army, and rode from one band to another, being mounted vpon his charriot, he was ſtrooken with an arrow that was ſhot by a certaine Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the ſpleene he had in warre. For feeling himſelfe ſorely oppreſſed with paine, by reaſon of his wound, he commanded his army to retyre, and returned himſelfe to Ieruſalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after he had liued nine and thirtie yeeres, and raigned thirty and one. For him the people mourned with great heauineſſe, lamenting and ſorrowing for many dayes. The Prophet Ieremie alſo made a deploration ouer him in lamentable verſe, which is as yet extant euen in theſe daies. This Prophet left in writing thoſe euils that ſhould afterwards happen vnto the citie, and the captiuitie wherewith we are intangled at this preſent, and the ſurprizall of Babylon. Neither hath he alone foretold the ſame: but the Prophet Ezechiel hath likewiſe done the like; who firſt left two bookes written of the ſame argument. Theſe two Prophets were of the race of the Prieſts. But Ieremy kept in Ieruſalem, from the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Ioſias, vntill the deſtruction of the Citie and Temple; as in time and place conuenient we will declare, ſetting downe thoſe occurrences that hapned to this Prophet. After the death of Ioſias (heretofore mentioned) his ſonne Ioaz ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, at ſuch time as he was twenty and three yeeres old, who raigned in Ieruſalem; his mothers name was Ametala: he was a man full of impietie, and of a malignant and peruerſe nature. The King of Ægypt returning from the warre, ſent vnto Ioas, commanding him to meet with him in Samath a City of Syria, where he was no ſooner arriued, but he kept him priſoner, committing the kingdome to Eliacim his brother (on the fathers ſide) who was his elder brother likewiſe. He changed his name alſo, and called him Ioachim: he impoſed a tribute alſo on Iudæa, of one hundred talents of ſiluer, and a talent of gold, which Ioachim paid. And as touching Ioaz, he led him into Ægypt, where he finiſhed his daies, after he had beene King three moneths, and tenne daies. Now Ioachims mother was called Zabuda, of the City of Abuma. He was a wicked perſon, and of a malignant nature, hauing neither piety towards God, nor reſpect of equity towards men.

Nabuchodonoſor King of Babylon warreth againſt the Egyptians

IN the fourth yeere of his raigne, a certaine man called Nabuchodonoſor, poſſeſſed the Kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great army againſt Carchabeſa (a Citie ſituate neere vnto Euphrates) reſoluing with himſelfe to fight againſt Nechao King of Ægypt, vnder whoſe power all Syria was ſubiect. Nechao vnderſtanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge armie addreſſed himſelfe towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulſe Nabuchodonozor. But hee

was ouercome in battell, and loſt diuers thouſands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (paſſing Euphrates) ſeized all Syria as far as Peluſium (Iudæa only excepted.) The fourth yeere that Nabuchodonoſor raigned ouer theſe conquered countries, and the eight yeere of the raigne of Ioachim ouer the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his army againſt the Iewes, with a mightie power, threatning them to vſe all hoſtility, except Ioachim would pay him tribute. Ioachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with ſiluer, and paid for three yeeres ſpace the tributes that were impoſed on him. But in the third yeere (vnderſtanding that the Ægyptian was vp in armes againſt the Babylonian) he denied the paiment of the tribute; notwithſtanding he was fruſtrated of his hope, for the Ægyptians were not ſo hardy as to make warre. All which the Prophet Ieremie daily foretold him, ſignifying vnto him that he builded his hope in vaine vpon the Ægyptians, and that it would fall out that the City ſhould be ouerthrowne by the King of Babylon, and Ioachim himſelfe ſhould be deliuered priſoner into his hands. But becauſe there was no meanes for them to eſcape this iuſtice, all that which he ſaid was nothing auaileable. For notwithſtanding the people and Gouernours heard thereof, yet made they no reckoning of the ſame; but were diſpleaſed with thoſe counſailes, which he propoſed vnto them, accuſing Ieremy as if hee tooke pleaſure to vtter and publiſh ominous and aduerſe preſages againſt the King: they likewiſe called him in queſtion before the Kings Councell, and required that he might be condemned. Whereupon ſome of them gaue ſentence againſt him: they reproouing the aduice of the Elders that were thus addicted, tooke a more diſcreet courſe, and cauſed the Prophet to depart out of the Kings houſe, forbidding his aduerſaries to doe him any miſchiefe: they proteſting that he had not onely foretold the future calamities of the citie, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas and diuers others; and yet that no one of them had ſuffered any euill by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwiſe Micheas had beene honoured as a Prophet ſent from God. By theſe words they appeaſed the people, and deliuered Ieremy from the death intended againſt him. This man wrote all his prophecies, and read them to the people in their faſts, and aſſembled them in the Temple in the ninth moneth of the fift yeer of the raigne of Ioachim, which booke he had compoſed touching that which ſhould happen vnto the City, the Temple, and the people. When the Gouernours heard the ſame, they tooke the booke from him, and commanded that both he and his Secretary Baruch ſhould withdraw themſelues out of the ſight of men: and they tooke the book, and preſented it vnto the King; who in the preſence of his friends, commanded his Secretary to reade the ſame: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and renting it in pieces, caſt it into the fire, intending that it ſhould neuer be ſeene. He ſent out likewiſe a ſtrict commiſſion to ſeeke out Ieremy and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be puniſhed. But they had preuented his indignation.

NABVCHODONOSOR putteth IOACHIM to death, and eſtabliſheth IOACHIN in the Kingdome.

NOt long after this, he went out to meet the King of Babylon, who was marched out to make warre againſt him: and being incredulous and carleſſe of the Prophets predictions, he opened the gates vnto him, ſuppoſing that he intended him no euill. But when the Babylonians were entred into the Citie, the King obſerued not his promiſes, but put all ſuch to death as were in the flower and beauty of their yeeres, and ſpared none of the inhabitants of Ieruſalem: with them alſo he ſlew their King Ioachim, and cauſed his body to be caſt from the top of the walles, and vouchſafed him no ſepulture, eſtabliſhing Ioachin his ſonne King of the countrey, and of the city. Moreouer he tooke three thouſand of the moſt honourable Citizens of Ieruſalem priſoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongſt whom was the Prophet Ezechiel, at that time very young in yeeres. This was the end of King Ioachim, who liued thirty ſixe yeeres, and raigned eleuen. Ioachin that ſucceeded him in the kingdome, was the ſonne of Noſta of Ieruſalem, and raigned three moneths and ten dayes.

AS soone as the Babylonian had bestowed the Kingdome of Iudæa on Ioachin, hee was seized with a sudden feare, which made him suspect lest Ioachin remembring himselfe of the iniuries he had done vnto him by the murther of his father, might draw the countrey into rebellion, and reuolt against him. For which cause he sent out certaine forces, and besieged Ioachin in Ierusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an vpright heart, was loth to forsake the City in that danger without a Gouernor, considering that it was for his cause that the Common-weale was in that hazzard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his neereſt a-kin with him, he deliuered them into the hands of the Captaines that were sent against him, receiuing an oath from them, that neither they nor the City should receiue any harme. But this promise continued not a yeere: for the King of Babylon obserued it not, but commanded his Captaines to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the City, and to bring them bound vnto him. The number of them was ten thousand, eight hundred thirty and two persons, besides Ioachin, his mother, and his neere allies, whom they tooke prisoners.

Sedechias King of Ierusalem seduced by his courtiers and false prophets, giueth no eare to Ieremy.

IN stead of Ioachin, he appointed Sedechias his Vncle King of Ierusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should gouerne the countrey without any innouation, or partiall fauour towards the Ægyptians. This Sedechias was one and twenty yeeres old, at such time as hee came vnto the Kingdome, and was Ioachins brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all lawes, and a peruerter of ordinances. For the yong men that were about him, were without the feare of God, and all the people vnder his dominions, committed whatsoeuer outrages were best liking vnto thē. For this cause the Prophet Ieremie came vnto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, that if he renounced not all those impieties and iniquities he vsed, and addicted not himselfe to that which was iust (but gaue eare vnto his Gouernours, amongst which there were many wicked men, & to those false prophets that misled him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make war against his City, but that the Ægyptians should leuy an army and ouercome them) that then he should incurre much miserie: for (said hee) they haue no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce, are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gaue eare to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people: but anon after his friends corrupted him, and diuerted him according to their owne opinions. Ezechiel also at the same time, had prophecyed in Babylon all those calamities which were to fal vpon the Temple, and sent notice to Ierusalem of that which he had receiued from God. Notwithstanding, Sedechias gaue no credit to his prophecies, by reason that all the Prophets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the surprizall of the city, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezechiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Ieremy had prophecied, that the King of Babylon should leade him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these two accorded not in their sayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things happened vnto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as wee will declare in a conuenient place. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the King of Babylon for the space of eight yeers, he brake the league that was betweene them, and confederated with the Egyptians (vnder hope that they should not ouercome the Babylonians.) Which when the King of Babylon vnderstood, he led forth his army against him, and destroyed his countrey to the vttermost: so that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he finally planted his army and besieged Ierusalem. The Egyptian perceiuing the estate wherein his allie Sedechias was, leuied a huge army, and came into Iudæa with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his army from Ierusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and ouercame him in battell, and pursued him with such alacrity, that he put him to flight, and draue him altogether out of Syria. As soone as the Babylonian was dislodged from Ierusalem, the false prophets phets deceiued Sedechias, telling him that the Babylonian ſhould neuer more returne, to make warre either againſt him, or his nation, and that he ſhould neuer any more depart from his houſe in Babylon; and that they who had beene led away captiues, ſhould returne home againe, loaden with thoſe veſſels of the Temple which the King of Babylon had taken from them. The yeere of the world, 3346. before Chriſts Nativitie. 618.

But the Prophet Ieremy preſenting himſelfe before the King, prophecied the contrary to theſe impoſtors, aſſuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by meanes of the Ægyptians, for that the Babylonians ſhould ouercome them, and ſhould returne and encampe before Ieruſalem, and beſiege the ſame, and deſtroy the people by famine, and leade them away priſoners that were remaining, and carry away all their ſubſtance; & that after they were ſeized of the riches of their temple, they ſhould finally burne the ſame. As for the Citie, they ſhould raze it: and (ſaid he) they ſhall keepe vs captiue for the ſpace of ſeuenty yeeres: And from this ſeruitude the Perſians and Medes ſhall deliuer vs, at ſuch time as they haue gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babylonians: then ſhall they ſend vs backe againe into our countrey, and we ſhall build our temple anew, and eſtabliſh the Citie of Ieruſalem. Diuers men gaue credit to theſe words of Ieremie; but the Gouernours and contemners of God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had beene a man tranſported out of his ſenſe. And whereas hee had an intent to viſit his natiue countrey Anathoth, ſome twenty ſtounds off Ieruſalem, one of the magiſtrates encountring him in his iourney, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this ſlander, that he went and ſtole away to ſubmit himſelfe to the Babylonians. But Ieremy anſwered that he was falſly accuſed, & that he repaired only to the place where he was borne. This Prince giuing him no credit, arreſted him, and brought him before the iudgement ſeat, where he ſuſtained all ſorts of outrages & torments, and was ſhut vp in priſon to be puniſhed, and remained there for a time, ſuffering the extremity of wrong and iniury. The ninth yeere of the rãigne of Zedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth moneth, the King of Babylon came and encamped the ſecond time before Ieruſalem, and intrenched himſelfe round about the ſame, for the ſpace of eighteene moneths, and laid battery and ſiege thereto, with as great ſpleene as might be poſſible: And they that were beſieged therein, were encountred with two moſt hainous afflictions, famine, and moſt grieuous peſtilence. At this time the Prophet Ieremy being in priſon, held not his peace, but cryed with a loud voyce, and preached, and exhorted the people, willing them to entertaine the Babylonians and to open their gates vnto them: becauſe that in ſo doing they might warrantize themſelues with all their families, whereas otherwaies they were aſſured of deſtruction. He foretold them alſo, that if any one remained in the Citie, he ſhould moſt aſſuredly either periſh by famine, or the enemies fury: but if ſo be they ſubmitted themſelues to the enemies mercy, they ſhould eſcape from death. But thoſe Gouernours that heard him ſpeake after this ſort, gaue him no credit, in that they were not as yet preſſed with the danger: for which cauſe they came vnto the King, and after a deſpitefull manner, told him all that which had beene ſpoken, accuſing Ieremy, and reprooving him for a mad man; vrging this, that he had abated their courage, and by his wofull predictions, had weakned the hearts of the people, which were otherwaies ready to fight for him and their country, by reaſon that he flying vnto the enemy, menaced them with the ſurprizal and vtter ruine of their City. But the King in regard of the naturall humanitie and iuſtice that was in him, was not any waies whetted in reſpect of his owne intereſt; yet to the intent he might not ſeeme to be vtterly oppoſed to the Gouernours, by contradicting them, he deliuered the Prophet into their hands, to deale with him howſoeuer they pleaſed. Who hauing obtained this liberty from the King, entred the priſon on the ſudden, and laying hold on Ieremie, they let him downe into a pit full of mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and be ſtrangled by the ordure: in effect, he was ſet therein vp to the necke. But one of the Kings ſeruants (an Æthiopian by nation) certified the King of the Prophets affliction, aſſuring him that his friends and Gouernours did not iuſtly, ſo to thruſt & bury the Prophet in the mud, and curſedly to conſpire againſt him, tyring him with bonds and tortures worſe then death. For which cauſe the King hearing this newes, was ſorry that he had deliuered the Prophet to the Gouernours, and commanded the Æthiopian to take thirty men of his court with him (with cords and ſuch other things neceſſary, as might concerne the ſafety of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliuer him from that captiuitie. Hereupon the Æthiopian furniſhed with men and neceſſarie meanes, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and diſmiſſed him without any guard. That done, the King ſent for him in ſecret, demanding of him if he had any meſſage to deliuer him from God, praying him to let him vnderſtand what ſoeuer he knew as touching the ſucceſſe of the ſiege. The Prophets anſwer was, that although he ſhould tel him, yet it would not be beleeued, & that if he ſhould exhort hort him, he would not giue eare or liſten vnto him. But (ſaid he) O King, thy friends haue condemned me to death, as if I had beene a moſt wretched malefactor. But where are they now at this preſent that haue deceiued thee, and borne thee in hand, ſaying; that the Babylonian would not come and beſiege thee? Now will I take heed how I tell thee the truth, for feare leſt thou condemne me to death. Hereupon the King ſwore vnto him that he ſhould not die, neither that » he would deliuer him into the hands of the Gouernours: for which cauſe Ieremy grounding him- » ſelfe vpon the faith which he had plighted vnto him, counſelled the King to yeeld vp the City to » the Babylonian, becauſe that God had willed him to ſignifie vnto the King, that if he would » ſaue his life, and auoid the imminent danger, and ſaue his City from vtter ruine, and preſerue the » Temple from burning, he ſhould ſubmit; or otherwiſe, that none but he ſhould be the cauſe of » all thoſe euils that ſhould happen vnto the City and Citizens, and of that calamity that ſhould » confound both him and all his family. Ieruſalem is taken, and the people carried into Babylon by NABVCHODONOSOR.

Ieruſalem beſieged 18. moneths, and at length taken.

MEane-while the Babylonian continued his violent ſiege againſt the City of Ieruſalem, & hauing raiſed Towers vpon certain Bulwarks, he draue away by this meanes all thoſe that approached neere vnto the wals: he raiſed alſo (round about the circuit of the City) diuers plat-formes, that equalled the wals in height. Meane-while, the city was as valiantly and couragiouſly defended by the inhabitants, for neither peſtilence nor famine plucked down their ſpirits: And although that within the citie they were tormented with theſe ſcourges, yet were not their reſolutions diſtracted by the warre, neither did the enemies inuentions aſtoniſh them, nor their engines affright them; but that they inuented new countermines: ſo that all the battell betwixt the Babylonians & Iewes ſeemed to be a triall both of valour & art; whileſt theſe by the one doe aſſuredly hope to ſurprize the city, and the other thought their ſafety conſiſteth herein, if they ceaſed not by new inuentions to fruſtrate their enemies endeauours: And in this eſtate continued they both, for the ſpace of eighteene moneths, vntill they were conſumed by famine, and by the darts that were ſhot againſt them by thoſe that ſhot from the towers. At length the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon (in the eleuenth yeere of the raigne of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth moneth) who were put in truſt by Nabuchodonoſor to performe the ſiege. For touching his owne perſon he made his aboad in the City of Reblata. Now if any man be deſirous to know the names of them that had commandement at ſuch time as Ieruſalem was ſurprized, theſe they be, Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Naboſar, and Echarampſar.

Sedechias flieth by night, and is ſurprized by the enemie.

The City being taken about midnight, the Princes of the enemies armie entred into the Temple; which when Zedechias vnderſtood, he tooke his wiues and his children, with the Princes and his friends, and fled thorow a great valley by the deſart: which when the Babylonians vnderſtood by certaine Iewes that were reuolted, and had ſubmitted themſelues vnto them, they aroſe early in the morning to purſue them, and ouertooke and ſurprized them neere vnto Iericho. Whereupon thoſe Princes and friends of Sedechias that had taken their flight with him, ſeeing the enemies neere vnto them, forſooke him, & ſcattering themſelues here and there, concluded each of them to ſaue himſelfe. When as therfore the enemies had apprehended him, who was attended by a few followers only, and accompanied by his children & wiues, they brought him vnto the kings preſence; who no ſooner beheld him, but he called him wicked and perfidious, and vpbraided him with with breach of his promiſe, and contempt of his Maieſty, to whom he had ſworne he would keepe it to his vſe. Furthermore he reproched him for his ingratitude, in that hauing receiued the royalty from his hands (which he had taken from Ioachin to beſtow it on him) he had notwithſtanding employed all his forces againſt his benefactor. But (ſaid he) that great God that hateth thy trechery, hath deliuered thee into my hands: and when he had ſpoken theſe words, he cauſed Zedechias friends and children to be ſlaine before his eyes, with all his other priſoners: afterwards commanding his eies to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. All which hapned vnto him, according as the Prophets Ieremie and Ezechiel had foretold him: namely, that he ſhould be ſurprized and brought before the King of Babylon, and ſhould ſpeake with him face to face, and ſhould ſee him with his eyes (for ſo had Ieremie prophecied) but being made blinde and conducted to Babylon, he ſhould not ſee the Citie of Babylon (according as Ezechiel had foretold.) All which may ſufficiently expreſſe to thoſe that know not the nature of God, how diuers and admirable his iudgements be, in diſpoſing all things in good order, & preſignifying thoſe things that are to come, euen as in this place there appeareth a moſt ſignall example of humane errour and incredulity, by which it was not lawfull for them to auoid their future calamity, neither ſhun their vnremooueable deſtiny. Thus was the race of the Kings extinguiſhed that deſcended from Dauid, who were in number one & twenty, that raigned after him. All of them together gouerned fiue hundred and fourteene yeers, ſixe moneths, and ten daies: adding thereunto the twenty yeeres of the firſt King Saul, who was of another Tribe. After this, the Babylonian ſent Nabuzardan Generall of his army vnto Ieruſalem to ſpoile the Temple, giuing him in charge to burne both it, and the Kings Palace, and to raze and leuell the Citie with the ground; and afterwards to tranſport the people into Babylon. Who arriued there the eleuenth yeer of the raigne of Sedechias, ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels that were conſecrated to Gods ſeruice, both thoſe of gold, as alſo them of ſiluer: he tooke likewiſe the great Lauer that was giuen by Salomon; the columnes & pillars of braſſe, with their chapters likewiſe, and the tables and candleſtickes of gold: and after he had borne away all things, he burned the Temple the firſt day of the fifth moneth of the eleuenth yeer of Sedechias raigne, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſors gouernment. He burned alſo the Kings royall Palace, and razed the City. This Temple was burned 470. yeeres, ſixe moneths, and tenne daies after the foundation thereof; and in the yeere 1062. ſixe moneths and ten daies after the departure of the people out of Egypt: and 1950. yeers, ſixe moneths and ten daies, after the Deluge: from the creation of Adam vntill the ruine of the Temple, there were three thouſand, fiue hundreth and thirteene yeers, ſixe moneths and tenne daies. Thus haue we ſet downe the number of the yeeres, and orderly expreſſed what, and in what time euery thing hath beene performed. The Generall for the King of Babylon hauing deſtroyed the Citie, and tranſported the people, tooke priſoners the High Prieſt Sareas, and his fellow in the office, the Prieſt Sephan, with the Gouernours and Keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch alſo which had the charge ouer the reſt, and ſeuen of Sedechias friends, and his Secretary, beſides ſixty other Gouernours, all which (together with the veſſels which he had pillaged) he ſent to Reblatha a Citie of Syria, vnto the King of Babylon; who commanded in that place that the High Prieſt and Gouernours ſhould be beheaded: as for the reſt of the priſoners, & Sedechias the King, he carried them with him to Babylon: he ſent alſo in bonds, with the reſt, Ioſadoch the ſonne of Sareas the High Prieſt, whom he had put to death in Reblatha (as we haue heretofore declared.) And for that we haue reckoned vp the race of the Kings, and ſet downe likewiſe what they were, and how long they continued, me ſeemeth that it ſhall not bee vnneceſſary to recite the names of the High Prieſts, and to report who they haue bin, that haue adminiſtred the Prieſthood vnder the Kings. Sadoc was the firſt High Prieſt of the Temple builded by Salomon. After him his ſon Achimas ſucceeded in that honour, and after Achimas, Azarias, after whom ſucceeded Ioram, and after Ioram Ioſchua, after Ioſchua, Axioram, who had for his ſucceſſor Phideas, to Phideas ſucceeded Sudeas, to Sudeas Iulus, to Iulus Iotham, to Iotham Urias, to Urias Nerias, to Nerias Odeas, to Odeas Saldum, to Saldum Elcias, to Elcias Sareas, to Sareas Ioſadoch, who was carried away priſoner into Babylon: all which haue ſucceeded in the Prieſthood by lineall deſcent. When Nabuchodonoſor was come to Babylon, he ſhut vp Sedechias in priſon, where he kept him vntill he died, and after his death he honoured him with a royall tombe. Hee likewiſe offered the veſſels that he had taken out of the Temple of Ieruſalem vnto his gods, and cauſed the people to inhabite the countrey of Babylon, deliuering the High Prieſt from his bonds. The Generall Nabuzardan that led the people away captiue, left the poorer ſort in the country of Iudæa; & thoſe alſo that voluntarily yeelded themſelues vnto him, ouer whom he appointed pointed Godolias the ſonne of Aicam Gouernour (a man that was both vpright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their aſſigned tribute to the King. He drew the Prophet Ieremie alſo out of priſon, perſwading him to repaire with him to the King of Babylon; telling him that hee had receiued expreſſe commandement from the King, to furniſh him with all things neceſſary for that iourney: but if he were not contented to repaire to Babylon, hee ſhould declare vnto him in what place he would make his aboad, to the intent he might certifie the King thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or ſoiourne in any other place, deſiring rather to liue amidſt the ruines of his countrey, and among the pitious reliques of his poore nation.

Ieremie ſet at liberty by the Babylonian, and richly offered and preſented.

When the Generall Nabuzardan vnderſtood his reſolution, he gaue charge to the Gouernour Godolias (whom he left in Iudæa) to haue care of him, and to furniſh him with all that which hee wanted, and after he had gratified him with preſents, he departed. Meane while Ieremy dwelt in the City of Maſphath, praying Nabuzardan that he would ſend him his diſciple Baruch (the ſon of Neria, a man of a noble family, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as theſe that during the ſiege of Ieruſalem were retired out of the City, vnderſtood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they aſſembled together from all parts, and came to Maſphath to Godolias, vnder the conduct of Iohn the ſon of Careas, and Iezanais and Sareas, and others. And beſides theſe, a certaine man called Iſmael of the blood royall, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the ſiege of the City, had retired himſelfe to Bathal King of the Ammonites, and had ſoiourned with him during all the troubles. Who being in this ſort aſſembled before him, Godolias counſelled to remaine in that countrey without any feare of the Babylonians, promiſing that in manuring their land, they ſhould incurre no inconuenience. All which he confirmed vnto them by an oath, adding further, that if any diſturbance were offered to any man, hee would readily aſſiſt him. Hee gaue each one this aduice likewiſe, to inhabite any City that beſt liked them; promiſing them to ſend them thither, with ſuch things as appertained to them, to build them houſes and furniſh their habitation; promiſing them that when time ſerued, hee would make their prouiſion of corne, wine, and oyle for their maintenance during the winter time: which when he had propoſed theſe conditions vnto them, hee gaue them leaue to depart, and inhabite the country whereſoeuer they beſt liked. Now when the rumour ran amongſt the people of Iudæa, that Godolias had thus courteouſly entertained thoſe that were fugitiues, & how he had permitted them to inhabite & till the countrey (prouided that they payd their tribute to the Babylonian) diuers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the countrey. And Iohn and the other Gouernours being with him, and aſſured both of his clemencie and courteſie, began entirely to loue him. For which cauſe they told him, that Bathal King of the Ammonites had ſent Iſmael to murther him by ſome treachery, that by that means he might haue the dominiõ ouer the Iſraelites that remained, in that he was of the blood royall. Aſſuring him, that the meanes of his deliuerance from that treaſon, was, if ſo be he would command them to kill Iſmael in ſecret: aſſuring him on the contrary ſide, that they feared, that if Iſmael ſhould happen to kill him, their whole nation that remained, was like to fall to vtter ruine. But Godolias told him plainly, that theſe ſtratagems they intended, were practiſed againſt a man that had receiued pleaſure at his hands; and that it was not likely that he whom he had ſuccoured during the time of his neeeſſitie, would be ſo wicked or impious againſt his benefactor, as to attempt to murther him, whom in any occaſion or neceſſitie he could not, but to his great ſhame and indignity, either flie or forſake. Yea, ſaid he, although thoſe things were true which you informe me of, yet had I rather die, then oppreſſe a man that hath committed his life to my truſt. For which cauſe Iohn and the reſt (ſeeing their perſwaſions were in vaine) departed from him. Some thirty daies after, Iſmael (accompanied with ten men) came to Maſphath to Godolias, who receiued them with preſents and magnificent entertainment, ſo that to expreſſe to Iſmael and his companions how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk ſo hard that he was ſomwhat ouerſeen with wine. Now when Iſmael perceiued him to be in that key, and ouerloaden with drinke and ſleepe, hee ſtept vnto him with his ten aſſociates, and cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him company at the banquet: after which murther, he iſſued out by night and ſlew all the Iewes that were left in the city, & thoſe Babylonian ſoldiers alſo that were left in garriſon in that place. The next day there came foureſcore men of the countrey to Godolias with preſents, being vtterly ignorant of that which had hapned. Iſmael knowing them, called them vnto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as ſoone as they were entred, he locked the court and ſlew them, and afterwards caſt their bodies into a deepe ditch, to the intent they might not be diſcouered. there were ſome that eſcaped, who beſought him that they might not bee put to death, before they had deliuered certaine mooueables, garments and corne that they had hidden in the field: which when Iſmael vnderſtood, he ſpared them: but he kept them priſoners that were in Maſphath, with their wiues and children, in the number of whom were the daughters of Sedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired backe againe to the King of the Ammonites. Iohn and the gouernours of his company, vnderſtanding of the acts committed by Iſmael in Maſphath, and aboue all, of the murther of Godolias, they were wonderfully diſpleaſed: ſo that each of them aſſembling his priuate force, iſſued forth to purſue and perſecute Iſmael, whom they ouertooke neere vnto a fountaine in Hebron. The priſoners that were with Iſmael, ſeeing Iohn his confederates, tooke courage, ſuppoſing that it was ſome ſuccors that came to help them, and forſooke him that led them, and began to ioyne with Iohns followers; and thus fled Iſmael with his eight men, to the King of the Ammonites. Iohn gathering together all thoſe whom he had reſcued from Iſmaels hands, both Eunuches, women, and children, retired into a certaine place called Mandra, where he ſojourned all that day, reſoluing from thence to depart into Ægypt, fearing leſt the Babylonians ſhould put him to death, if they ſhould remaine in Iudæa, for that they would be diſpleaſed with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the gouernment.

Iohn releaſeth Iſmaels captiues.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with theſe deliberations; they addreſſed themſelues to the Prophet Ieremie, beſeeching him to enquire of God, and to certifie them, what it behooued them to do in this their doubtfull eſtate, binding themſelues by an oath to do that which Ieremy ſhould command them. Heereupon the Prophet promiſed that hee would aske counſell of God for them: and ſome ten dayes after, God appeared vnto him, and willed him to certifie Iohn, the gouernours, and the reſt of the people, that if they inhabited Iudæa, he would aſſiſt them, and haue care of them, and keepe them ſo, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) ſhould doe them no harme: but if they departed into Ægypt, he would abandon them, and would be ſo incenſed againſt them, that he ſhould thrall them in the like miſerie, as their brethren had indured in times paſt. Whileſt the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not beleeue him, in that he commanded them to remaine in that place by Gods preſcript ordinance: but they imagined that vnder a falſe pretext of Gods command, hee had counſelled them thereto, but that in effect he ſpake in fauour of his diſciple Baruch, perſwading them to ſtay there, to the end they might be conſumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counſell which God gaue them by the Prophet: both Iohn and the reſt of the multitude went into Ægypt, and led with them both Baruch and Ieremie. Whither they were no ſooner come, but God told rhe Prophet, that the Babylonian ſhould lead his army into Ægypt; for which cauſe he willed him to foretell the people that Ægypt ſhould be deſtroied, and that they ſhould partly be ſlaine in that place, and partly led captiue to Babylon. Which came in like manner to paſſe: for in the fift yeere after the deſtruction of Ieruſalem (which was the three and twentieth yeere of the raigne of Nabuchodonoſor) Nabuchodonoſor in his owne perſon led his army into Cœloſyria, and hauing conquered the ſame, he made war vpon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought theſe nations vnder his obeiſance, he went and fought againſt the King of Ægypt, and ouercame him: and after he had ſlaine their King that gouerned at that time, and planted another in his place, hee afterwards tooke the Iewes that he found in that countrey, and carried them priſoners into Babylon. By this meanes we haue learned that the eſtate of the Hebrewes being brought to this point, hath bin tranſlated twice to the other ſide of Euphrates. For the people of the two tribes, were captiued by the Aſſyrians, during the raigne of Oſeas; and conſequently that of the two tribes vnder Nabuchodonoſor King of the Babylonians and Chaldees vpon the taking in of Ieruſalem. True it is that Salmanazar, after he had diſplaced the Iſraelites, planted the Cutheans in their place, who beforetime inhabited the innermoſt of the countries of Perſia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian hauing led the two tribes priſoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

Iohn asketh counſaile of God, and being informed, refuſeth the ſame.

Ier. 42. 43.

The prophecy of the Babylonian armie, and the Iewes captiuitie.

The yeer of the world, 3361. before chriſts Natiuity, 603.

For this cauſe, Iudæa, Ieruſalem, and the Temple, remained deſart for the ſpace of ſeuentie yeeres: and all the time that paſſed betweene the captiuity of the Iſraelites, vntill the deſtruction of the two tribes, was a hundred and thirty yeeres, ſix moneths, and ten dayes. But Nabuchodonoſor choſe the moſt nobleſt young men amongſt the Iewes (and ſuch as were allied to King Sedechias, and eſteemed likewiſe for the good diſpoſition and faire proportion of their bodies and faces) and committed them to maſters to bee inſtructed, commanding that euery one of them ſhould be gelded, according as they were accuſtomed to deale with yong children of other Nations, whom he ſubdued by force. He allowed them victual from his owne table, and they were taught and inſtructed in the diſcipline of the countrey, and in the Chaldee tongue. Theſe were very apt to learne wiſedome: and for that cauſe hee commanded that they ſhould be trained vp in the exerciſe thereof. Of theſe were foure of Zedechias kindred, faire in body, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias; whoſe names the Babylonian changed, and willed them to be called by other names, diſtinct and different from their owne. Daniel was called Balthaſar; Ananias, Sidrach; Miſael, Miſcah; and Azarias, Abdenago. Theſe did the King eſteeme very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attaine vnto learning and wiſedome, wherein they profited greatly, & were for that cauſe highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinſmen thought good to liue auſterely, and to abſtaine from thoſe meats that came from the Kings table, and in generall from all things that had life, they went to Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge ouer them) beſeeching him to conuert thoſe meates to his owne vſe, which were ſent them from the Kings table, and allowe them herbes and dates, and ſuch things as had no life; becauſe they intended to hold that courſe of life, and to forſake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condiſcend vnto their demands; but that hee feared, leſt being called for by the King, they ſhould be found to be leane in body, and diſcoloured in face (for without doubt following that diet, they muſt needly loſe their colours, and be leſſe diſpoſed in compariſon of others) which might bee the cauſe to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiuing that Askenas intended nought elſe but his ſecuritie, perſwaded him to allow them but ten daies of approbation, vnder condition, that if by that regiment of diet, their habitude of body ſhould not bee any waies altered, they might continue in that faſhion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they ſhould be found leane and weake, and leſſe proportionable (then they that fed vpon the Kings allowance) that then they ſhould returne to their accuſtomed diet. Now it ſo fel out, that not only their bodies were better in growth, but they ſeemed rather better fed, and of a taller ſtature then the reſt: ſo that they that liued vpon the Kings ordinarie, ſeemd leane and weariſh; whereas Daniel and his companions made ſhew, as if they had beene nouriſhed with dainties, and brought vp in aboundance. From that time forward, Askenas tooke all that which was allowed the foure young men from the Kings table, and boldly kept it to himſelfe, giuing them in ſtead thereof, the diet that they choſe and delighted in. They hauing their ſpirits more pure and ſubtill to comprehend their maſters inſtructions, and their bodies more ſtrong to endure labour (for their ſpirits were not charged with diuerſities of meates, nor their bodies effeminated for the ſame cauſe) attained the more readily to all that doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrewes & Chaldees: Daniel eſpecially hauing profited in wiſedome, ſtudied the interpretation of dreames, and God appeared vnto him. Two yeeres after the ſurprizall of Ægypt, King Nabuchodonozor dreamed a wonderfull dreame, the iſſue whereof God made him ſee in a dreame: but he forgate the ſame when he aroſe out of his bed. And for that cauſe ſent he for his Chaldees and diuines, telling them that hee had dreamed a dreame, but that hee had forgot the ſame, commanding them to declare vnto him what the dreame was, and the ſignification therof alſo. Whereunto they anſwered, that it was impoſſible for men to ſound out the ſecret therof; notwithſtanding they promiſed him, that if he would declare his viſion vnto them, they would cauſe him to vnderſtand the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonozor threatned them with death, except they repreſented his dreame vnto him; and they proteſting that they could not fulfill his requeſt, hee commanded them all to be ſlaine. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions had part in that danger, addreſſed himſelfe to Ariochus the captaine of the Kings guard, requiring him to informe him, for what cauſe the King had adiudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: And hauing intelligence what had hapned as touching the dreame, & how the king by forgetting the ſame, had charged them to inform him therin, & how they had anſwered that it was impoſſible for them to performe the ſame, & how thereby they had prouoked the King to diſpleaſure: he beſought Ariochus to go vnto the King, and to procure one nights reprieue in the behalfe of the Ægyptians and Chaldees, in that hee hoped during that night time to beſeech God, and intreat from him both the dreame and the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King what Daniel had requeſted, who reſpited the execution of the Magicians for that night, vntill he might ſee what would become of Daniels promiſe: who retiring himſelfe with his companions into his chamber, beſought God all the night long to manifeſt vnto him the dreame, and deliuer the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom both he and the reſt of his companions companions were like to die, except he might know what the King had dreamt the night past, and what was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (hauing compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniels wisedome) signified vnto him both the dreame and the signification thereof, to the intent the King might bee resolued in the meaning thereof.

Daniel hauing receiued the truth from God, arose very ioyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gaue them courage and hope of life. Hauing therefore rendred thankes vnto God, for that he had had compassion of their younger yeeres, as soone as it was day he went vnto Arioch, requesting him that he might bee brought to the Kings presence, certifying him that he would open vnto him the dreame which he had seene the night past. Now when Daniel was brought vnto the Kings presence, he besought him that hee would not esteeme him to bee more wise then the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his dreame, hee did attempt to expresse the same: for that came not to passe, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had compassion on vs that were in danger of death; and at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my country-men life, he hath certified me both of your dreame, and the signification thereof. I was not so much aggrieued, for that in our innocency wee were adiuged to death by thee, as affraid of thine estimation and glory, which was hazzarded by condemning so many, and so innocent and iust men to death: whereas that which you haue required of them, sauoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the onely worke of God: Whilest therefore thou thoughtest in thy selfe, who it was that should command the whole world after thy selfe; at such time as thou wert asleepe, God intending to let thee know all those that should gouerne after thee, presented thee with this dreame. It seemed vnto thee that thou sawest a great statue, whereof the head was of gold; the shoulders & armes of siluer; the belly and thighs of brasse; and the legges and feete of yron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was drawne from a mountaine) that fell vpon the statue, and beat downe and burst the same, and left no whole piece thereof: so that the gold, siluer, yron, and brasse, were powdred as small as dust: whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was borne away and scattered into diuers countries: on the other side the stone grew so mightie, that it seemed to fill the whole earth. This was that vision that appeared vnto you, the signification whereof is expressed after this manner: The head of gold signifieth your selfe (and those Kings of Babylon that haue been before you.) The two hands & shoulders signifie that your Empire shall be restored by 2. Kings, the one part by the King of the East, cloathed in brasse, whose force shall be abated by another power, resembling that of yron; & he shall haue the power ouer the whole earth, by reason of the nature of yron, which is more strong then gold, siluer, or brasse, he told the King also what the stone signified. But for mine owne part; I thought it not expedient to expresse in this place: because the only butte and intent of my writings is only to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man haue a desire to know these things; & cannot bridle his curiositie, but wil vnderstand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shal find amidst the sacred scriptures. When King Nabuchodonosor had heard those things, & remembred himselfe of his dream, he was astonished at Daniels wisedome, & casting himselfe prostrate on the earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giuing direction that sacrifice should be offered vnto him, as if he were God. Moreouer, he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdome to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their maligners and detractors, hapned to fall into most imminent and dreadfull danger, vpon the occasion that ensueth. The King built a golden Image sixtie cubites high, and sixe in bigneſſe, and erected it in a great Plaine neere vnto Babylon: and being readie to dedicate the same, he assembled all the gouernours and Princes of his countries, commanding them first of all, that as soone as they should heare the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselues on the earth to adore the statue; threatning that whosoeuer should doe the contrarie, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue vpon the sound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his companions vtterly refused to performe that dutie, alledging for their iustification, that they would not transgresse the lawes of their country: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods prouidence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burne during their aboade in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies, bodies, that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made them in greater estimation with the King, for that hee saw they were vertuous and beloued of God: and for that cause they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the king saw another vision in his sleepe, which signified vnto him, that being cast from his Empire, he should conuerse with sauage beasts, and that hauing liued in that estate in the desart, for the space of seuen yeeres, he should recouer his kingdome againe. Hauing had this dreame, he assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them, either to finde out, or declare the intelligence of this dreame vnto the King: Onely Daniel discouered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the king passed the forelimited time in the desart, so that no man durst intermeddle with the affaires of estate during seuen yeeres. But after he had called vpon God, that it would please him to restore him to his kingdome, he repossessed the same againe. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particularities, according as I haue found them written in holy bookes: for in the entrance of my history I haue answered those objections: so that I haue openly protested, that I will onely faithfully translate the Hebrew Histories into the Greeke tongue: and according to my promise, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine owne, or concealing ought of another mans.

After that Nabuchodonosor had raigned forty three yeeres, he dyed: he was a man of execution, and more happy then any of his predecessors. Berosus maketh mention of his actes in the third booke of the Chaldaique History, where he speaketh thus. His Father Nabuchodonosor, hauing notice that the Gouernour whom hee had appointed ouer Ægypt, and the neighbouring parts of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, was reuolted from him (being at that time in himselfe vnable to indure the troubles of warre) committed a part of his forces vnto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, who was in the flower of his age, and sent him forth against him: who encountring the Rebell, and fighting with him, ouercame him, and brought the countrey vnder his subjection. Meanewhile, Nabuchodonosor the father dyed of a sickneſſe in Babylon, after hee had raigned one and twentie yeeres. Nabuchodonosor the Sonne, hauing notice of his Fathers death, gaue order to the affaires of Ægypt, and the rest of the countrey: and committing the care and transportation of the Iewes, Syrians, Ægyptians, and Phœnicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his army and carriage, he with a few men made hastie iourneyes thorow the desart. And when he had taken the administration of the kingdome vpon him (which in his absence was in the hands of the Chaldees, and by their Chiefetaine was reserued vntill his returne, vnto his vse) he became Lord of all his Fathers Empire. When his prisoners were arriued, he assigned them conuenient dwelling places in the countrey of Babylon; and with the spoiles of warre, he magnificently repaired and decked the Temple of Bell, and other places. He enlarged the olde Citie, and repaired and beautified it with other buildings: by meanes whereof, they that would besiege the same, were hindred from cutting off of the current of the riuer, to the prejudice of the inhabitants. He enuironed it inwardly with a trebble wall, and outwardly with as mighty and as many encloſures, and made all of burnt bricke. The walles were magnificently builded, and the gates brauely adorned in manner of Temples. He caused a Palace to be builded neere vnto his Fathers ancient Palace: the magnificence and ornament whereof, I am too weake witted to expresse; onely this thing most memorable, I haue thought good to note downe, that these huge, great and pompous Buildings were finished in fifteene dayes. In this Palace he had vaults raised so high, that in outward appearance they seemed to be mountaines, on which all sorts of trees were planted. He deuised and prepared also a goodly garden, and called it the hanging garden, because his wife (hauing beene brought vp in the countrey of Media) desired to haue a place conformable to that of her birth. Megasthenes in the fourth booke of his Indian Historie, maketh mention of this garden in that place, where he enforced himselfe to prooue, that this King surpassed Hercules im valour and execution of worthy actions. For he said, that Nabuchodonosor ouercame the chiefe Citie of Lybia, and a great part of Spaine. Diocles in the second booke of the Persian Historie, and Philostratus in his Phœnician and Indian Historie, make mention of this King, saying that he ouercame the citie of Tyre, at the end of thirteene yeeres; at such time as Ithobal raigned ouer the Tyrians. This is the summe of all that which the Historiographers write as touching this King.

The yeere of the world, 3382. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 582.

AFTER Nabuchodonoſors death, his ſonne Euilmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incontinently deliuered Iechonias King of Ieruſalem out of priſon, and held him in the number of his moſt eſteemed friends, and gaue him preſents, and committed the gouernment of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his father had not kept his promiſe with Iechonias, when he ſurrendred himſelfe, his wife, children, and friends into his hands, in the behalfe of his countrey, and to the intent that the Citie of Ieruſalem ſhould not be razed by thoſe that beſieged it, as wee haue heretofore declared. Euilmerodach died in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, and Nigliſar his ſonne obtained the kingdome, which he poſſeſſed fortie yeeres, and afterward died. After him the ſucceſſion of the kingdome came vnto his ſonne called Laboſardach, which continued in him but for the ſpace of nine moneths, and after his death it came vnto Balthaſar, who by the Babylonian was called Naboandel. Againſt him Cyrus King of Perſia, and Darius King of Media made warre; and at ſuch time as he was beſieged in Babylon, there hapned a maruellous and prodigious ſpectacle.

Euilmerodach releaſeth Iechonias from his long impriſonment. 4. Reg. 25. Ierem 52. Nigliſar. Laboſardach. Balthaſar, or Naboandel King of Babylon.

Balthaſar ſate vpon a certaine feſtiuall in a royall chamber, where he was ſerued with great ſtore of veſſell fit for his maieſtie and royaltie; and with him at the banquet there ſate his concubines, and moſt intireſt friends. At which time (to ſhew his magnificence) hee cauſed thoſe veſſels to be brought out of the temple of his god, which Nabuchodonoſor his predeceſſor (fearing to imploy to his owne vſe) had ſtored vp in his idols temple. But Balthaſar was ſo puffed with pride, that he dranke out of them, and imployed them to his vſes. Now ſo came it to paſſe, that whileſt he quaffed, and blaſphemed the name of God, he ſaw a hand iſſuing from a wall, which wrote in the ſame certaine ſyllables: by which viſion being ſomewhat terrified, he aſſembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and all that ſort of people (who amongſt thoſe barbarous nations made profeſſion to interpret prodigies and dreames) to the intent they might ſignifie vnto him the meaning and vnderſtanding of that writing. Now when theſe Magicians had told him that they could in no ſort ſound or vnderſtand the ſame, the King was ſore vexed and troubled at this vnexpected viſion: whereupon hee cauſed it to be proclaimed thorow his countrey, that whoſoeuer ſhould reade that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would giue him a golden chaine, a purple robe (ſuch as the King of Chaldees wore) and beſides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magicians aſſembled together with greater concourſe, and were farre more diligent and inquiſitiue to finde out the ſignification of the writing: but they were no leſſe grounded therein then they were at the firſt. Meane-while, the Kings grandmother ſeeing him wholly amated in minde, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certaine man amongſt the priſoners of Iuda, led thither at ſuch time as Nabuchodonoſor deſtroyed Ieruſalem, whoſe name was Daniel, a man wiſe and expert in ſearching out of things that were impoſſible, and onely knowne vnto God, who euidently expounded that which Nabuchodonoſor required, at ſuch time, as no other man could ſatisfie his demand. Whereupon the King called him vnto his preſence, and telling him what proofes he had heard of his wiſedome, & of that diuine ſpirit that was in him, and how he only was fit to interpret thoſe things which otherwiſe were obſcured from other mens knowledge; he prayed him to informe him what that hand-writing ſignified, promiſing him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chaine, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with theſe titles for his wiſedome, he might grow famous amongſt all men, who demanding the reaſon, ſhould know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refuſing all theſe preſents of his, in that the wiſedome that is giuen from aboue, is not corrupted thereby, but is freely anſwerable to thoſe that haue need thereof) told him that that writing did foretell him the end of his life, becauſe he had not learned to feare God, neither to lift vp his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithſtanding he had ſeene the chaſtiſement wherewith his predeceſſor had beene puniſhed, for the outrages he committed againſt God. For that Nabuchodonoſor hauing beene driuen to lead his life amongſt beaſts by reaſon of his impieties, after diuers requeſts and ſupplications had obtained mercy, and was returned vnto humane conuerſation, and into his owne kingdome, for which cauſe all the time of his life he praiſed Almighty God the gouernour of all things: whereas hee had omitted to doe the like, and had blaſphemed the name of God in diuers ſorts, and had ſwilled both himſelfe and and his concubines in the vessels dedicated to God: For this cause God was displeased with him, and certified him by this writing, what end he should expect. Whereupon he expounded the writings in these tearmes: Mane (which is as much to say, as number) sheweth that God hath numbred the daies of thy life and dominion, which shall endure but a little while. Thekel signifieth a ballance; God therefore (said he) waying the gouernment, sheweth that it shall be ouerthrowne: Phares, this word signifieth a fragment, God shall breake thy kingdome, and shall diuide it amongst the Medes, and Persians. When the King had heard this interpretation, he was very sorrowfull (according as the nature of things so disastrous, and so apparant required.) Notwithstanding he delaied not to performe those presents which hee had promised the Prophet, although (as he well perceiued) the words aboaded him ill, and gaue him all that which he promised him, considering with himselfe, that it was his owne destinie that he ought to accuse, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithstanding they were very vnsauory in his eare. Not long after, this Balthasar and the Citie were ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus King of Persia and his army. For this was that Balthasar, vnder whom, and in the seuenteenth yeere of whose raigne, the surprizall of Babylon hapned. This as farre as I could gather, was the end of King Nabuchodonosors posteritie.

Babylon surprized by Cyrus King of Persia.

Darius, who (with his allie Cyrus) had destroied the estate of the Babylonians, was threescore and two yeeres old at such time as he tooke Babylon. Hee was Astyages sonne, and is otherwaies called by the Greekes. He tooke the Prophet Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him neere vnto him, doing him much honour: for he was of the number of the three gouernors whom he constituted ouer three hundreth and threescore Prouinces; for so had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloued by Darius, and onely trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grieuously hated: for they are most hainously hated, who haue greatest interest in Princes fauours. Whereas therefore they that were iealous of the good esteeme which he had with Darius, sought occasion to calumniate and backbite him, he warily cut off all opportunitie thereof; for he would neither be bribed with siluer, nor corrupted with presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonesty, to receiue gifts after a man had done any courtesies. He therefore gaue his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. Yet notwithstanding, they seeing they could finde no hole in his coate, whereby his honour might be touched, blamed, or calumniated, they sought out a new meanes to disgrace him. For they perceiuing that Daniel did thrice euery day make his prayer vnto God, they supposed that they had found a iust pretext to worke his ruine. For which cause they came vnto Darius, certifying him that the Princes and Gouernors had concluded together to this effect: That, for thirty dayes space an intermission should be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawfull for them to demand any thing, neither of himselfe, or of any man or god whatsoeuer; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered that he should be cast into the Lyons denne. But the King perceiuing not the drift of their malice, nor how they sought by this deuice to entrap Daniel, told them that he liked of the decree, and promised to confirme the same, and propounded a publike edict, wherein the Princes resolutions were ratified. Now whilest all men endeuoured through feare, carefully and diligently to obserue this edict, Daniel set light thereby, and according to his accustomed manner standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed vnto him. Whereupon the Princes (hauing got that occasion which they long expected) came readily vnto the King, and accused Daniel for that he only amongst the rest had presumed to infringe their decree: vrging moreouer, that he did it not for the religion sake that was in him, but because he was obserued and watcht by his maligners. And for that they feared lest Darius by reason of the great affection he bare vnto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding he had transgressed their edict) they concluded vpon no milder iudgement, but that he might be cast into the Lyons denne, according to the forme of the edict. Darius hoping that God would deliuer Daniel, and that no harme should befall him by the iawes of wilde beasts, exhorted him patiently to endure that aduenture. Now as soone as he was cast into the denne, the King sealed vp the stone that closed the mouth therof, and departed, spending all that night without repast or repose, so grieuously was he distempered in Daniels behalfe. And when the day was come, as soone as he arose, he came vnto the den, and finding the seale vnbroken wherewith he had marked the stone, he opened the same, and called vnto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were whole and in safetie. He hearing the King speake, answered, that he had receiued no hurt: whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lyons denne. His aduersaries perceiuing that Daniel had escaped all inconueniences ueniences (becauſe that God had taken care of him) would not that he ſhould eſcape: and thereupon told the King that the Lyons did neither touch nor approch Daniel, becauſe they had beene fed and gorged before. For which cauſe, the King diſpleaſed with their iniurious malice, commanded a quantitie of fleſh to be caſt vnto the Lyons; and when they were glutted, he willed that Daniels enemies ſhould be caſt among them, to the intent he might know whether the Lyons would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius ſaw very manifeſtly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as ſoone as the Nobles were caſt into the den, the Lyons ſpared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as if they had beene hungry and without meate. I ſuppoſe that theſe Lyons hauing beene a little before glutted with meate, did not annoy theſe men by reaſon of their famine; but I rather iudge that their malignity did whet on their fury: for when as God ſo pleaſeth, vnreaſonable creatures doe iuſtice vpon malignant and enuious men. Daniels aduerſaries being in this ſort exterminate and deſtroyed, Darius gaue notice hereof to all the ſubiects of his prouinces, praiſing that God whom Daniel adored; ſaying, that he was the onely true God, who had all power: he honoured Daniel likewiſe with eſpeciall regard, eſteeming him amongſt the chiefeſt of his familiars. Hee therefore being thus famous and admirable (becauſe he was beloued by God) builded in Ecbatane in the countrey of the Medes a magnificent Caſtle, and a maruellous monument that remaineth euen vnto this day, which ſeemeth to thoſe that looke thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that very day which they behold the ſame; the beautie thereof ſeemeth ſo liuing and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no ſort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they waxe old and are infeebled by yeeres, and loſe their beautie; at this day all the Kings of Media, Perſia, and Parthia, are intombed in this Caſtle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Prieſt, who is a Iew: and this cuſtome continueth euen vntill this day. Neither is that to be buried in ſilence, which is worthy eſpeciall admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicitie that was incident to a moſt famous Prophet, attended him; and during his whole life time hee was both moſt highly honoured by Kings, and reuerenced by the common ſort: and after his death his memory is perdurable. For all the bookes which he left in writing, are read amongſt vs euen at this preſent; and we haue beene perſwaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not onely prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets haue done) but alſo hath determined the time wherein thoſe things ſhould happen. And whereas other Prophets were accuſtomed to foretell aduerſities, and for that occaſion were miſliked both by Princes and their people, Daniel foretold them alwaies good ſucceſſe: ſo that hee hath drawne vnto him the good will of all men, by reaſon of thoſe pleaſing predictions that he pronounced; and by the iſſues thereof, hee hath obtained a teſtimony of truth, and a reputation likewiſe of diuinitie, and hath left vs certaine writings by which, he hath manifeſtly declared the immutabilitie and exact certaintie of his prophecies.

Daniels enemies rent in pieces by the Lyons.

Daniels prophecies.

It is ſaid, that being at Suſa the Metropolitane Citie of Perſia, at ſuch time as hee walked abroad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earth-quake with a great noiſe: ſo that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon being ſore troubled, he fell vpon his face, and both his hands: at which time ſome one touched him, and commanded him to ſtand vp, and to ſee that which ſhould happen to his countrey-men after diuers ages. Beeing therefore raiſed vpright, there was a great Ramme ſhewed vnto him, that had diuers hornes, the laſt whereof was the greateſt of all. Afterwards he looked towards the Weſt, and perceiued a Goat carried thorow the ayre, that butted at the Ramme, and hauing encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him vnder his feet. Thirdly, he ſaw a Goat, in whoſe forehead there grew one great horne onely: which being broken, foure others brake out in ſtead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure winds of the world. He hath written alſo, that from them, there ſhall ariſe another little one alſo, which as God (who preſented the viſion to him) told him, being growne to perfection, ſhould warre againſt the whole nation of the Iewes, and take the Citie by force, and confound the eſtate of the Temple, and hinder the ſacrifices, for one thouſand two hundred ninetie and ſixe daies.

Daniels viſion of the Ram and Goate, by whom the Kings of Media and Perſia were prefigured.

Dan. 2.

Daniel writeth that he ſaw theſe things in the field of Suſa, and hath declared that God himſelfe told him what that viſion ſignified; which was, that the Ramme ſignified the kingdomes of the Perſians, and the Medes: His hornes ſignified the Kings that were to raigne in thoſe kingdomes; and that the laſt horne ſignified the laſt King, who ſhould ſurpaſſe all the reſt in riches and glory. That the Goat ſignified, that there ſhould come a certaine King among the Greekes, who ſhould fight at two ſeuerall times with the Perſian, and ſhould ouercome him in warre; and after-afterwards possesse the whole gouernment: And that by the great horne that grew in the front of the Goate, the first King was represented; and how that after he was taken away, foure other should spring thereout. And whereas euery one of these turned themselues toward the foure corners of the world, it was a signe that after the death of the first, he should haue foure successors, that should depart the kingdome betweene them: who neither should be his allies or children; yet such notwithstanding as should command the world for many yeeres: That from them, there should arise a certaine King, that should oppose himselfe against the Hebrew Nation, and their lawes, and should ouerthrow their policie, spoile their Temple, and be a let that for three yeeres space the sacrifices should not bee solemnized. Now so hath it hapned, that our Nation hath beene so handled vnder Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseene, and hath written diuers yeeres before, all that which should happen.

At the same time Daniel wrote as touching the Empire of the Romanes, how it should destroy our nation: and hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them vnto him; so that they who reade and consider those things that haue hapned, admire Daniel for the honour that God dignified him with, and finde thereby that Epicures erre, who driue all diuine prouidence from humane life, and affirme that God gouerneth not the affaires of the world; or that the world is administred by a happy and incorruptible essence, which causeth all things to continue in their being: but say, that the world is managed by it selfe, by casualtie, without any conductor, or such a one as hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a soueraigne Gouernour (as wee see ships destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the winds; and charriots that haue no driuers to conduct them, to beate one against another) euen so should it perish, and should ruinate it selfe by such an irregular motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I iudge, that they are far estranged from the truth, that affirme that God hath no care of humane affaires; for if we see that all things happen casually, then happen they not according to his prophecie. But I haue written hereof according as I haue found and read: and if any one will thinke otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long him list.

CYRVS King of Persia dismisseth the Iewes from Babylon, and permitteth them to returne into their countrey, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

THE first yeere of the raigne of Cyrus (which was the seuentieth after that our nation was translated from Iudæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captiuitie and calamitie of his poore afflicted people: and euen as hee had foretold them before the destruction of the Citie, that after they had serued Nabuchodonosor and his posteritie for seuenty yeeres, he would againe restore them to their countrey wherein they were borne, where they should build a Temple, and enioy their former felicitie, so brought he it to passe. For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus, and made him write his Letters thorowout all Asia to this effect: Thus saith the King Cyrus: Since the Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world; I am perswaded that it is he whom the Iewish nation doe adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was borne, and hath said that I shall build his Temple in Ierusalem, which is in the countrey of Iudæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a booke of prophecie written by Esay, two hundred and ten yeeres before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reueale these things vnto him, speaking to this effect, I will that Cyrus, whom I haue declared King ouer many nations, shal send my people back into their country of Iudæa, & shal build my temple. These things did Esay foretell one hundreth and forty yeeres before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being rauished in admiration of the Maiesty of God) was surprized with an affection and zeale to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Iewes that were in Babylon, and told them that he gaue them licence to returne into their countrey, and to repaire the Citie of Ierusalem, and erect the Temple of God; promising them that he himselfe would assist them. And to that effect he wrote vnto his Gouernors, and Princes of those countries that confined vpon Iudæa: charging them to contribute both gold and siluer towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with cattell for the sacrifice. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, with all the Leuites and Priests departed thence, and repaired to Ierusalem: Neuertheless diuers of the Iewes remained in Babylon, in that they were loth to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soone as they came vnto the Kings friends, they affoorded them both fauour and aide, & furnished them with necessary matter to build the Temple, some of them with gold, other some with siluer, and the rest with a certaine number of oxen and horses. Thus payed they their vowes vnto God, and offered the sacrifices according to the ancient custome, as if the citie had bin new builded again, and the ancient seruice of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them backe also those vessels consecrated to God, which King Nabuchodonosor had sent vnto Babylon after he had spoiled the Temple; and deliuered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to Abassars hands, who should haue the custody therof, vntill the temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliuer them to the Priests & Princes of the people, to be restored again to the seruice of the temple. He sent letters also to the Gouernors of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King of Sisine, and Sarabasame, health. I haue permitted those Iewes that inhabit my countrey, to returne into their natiue countrey, and to reedifie their City, and erect the Temple of God in Ierusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I haue also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, with expresse charge & authority, to lay the foundations of the same, & to build it sixty cubits in height, and as many in bredth; making three Iles of hewne stone, & another of such timber as the country affoordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer sacrifice vnto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of all these things come out of my coffers. I haue also sent back those vessels which Nabuchodonosor tooke out of the Temple, & haue deliuered them to the treasurer Mithridates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, to be conueyed to Ierusalem, and restored to the Temple of God: the number whereof I haue hereunder subscribed. Fiftie lauers of gold, and foure hundreth of siluer; fifty pots of gold, & foure hundreth of siluer; fiftie golden sieues, & fiue hundreth of siluer; thirty Ewers of gold, and three hundreth of siluer; thirtie great viols of gold, and two thousand foure hundreth of siluer; and besides all these, one thousand other great

The Gouernours for the King doe hinder the building of the Temple.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2. 1 Eſd. 4.

WHILEST theſe men laid the foundations of the Temple, and were very affectionately buſie about the building thereof, the nations that bordered vpon them, and in eſpeciall the Chuteans (whom Salmanazar King of Aſſyria ſent from Perſia and Media to inhabit in Samaria, at ſuch time as he tranſlated the people of the ten Tribes) incited the Princes and Gouernours, to interdict the Iewes for raiſing and building their Citie, and re-edifying the Temple. Who corrupted with ſiluer, ſold their negligence, and delay to the Chuteans, which they vſed in thoſe buildings. For Cyrus intending his other warres, was ignorant hereof, and hauing conducted his armie againſt the Maſſagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finiſh his life. When as therefore Cambyſes his ſonne had obtained the kingdome, they of Syria and Phœnicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritanes wrote their Letters to Cambyſes in theſe termes: O King, thy ſeruants Rathymus the Secretary, Semelius the Scribe, and thoſe men that are Councellers in Syria and Phœnicia, giue thee to vnderſtand, that thoſe Iewes that were led captiue into Babylon, are returned backe into this countrey, and doe build a wicked and rebellious Citie, and repaire the places and walles of the ſame, and reedifie their Temple likewiſe. Know therefore that if theſe things be permitted to be finiſhed, that they will no more endure to be thy ſubiects and tributaries, but will oppoſe themſelues againſt their Kings, holding it more fit to command then to obey. Wee haue therefore thought good that whileſt they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their Temple, to write vnto your Maieſtie, to the intent you may not neglect to examine your Fathers records, wherein you ſhall alwaies finde that the Iewes haue beene Rebels, and enemies to their Kings; and that the Citie hath beene for this cauſe laid deſolate vntill this preſent. We haue thought good to ſignifie thus much to your Maieſtie, which perhaps is vnknowne vnto you, becauſe that if this Citie be once more re-inhabited and incloſed with a wall, your way is ſhut vp from paſſing into Cœloſyria and Phœnice.

CAMBYSES inhibiteth the Iewes to build the Temple.

WHEN Cambyſes had read this Letter (in that he was by nature both wicked and malicious) hee grew inwardly iealous and diſpleaſed at the contents thereof, and wrote backe againe after this manner: The King Cambyſes to Rathymus the Secretary of his caſuall euents, and to Belſem & Semelius Scribes, and to all his other Councellers and inhabitants in Samaria and Phœnicia, health. Hauing read your Letters, I haue commanded the Records of mine anceſtors to be examined, and I find that the City of Ieruſalem hath bin alwaies enemy to their Kings, and that the inhabitants thereof haue alwaies raiſed ſedition & wars. I haue likewiſe found, that their Kings haue bin mighty, and violent, and that they haue vexed Syria & Phœnicia with continuall tributes. For this cauſe I haue ordained, that the Iewes ſhall not be permitted to reedifie their Citie, for feare leſt their malice ſhould augment by ſuch occaſion which they haue continually vſed againſt their Kings. Incontinently after the receit and reading of theſe letters, Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and thoſe of their faction, tooke their horſe and rode haſtily to Ieruſalem, leading with thē a great number of people, prohibiting the Iewes from the building either of their Citie or Temple. CHAP. IIII.

DARIVS the Sonne of HYSTASPIS cauſeth the Temple to be builded.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. al. chap. 4. Darius the ſon of Hiſtaſpis made Emperour of the Perſians.

THIS Darius, during the time that he liued a priuate life, made a vowe vnto God, that if he obtained the kingdome, hee would ſend back vnto the Temple of Ieruſalem all thoſe veſſels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the ſame time, Zorobabel, who was appointed Gouernour ouer the captiue Iewes, came vnto him from Ieruſalem. For he was the Kings ancient friend: for which cauſe hee with other two were choſen to be of his guard; and obtained thereby that honur which hee expected. The firſt yeere of the raigne of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pompe and magnificence, both thoſe of his houſhold, as they alſo that were his Gouernours and Princes of Media and Perſia, and the Commanders in India confining vpon Æthiopia, with all the Chiefetaines of his Army, in one hundreth, twenty and ſeuen Prouinces. Now after they had made good cheere, and were full of wine, they departed each of them vnto their lodgings, to betake themſelues to reſt: But King Darius laid in his bed, repoſed very little all the night long, but paſſed the time without ſleepe: for which cauſe ſeeing he could take no reſt, he began to deuiſe & diſcourſe with three of his guard, promiſing him that ſhould moſt truely and aptly anſwer thoſe queſtions that he ſhould demand, to grant him licence in way of reward to weare a purple garment, & to drinke in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, & to ride on a chariot harniſed with gold, and to beare the Tiara or linnen wreath, and weare a golden chaine about his necke, and ſit in the next place to the King; and ſhould likewiſe be called his kinſman in regard of his wiſedome. After he had made theſe large promiſes, he demanded of the firſt, whether wine were the ſtrongeſt? of the ſecond, whether the King were ſtronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the moſt ſtrongeſt of the three? and as ſoone as he had deliuered them theſe queſtions to deliberate vpon, he laid him downe to reſt. Vpon the next morrow he ſent for the Princes, Chiefetaines, and Gouernours of Perſia and Media, and afterwards ſitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accuſtomed to determine the differences among his ſubiects, hee commanded thoſe three young men of his guard, in the preſence of that Princely aſſiſtance, publikely to yeeld the reſolution of thoſe queſtions he had propoſed vnto them.

Zorobabel.

Darius propoundeth three queſtions to three of his guard. 3. Eſd. 4.

Whereupon, the firſt of them began after this manner to expreſſe the force of wine. Noble Princes, when I conſider the force of wine, I find nothing that may ſurmount the ſame: for wine entangleth and deceiueth the vnderſtanding, and maketh the Princes vnderſtanding like to the poore mans, who is abandoned; and giueth the ſlaue that freedome in diſcourſe, which appertaineth to men of greateſt libertie: It maketh the poore reſemble the rich: it changeth & tranſformeth the ſoule, aſſwageth the miſerable mans griefe, and maketh the indebted forget their bonds, and to thinke themſelues very rich; ſo that they ruminate on no abiect things, but talke of talents, and ſuch things as appertaine vnto the richer ſort: it cauſeth them to loſe all apprehenſion both of Princes & Kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth them againſt their greateſt friends, and maketh them ſuppoſe their neereſt welwillers to be ſtrangers; & when the wine concocted by night and ſleepe hath forſaken them, they riſe and know not what things they haue committed in their drunkenneſſe.

The firſt expreſſeth the power of wine

When the firſt of them had in this ſort declared his reſolution, as touching wine, he was ſilent; and the next began to ſpeake of the Kings force, ſhewing that it was of mightie conſequence, and more powerfull then any other thing that ſeemeth to haue force and intelligence; and thus handled hee the ſubiect of his demonſtration. Kings (ſaith hee) haue dominion ouer men, who haue the abilitie to enforce the earth, at their pleaſure can command the ſea to ſerue them: Kings haue power and dominion ouer thoſe men who maſter and command the vntamed and mightieſt creatures; it therefore appeareth that their force and puiſſance exceedeth all theſe. If they command their ſubiects to wage warre, and to expoſe themſelues to danger, they are obedient: and if they ſend them out againſt their enemies, they willingly obey them by reaſon of their force: By their ordinance they leuell mountaines, beate downe walles, and raze towers. And if they they command their subiects to kill or to be kild, they resist not, for feare lest they should seeme to transgresse the Kings commandement. When they haue obtained the victory, all the glorie and profit of the warre redoundeth vnto the King. They likewise that beare no armes, but intend the tillage of the earth, after they haue trauailed and supported all the toile of their tillage, reape and gather the fruits, to the end to pay the King his tribute: And if hee will or command any thing, it must needly bee performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore when the King is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enioy his pleasant & delightfull rest, during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were tyed vnto him, through the feare and awe they haue of him: For not one of them dare forsake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their owne affaires, but intend those seruices onely which he thinketh necessarie, which is the guard of his person. Who therefore will not esteeme the Kings forces to be greater then any others, since so many people obey him in whatsoeuer, and whensoeuer he commandeth?

Zorobabel, the third, expresseth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palme vnto truth.

After he had spoken to this effect; Zorobabel, who was the third, began to iustifie in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner: True it is, that wine hath much force, and no lesse true that all men obey the King; yet farre more mightie is the power of a woman. For by a woman the King was bred, and brought into this world, and those men that plant the vineyards where wines doe grow, are borne and nourished by women; and generally there is not any thing which wee enioy not by them. For they weaue vs garments, they haue the care and custodie of our houses; neither is it possible for vs to be seuered from women. Yea, they that possesse much gold and aboundance of siluer, and other things of great and inestimable price; onely vpon the sight of a faire woman forsake all these things, and will follow after the beautie which they beheld, and for only possession thereof, content themselues to lose all things. We forsake likewise our father and mother, and the countrey that hath bred vs, and forget our friends for our wiues sake; yea, we will willingly content our selues to die with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonstration of the most mightie power of a woman. For whatsoeuer wee trauell for, all the paines that we endure both by land and sea, to the intent we may reape some fruits of our labours, doe we not carry all this to giue vnto our wiues, as vnto those who are our mistresses? I haue seene the King likewise, who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the eare, by Apame the daughter of Rhapsaces his concubine, and patiently endure when she tooke the Diadem from his head, and set it on her owne. When she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, hee was displeased: and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his affection to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilest the Princes in way of admiration beheld one another, hee began to discourse of truth, saying: I haue alreadie declared what the force of women is; yet notwithstanding both the King and they are more feeble then truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mightie, the heauen likewise of an immeasurable height, and the sunne of vnspeakeable celeritie; and whereas the will of God both gouerneth and moueth these things (because God is iust and true) it therefore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of al things; against which, iniustice may no waies preuaile. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seeme to be of value, yet are they mortall and of little continuance: but truth is immortall and euerlasting. Moreouer, all those things which we receiue thereby, are neither mortall, neither subiect to the iniuries of time, fortune, or alteration; but continue iust, and lawfull, and separated from all staine of iniustice. When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse: Whereupon, all the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most value, and that onely veritie had an immutable force, and an indeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to aske what he would, as touching that which he had promised to giue, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wisest, and best learned among the rest. For (said hee) thou shalt sit henceforth next vnto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

When the King had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vowe that the King had made, if so be at any time he obtained the kingdome: namely, that hee would build Ierusalem, and the temple of God, and restore those vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O King, is my request which you permitted me to aske, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was iudged wise and well lettered by you. The King tooke great pleasure at these words of his, and rising from his throne, kissed him. He wrote also vnto his gouernours and princes, that they should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the temple. Moreouer he sent letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, nicia, commanding them to cut downe the Cedars of Libanus, and to ſend them to Ieruſalem towards the building of the Citie; publiſhing a law that all Iewes ſhould be made free, if ſo be they would reſort into Iudæa; forbidding all Commiſſaries and Princes, to impoſe any charge vpon the Iewes, for the neceſſities of the kingdome; permitting that all the country which they might occupy, might be inhabited by them, and exempt from tributes: commanding the Idumæans, Samaritanes, and Cœloſyrians to reſtore thoſe lands vnto the Iewes which they vnlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And beſides that, to deliuer them in way of contribution fiftie talents of ſiluer towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary ſacrifice. He likewiſe commanded that all the neceſſaries and veſtments, which either the high Prieſt, or the ordinary ſacrificers vſed in the Seruice of God, ſhould be furniſhed at his charges. Hee willed alſo that the Leuites ſhould haue inſtruments of Muſicke deliuered vnto them, to praiſe God with; and that certaine portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the Citie, and the Temple. Moreouer he allowed them a certaine ſumme of money euery yeere for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he ſent backe all thoſe veſſels which Cyrus beforetime had reſolued to reſtore vnto Ieruſalem.

When Zorobabel had obtained theſe things abouenamed at the Kings hands, he iſſued out of the palace, and lifting vp his eies vnto heauen, he began to giue God thanks for the wiſdome and victory he had granted him, and for the good ſucceſſe he had giuen him in Darius preſence. For (ſaid he) O Lord, if thou hadſt not beene fauourable vnto me, I had not obtained it. After he had at this time, and in this ſort giuen thanks for the preſent, and praied God to ſhew himſelfe alwaies fauourable hereafter, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countrimen what good newes he had receiued from the King: who hearing the ſame, gaue God thanks alſo, who had reſtored them once more to the poſſeſſion of that countrey wherein they were borne: and they fell to feaſting and banquetting for ſeuen daies ſpace, for the reſtoring vnto their countrey, as if they had ſolemnized the feaſts of their birth daies. Anon after they made choice of thoſe Gouernours and common ſort, that (with their wiues, their children and horſes) ſhould returne vnto Ieruſalem, who by the aſſiſtance of Darius conuoy, performed that iourney to Ieruſalem with ioy and conſolation; playing on their Pſalteries, Flutes, and Cymbals; and were after this manner conducted on their way, with delight, by the number of thoſe Iewes that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward, being a certaine and determinate number of euery family. I haue not thought it meet to repeat theſe families name by name, for feare I ſhould confound my Story, and leſt the Readers ſhould any wayes be diſtracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithſtanding, the whole number of thoſe that went, and were aboue twelue yeeres old of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, were foure millions, ſixe hundreth, twentie and eight thouſand. There were likewiſe foure thouſand and ſeuentie Leuites: And of their wiues and children together, forty thouſand, ſeuen hundred, forty and two. Beſides theſe, there were of Singers of the tribe of Leui, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters, one hundred and tenne; and of ſacred ſeruants three hundred twenty and two. There were certaine others likewiſe, that pretended that they were of the race of the Iſraelites, yet could not they giue teſtimony of their deſcent; the number of whom were ſixe hundreth fiftie and two. Of the number of the Prieſts, they that had eſpouſed wiues (whoſe genealogie could not be deriued, and who were not found alſo in the genealogies of the Prieſts and Leuites) they were about fiue hundreth, twentie and fiue. The multitude of ſeruants that followed or attended on them, were ſeuen thouſand, three hundreth, thirty and ſeuen. There were alſo two hundreth, forty and fiue Singers of men and women: foure hundreth, thirty and fiue Camels; and fiue hundreth twenty and fiue other beaſts to carry their carriage. The Conductor of this abouenamed multitude, was Zorobabel the ſonne of Salathiel; deſcended of Dauids line, and of the tribe of Iuda; and Ieſus the ſonne of Ioſedech the high Prieſt: beſides which were Mardochæus and Serebæas, who were choſen by the people to be their Gouernours, who contributed one hundreth pounds of gold, and fiue hundreth of ſiluer. Thus the Prieſts and Leuites, and a part of all the people of the Iewes which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Ieruſalem; the other part of them following a little after, returned euery one into his owne countrey.

The ſeuenth moneth after their departure out of Babylon, the high Prieſt Ieſus, and the Gouernour Zorobabel ſent meſſengers thorow all the countrey, and aſſembled the people from all quarters of the region, who with all alacritie and expedition repaired to Ieruſalem. There erected they an Altar in the ſame place, where beforetime it was builded, to the end they might offer lawfull ſacrifices thereon, according to Moſes law: in which action of theirs, they yeelded little little content to their neighbour Nations, who in generall were incenſed againſt them. They celebrated alſo at that time the feaſt of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker had ordained: afterwards they offered oblations, and continuall ſacrifices, obſeruing their Sabbaths and all holy ſolemnities. And they that had made any vowes, performed the ſame, and ſacrificed from the new Moone vntill the ſeuenth moneth. After this they began to build the Temple, and deliuered great ſummes of money to the hewers of ſtone, and Maſons; and gaue ſtrangers their ordinary diet, who brought them ſtone and timber. For it was an eaſie matter for the Sidonians and an act well pleaſing vnto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to bind it, and gathering it together in rafters to ſhip it, and land it at the Port of Ioppa. For Cyrus had beforetime giuen them that commandement, and now the ſecond time they were inioyned thereunto by Darius.

The ſecond yeere after their arriuall in Ieruſalem, the Iewes aſſembled together in the ſecond moneth, and the building of the Temple went forward; ſo that hauing laid the foundation thereof in the firſt day of December, they builded vpon the ſame, the ſecond yeere. Ouer this worke thoſe Leuites that were aboue twentie yeeres of age, were ouerſeers: with them alſo was Ieſus, and his ſonnes and brothers ioyned, and Zolimiel the brother of Iuda the ſonne of Aminadab, and his ſonnes. And through the diligence that theſe ouerſeers of the Temple vſed, it was ſooner finiſhed, then it was expected. As ſoone as the Sanctuary was builded, the Prieſts apparelled in their accuſtomed habits, and the Leuites, and the ſonnes of Aſaph aroſe, and with trumpets praiſed God, according as Dauid firſt of all had ſet downe the manner of his ſeruice. The Prieſts and Leuites with the elders of the tribes (calling vnto their minds how great and precious the firſt Temple was, and beholding that which was builded vpon the preſent, farre inferiour to the precedent, and perceiuing how much the ancient wealth and dignitie of the Temple was abaſed; they were confuſed thereat, and being vnable to ouercome their paſſion, they burſt out into lamentations and teares. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any eſtimate or mention of the former Temple, they tormented not themſelues in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they vpon the difference and bigneſſe betwixt the preſent and that which ſtood in times paſt: yet notwithſtanding the Elders lamented, and the Prieſts complained, that the new erected Temple was farre leſſe then the former; yet the noiſe of the trumpets drowned their laments, and the ioyfull applauſes of the people their mournings.

The Samaritans deſirous to further the building of the Temple, are reiected.

The Samaritans hearing the noiſe of the trumpets, ranne out to know the cauſe thereof, in that they were lewdly affected towards the tribe of Iuda and Beniamin; and vnderſtanding that the Iewes which were returned from Babylon, had reedified the Temple, they addreſſed themſelues to Zorobabel and Ieſus, and to the chiefe gouernours of the families, requiring them that it might be lawfull for them to repaire the Temple with them; and to haue part in the building thereof. For (ſaid they) we honour God no leſſe then you, we pray vnto him and adore him; wee conforme our ſelues to your cuſtomes, euer ſince the time that Salmanazar King of Aſſyria remooued vs out of Cuthea and Media hither. To theſe demands of theirs, Zorobabel and Ieſus the high Prieſt and the Gouernours of the tribes anſwered, that it was impoſſible for them to admit their aſſiſtance in the building of the Temple, for that they had receiued their firſt commandement from Cyrus to performe the ſame, and afterwards from Darius: notwithſtanding they gaue them licence to adore therein, offering them that the Temple ſhould be common to both, if they pleaſed: yea and acceſſible to all other nations, that would repaire thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for ſo were the Samaritanes called) hearing this anſwer, were ſore offended; and perſwaded the other nations of Syria to require their Princes (who continued their authoritie ſince the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyſes time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Iewes, who were ſo intent and buſie in their worke. Whereupon Siſin Gouernour in Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came vnto Ieruſalem; and demanded of the Chiefetaines of the Iewes, by whoſe permiſſion they builded the Temple, which rather ſeemed to be a Fort then a Temple, and for what cauſe they fortified their Citie with gates and ſo ſtrong walles? Zorobabel and Ieſus the high Prieſt anſwered, that they were the ſeruants of the liuing God, and that their Temple had beene built by one of their Kings, who was opulent and ſurpaſſed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable eſtimation (by reaſon their fathers had committed impietie againſt God) Nabuchodonoſor King of Babylon and Chaldæa, hauing taken the Citie by force, deſtroyed the ſame; and after he had ſpoyled the Citie, he burned it, and tranſported the people captiue into Babylon.

The Samaritans ſuppoſe to hinder the building of the Temple.

The Syrian Princes examine the cauſe why the Iewes repaire their Citie and Temple.

But

A But after that Cyrus King of Perſia had obtained the Kingdome of Babylon, he commanded by his expreſſe letters ſealed with his royall ſeale, that they ſhould reedifie the Temple, & ordained that all that which Nabuchodonoſor carried from thence, as well gifts as veſſels, ſhould be deliuered to Zorobabel and the Treaſurer Mithidrates, to be conueied to Ieruſalem, and be placed againe in the Temple, as ſoone as it ſhould be builded. And he commanded alſo, that it ſhould be preſently reedified, willing Abaſſar to repaire to Ieruſalem, and giue order for al that which was requiſite; who reſorting thither as ſoone as he had receiued Cyrus letters, did ſpeedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward vntill this preſent it hath beene continued; but the ſubtilty and malignity of their enemy had wrought ſo much, that as yet it remained imperfect.

B If therefore it pleaſe you, and you thinke it good, ſignifie that you heare, by your letters to Darius, to the end that examining the regiſters of the Kings, he may finde that we are not faulty in any thing of that which we haue ſaid. When Zorobabel and Ieſus had anſwered to this effect; Siſin and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, vntill ſuch time as they had certified Darius hereof: for which cauſe they wrote vnto him preſently. Hereupon the Iewes were much diſcomforted and troubled, fearing leſt the King ſhould change his mind in reſpect of the building of Ieruſalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongſt them) began to perſwade them, willing them to feare no diſaſter from the Perſians, becauſe God had aſſured them: for which cauſe the people gaue credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

Aggeus and Zachary the Prophets.

C When the Samaritanes had in this ſort written to Darius, and accuſed the Iewes vnto him for fortifying their City, and reedifying their Temple, and how it ſeemed rather to be a fort, then ſome ſacred place, and had further alleadged that it would be no profit vnto him, and moreouer had produced Cambyſes letters, by which they were forbidden to build the temple; hee vnderſtood that the reeſtabliſhment of Ieruſalem ſtood not with the ſecurity of his ſtate. But when he had read Siſins letters and his aſſociates, he commanded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the Kings ſhould be ſearched, how the matter had paſt; and there was found in Ecbatane a city of the Medes, in a tower a certaine booke, in which theſe things were written. The firſt yeere of the raigne of Cyrus, commandement was giuen to build the Temple of Ieruſalem, & the Altar therein: It was likewiſe decreed, that the height of the Temple ſhould be ſixtie cubits, and the

D breadth as many; three ſtories of hewed ſtone, and one ſtory of the wood of that countrey: and it was ordained that the expence of that building ſhould be deducted out of the Kings reuenews. Moreouer he commanded, that reſtitution ſhould be made vnto the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, of thoſe veſſels that were taken away by Nobuchodonoſor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commiſſion to effect all theſe things, was giuen to Abaſſar Gouernour of Syria and Phœnicia, and his companions, to the end that they might depart from theſe places, and the Iewes might be permitted to build therin. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile and building ſhould be gathered out of the tributes of his countries, and that they ſhould furniſh the Iewes with buls, weathers, lambes, goates, flower, oyle, and wine, and all other things which the Prieſts ſhould thinke meet to offer ſacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preſeruation of

E the King of Perſia: commanding that they that ſhould tranſgreſſe or contradict this commandement of his, ſhould be laid hold on, and hanged on a Iibbet, and that their goods ſhould be confiſcate to the Kings vſe. Moreouer he beſought God, that if any man went about to hinder the building of the Temple, that he would puniſh him, and ſtrike him, and reſtraine his wickedneſſe thereby. When Darius had found theſe things written in his Panchartes and Chronicles, he wrote backe to Siſin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Siſin, and Sarabazan, with their aſſociates; health. Hauing found amongſt the memorialls of Cyrus the copy of your miſſiue, I haue ſent it you, and my pleaſure is that the contents thereof be executed. Fare you well.

Darius Epiſtle to the prefects of Syria.

F Siſin and his aſſociates being certified of the Kings pleaſure, reſolued themſelues conformably to execute the ſame: and taking the care of the ſacred buildings vpon them, they aſſiſted the Princes & Magiſtrates of the Iewes in ſuch ſort, as the building of the Temple was finiſhed with great diligence, by the inſtigation of the Prophets Aggeus and Zachary, according to Gods commandemennt, and by the directions of the Kings Cyrus and Darius: ſo that it was finiſhed within 7. yeers. In the ninth yeere of the raigne of Darius, and the three and twentie of the eleuenth moneth, called by vs Ader, and by the Macedonians Diſtre; the Prieſts and Leuites, and all the reſt of the people offered ſacrifices for the renouation of their former felicity, after their captiuity, and for their new Temple alſo: ſacrificing one hundred buls, two hundred ſheepe, foure hundred lambes, twelue goates, according to the number of the twelue tribes of Iſrael; and for the sinnes of each of them. The Priests and Leuites also (according to the lawes of Moses) appointed Porters to euery gate. For the Iewes had builded galleries round about, and within the Temple.

The yeere of the world, 3450. before the Natiuitie of Christ, 514.

Now when the feast of vnleauened bread (which is the feast of Easter) drew neere, in the first moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrewes, all the people of the townes round about Ierusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the feast; purifying both themselues, their wiues, and children, according to the ordinance of their forefathers: And after they had solemnized the feast called Easter, or the Passeouer in the 14. Moone, they banquetted for seuen dayes space, sparing no cost how great soeuer it were. They offred burnt offerings also, and sacrifices of thankesgiuing, acknowledging Gods goodnesse that had brought them home into their natiue countrey, to liue according to the lawes of their forefathers, and had made them gracious in the King of Persias eies. Thus dwelled they in Ierusalem in all ioy, sacrificing & seruing God with great affection, and liuing vnder the gouernment of their nobilitie. For the chiefest authority remained in the high Priests, vntill the Asmonæans obtained the kingdome: for before the captiuity of Babylon, they were vnder the gouernment of Kings, who began from Saul and Dauids times, about some fiue hundred, thirty, two yeeres, sixe moneths, and tenne dayes, and before their Kings certaine Gouernours called Iudges raigned: and vnder this sort of policy liued they more then fiue hundred yeeres; from the death of Moses and Iosuah. See here the estate of the Iewes deliuered from their captiuity, during the dayes of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mighty and malicious aduersaries, and did them many mischiefes, trusting in their riches, and pretending themselues to be the Persians kinsmen, because their originall proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that tribute, which the King had commanded them to disburse vnto the Iewes to make their sacrifices, and had their Gouernours likewise affectionate and forward to further their malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them mischiefe, either in themselues, or by others. For which cause, the Iewes determined to send Embassadours vnto King Darius, to accuse the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and foure others were sent. As soone therfore as the King vnderstood by these Embassadors, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritanes, hee dispatched his letters, and addressed them to the Gouernours and Councell of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. King Darius to Tangara and Sambaba Gouernors of Samaria, to Sadrach and Bobelon, and to their companions our seruants being in Samaria; health. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, Embassadours in the behalfe of the Iewes, accuse you to be perturbers of the building of their Temple; alleadging that you refuse to discharge that, which by my decree you ought to furnish them with, for the charge of the sacrifices. My will is therefore, that vpon the sight of these letters, you deliuer out of the royal treasury in Samaria, appointed for the tributes, all that which shall be necessary for them to performe their sacrifices, vpon the requests of the Priests, to the intent they let passe no day without sacrifice and prayer vnto God for me, and for the Persians. This was the contents of his letters.

CHAP. V.

Hegesippus Ruffinus, chap. 5. 2 Esdras 7.

AFTER Darius death; his sonne Xerxes succeeded him, not onely as heire in the gouernment of his kingdome, but also as successour vnto his piety and deuotion towards God: for he no waies changed those institutions of his fathers that concerned religious seruice, but with great beneuolence fauoured all the Iewes. During his raigne Ioacim the sonne of Iesus was High Priest: Amongst them also that remained in Babylon, there liued a High Priest with the Iewes in that place called Esdras; a iust man, and one of great reputation amongst the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the lawes of Moses, he obtained great friendship with the King. This man intending (with certaine other Iewes of Babylon) to make his repaire vnto Ierusalem, besought the King that he would vouchsafe to bestow his letters of commendations to the Gouernours of Syria in his behalfe. Wherupon the King wrote his letters pattents of grace, certifying his fauor towards Esdras, to the Princes in those parts, to this effect: Xerxes King of Kings, to Esdras the High Priest, and Reader of the diuine Law, health. It is decreed by me and seuen other of my Counsel, that whosoeuer in my kingdome of the Israelites, their Priests, or Le-uites will repaire with thee vnto Ieruſalem, hee may freely performe the ſame with my good licence, and reuiſite Iudæa according to the law of God; bearing with you thoſe preſents vnto the God of Iſrael, which both I & my friends haue vowed. I likewiſe giue thee licence to take with thee all the gold & ſiluer whatſoeuer, that any of thy nation liuing here in Babylon wil offer vp vnto God, to buy offrings to be ſacrificed vpon the Altar of thy God: and to make whatſoeuer veſſels of gold or ſiluer, which either thou or thy brethren ſhal think meet. Thoſe ſacred veſſels alſo which are giuen thee, thou ſhalt dedicate vnto thy God, & if there be ought elſe requiſite in this behalfe, that according to thy wiſdome ſhalt thou prouide, & the charges ſhalt thou receiue out of my treaſurie. I haue alſo commended thee to the Treaſurers of Syria and Phœnicia; and haue written to them, that whatſoeuer Eſdras the Prieſt and Reader of the law of GOD ſhall require, they ſhall preſently deliuer it him. And to the end that God may be fauourable to me and my children, my wil is, that a hundred meaſures of wheate be giuen vnto God, according to the law. I command you alſo that are Magiſtrates, that you exact nothing, neither impoſe any taxations on the Prieſts, Leuites, ſacred Singing-men, Porters, or holy officers. But thou Eſdras (according to the wiſedome giuen thee from aboue) ſhalt appoint Iudges, who ſhall in Syria and Phœnicia execute iuſtice vnto the people, according to the ſeruice of the law. Teach thou likewiſe freely al ſuch as are ignorant, ſo that whoſoeuer violateth either Gods or the Kings law, he may be fined, or elſe condemned to death, as not ſinning through ignorance, but of contumacie. Farewell.

When Eſdras had receiued this letter, hee was wonderfully contented, and beganne to adore God, confeſſing openly that it was he, who was the author of that fauour he had receiued at the Kings hands: for which cauſe he ſaid, that the only thankſgiuing appertained to him. And after he had read this letter vnto the Iewes that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the originall, but ſent the copy to all thoſe of his nation, being in the country of the Medes: who vnderſtanding of the Kings affection towards God, and his fauour towards Eſdras, were very ioyful; and diuers amongſt them tooke their goods & came vnto Babylon, deſiring to returne to Ieruſalem: but all the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leaue their quiet dwelling there. For which cauſe it came to paſſe, that two Tribes were vnder the obedience of the Romans in Aſia and Europe: but the tenne Tribes were on the other ſide of Euphrates, euen vntill this day; being many infinites of thouſands, whoſe number may not be comprehended. With Eſdras there departed a great number of Prieſts, Leuites, Porters, Singing-men, & ſeruants of the Temple. Now after that he had aſſembled thoſe of the captiuitie, that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſoiourned there three daies, he commanded them to ſolemnize a faſt, and to pray vnto God for his preſeruation, and that no euill might happen vnto him; and that neither their enemies nor any other might doe them any violence. For Eſdras had foretold the King, that GOD would be their Protector, & that therefore he required no conuoy of horſemen at his hand for his ſecuritie. After that they had recommended themſelues vnto God, they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt moneth of the ſeuenth yeere of the raigne of Xerxes, & arriued in Ieruſalem in the fift moneth of the ſame yeere. Whereupon, he incontinently preſented vnto the Treaſurers (who were of the race of the Prieſts) the ſiluer that was conſecrated, namely, ſixe hundreth and fiftie talents, of ſiluer veſſell a hundreth talents, of veſſell of gold twenty talents, of brazen veſſell (more precious then gold) waighing twelue talents. Theſe were the preſents of the King and his friends, and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras aſſembled the Iewes that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras repaireth to Ieruſalem, and committeth the veſſels and other precious preſents to the Treaſurers hands.

When Eſdras had deliuered theſe abouenamed preſents vnto the hands of the Prieſts, he offered burnt offerings vnto God, according to the law, namely, twelue Bulles for the publique conſeruation of the people, ſeuentie two Rammes and Lambes, & twelue Goates for the expiation of ſinne. And after them he deliuered the Kings letters to his Princes & Gouernours in Cœloſyria and Phœnicia: who beeing conſtrained to execute that which was enioyned them by the King, honored the Nation of the Iewes, & ſupplyed them euery waies in their neceſſities. This counſell had Eſdras himſelfe giuen of their departure But in my opinion God (hauing regard of his wiſedome and integritie) did happily aduance his deliberation.

Not long after this, there came certaine men vnto him, complaining that ſome of the people, Prieſts, and Leuites had tranſgreſſed againſt the policie, and broken the lawes of the Countrey, for that they had eſpouſed certaine ſtrange women, and confounded the race of the Prieſts: requiring him that hee would haue an inward regard to Gods ordinances, for feare leſt hee (conceiuing a generall hatred againſt them all) ſhould ſend them anew ſome grieuous calamities. For which cauſe Eſdras deuoured with ſorrow, incontinently rent his clothes, and tore his haire,

and pulled his beard, and caſt himſelfe vpon the ground, becauſe the principals among the people had part in that offence. And for that he feared leſt if hee ſhould command them to forſake their wiues, and thoſe children they had begotten by them, he ſhould not be obeyed, he perſiſted in griefe, and lay continually couched vpon the ground. Whereupon, al thoſe reſorted vnto him, who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him, for that which had hapned. Whereupon Eſdras (raiſing himſelfe from the earth, and lifting vp his hands to heauen) ſaid, that he was aſhamed to looke thereupon, becauſe the offences of the people were ſo hainous; who had forgotten the inconuenience that had befallen their forefathers for their impieties, beſeeching God that he would reſerue ſome remainder and ſeed of the aduerſity and captiuity, which at that time hapned vnto them, and that he would once more eſtabliſh them againe in Ieruſalem their natiue countrey: that he would take compaſſion on them, & grant them pardon for thoſe ſinnes which at that preſent were committed by them: for which though they deſerued death, yet hoped they in the mercies of God for their deliuerance. Whil'ſt thus both he and thoſe that came vnto him lamented round about him, with their wiues and children, a certaine man called Achonius, one of the principall men of Ieruſalem, repaired vnto him, & ſaid, that they had ſinned, becauſe they had eſpouſed ſtrange women; and perſwaded Eſdras to adiure them all, to baniſh both them and the children begotten by them; wiſhing that they, who obeied not the law, might be puniſhed. Eſdras (perſwaded by theſe words) made all the Princes of the Prieſts, Leuites, and tribes of Iſrael ſweare, that they would diſmiſſe their wiues and children, according to the counſaile of Achonius. And as ſoone as he had receiued their oathes, hee departed from the temple vnto Iohns houſe the ſonne of Eliaſib, and there ſpent he all the day without taſting any meate, by reaſon of the griefe which ſo inwardly hee had conceiued.

Eſdras praiers for the Leuits that had married ſtrangers. 1. Eſd. 9.

Whence therefore it was publiſhed by Edict, that all they that were returned from the captiuitie, ſhould repaire within two or three daies to Ieruſalem (vnder the penaltie that they, who defaulted therein, and came not within the prefixed time, ſhould be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiſcate to the publique treaſury of the temple, by the ordinance of the Prieſts) they of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin came thither within three daies, on the twentieth day of the ninth moneth, called by the Hebrewes Thebeth, and by the Macedonians Apellæus. And as ſoone as they were ſeated in the vpper part of the temple, in the preſence & aſſiſtance of the Elders, although the weather were very intemperate, by reaſon of the froſt; Eſdras aroſe & reproued them for that they had tranſgreſſed the law, in taking wiues vnto them, who were not of their nation: for which cauſe he told them, that if they would performe a matter that were agreeable vnto God, & profitable for themſelues, they ſhould diſmiſſe ſuch wiues. Whereupon with a loud voice, they all cried, that they would doe it willingly; but that there was no ſmall number of them, and that the time was winter, and the matter of that conſequence, as one or two daies could not end it: For which cauſe they thought it very needfull, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, ſome of the Princes who were free from that ſinne, with certaine other choſen Elders of euery place, ſhould make inquiſition of them that had married wiues contrarie to the preſcript of the law. Which being approued by them, about the new moone of the tenth moneth this inquiſition began, which continued vntil the new moone of the moneth enſuing: and there were many of the familie of Ieſus the high Prieſt, and of the Prieſts, Leuites, and Iſraelites, that (making more account of the obſeruation of the lawes, then of the naturall affections to their wiues and children) did preſently put away their wiues, and thoſe children they had by them, and ſacrificed certaine Rams for a peace offering vnto God: whoſe names it were a needleſſe matter to reckon vp in this place.

1. Eſdras 10.

When Eſdras had in this ſort reformed the errour committed by ſuch marriages, he ſo corrected the euill cuſtome thereof, that this confimation continued firme and irreuocable for euer. In the ſeuenth month, they ſolemnized the feaſt of tabernacles: wherto when all the people were reſorted, they al gathered together in an open place of the Temple towards the gate that looketh Eaſtward, requiring Eſdras that he would read Moſes ordinances vnto them; which he performed, and ſtanding vp in the midſt of the multitude, he read the law vnto them from the morning vntill noone. By which reading, not only for the preſent, but for the time to come, they learned that which was iuſt; & alſo calling to memorie that which was paſt, they were ſo diſcomforted, that the teares fell from their eyes, in thinking with thẽſelues, that if they had kept the law, they had not ſuffered any of thoſe euils, by which they had beene tormented. But Eſdras beholding them in that eſtate, willing each of them to repaire homeward, and to weepe no more, becauſe that day was a ſolemne & holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, becauſe it was forbidden.

The reading of Moſes law. 2. Eſd. 8.

Hee

He rather commanded them to intend their feasts and pleasures, assuring them that the repentance and griefe of those faults that were committed by them in times past, ought to serue them and instruct them to assure and defence themselues, to the end that heereafter they commit not the like. They following Esdras exhortation, began to celebrate the solemnity, and continued their feasts in their Tabernacles during eight dayes. After which time they returned euery one vnto his house, praising God in hymnes; and thanking Esdras for the amendment of those vnlawfull marriages that had hapned in their policy: who after he had gotten great honour among the people, finished his life, being loaden with yeeres, and was buried honourably in Ierusalem. About the same time also dyed Ioacim the high Priest, whose sonne Eliacim succeeded in his place.

2 Esdras 1.

After this it came to passe that a certaine man that was one of the captiue Iewes, and king Xerxes Butler called Nehemias, walking before the citie of Susa (which was the Metropolitane Citie of Persia) heard certaine strangers that came from farre: who vpon their entrie into the Citie, deuised the one with the other in the Hebrew tongue; for which cause he drew neere vnto them, and asked them whence they came. Who returning him this answer, that they came from Iudæa: he began to demand of them againe, of the estate of Ierusalem, their natiue City, and how the people fared. To whom they answered, that they were in very bade estate, and that their City wals were conuerted to dust and razed, & that the nations round about them afflicted the Iewes with many outrages, in making inrodes into their countrey, and spoiling them daily, not sparing them by night; so that diuers of them were led away prisoners; yea some Citizens of Ierusalem; and that daily the high wayes were found full of dead bodies. Heereupon Nehemias beganne to weepe (thorow the inward compassion he had of his distressed brethren) and looking vp towards heauen: How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our nation thus afflicted without taking care of vs? Behold how we are made a prey to all men. Whil'st thus he walked before the gate, and lamented bitterly, newes was brought him that the King was ready to sit down to his meate: For which cause he gaue attendance according to his office, and serued the King dutifully, during his time of repast. As soone as supper was done, the King grew pleasant and ioyfull, and casting his eyes vpon Nehemias (whom he perceiued to be heauie and disconsolate) he asked him what hee ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God to giue him grace and perswasiue speech to discourse vnto the King) answered: O King, how is it possible that I should be other but discomforted, and that griefe should not pierce euen vnto the very center of my soule, when I heare that the wals of Ierusalem (which is my natiue countrey) are leuelled with the ground, and the sepulchers and monuments of my predecessors are defaced, and the gates of the City are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may resort thither, and repaire the same, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

The yeere of the world, 3519. before Christs Natiuitie, 445.

This said, the King gaue eare to his request, and promised him his Letters, assuring him that he would addresse them to the Gouernours, commanding them to doe him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessary, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause (said he) cease thou to be sad, and doe thy seruice willingly. Hereupon Nehemias adored God, and thanked the King, for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the pleasure he conceiued, he cleared that confusion and sorrow, that before that time he bare his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gaue him letters vnto Sadeas the Gouernor of Syria, Phœnicia and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessary for that building which he intended. As soone as he came to Babylon, he tooke diuers of his countrimen with him, who willingly followed him, and went with him vnto Ierusalem in the fiue and twentieth yeer of the taigne of Xerxes, and after he had presented his letters before God, he deliuered them to Sadeas, and the other Gouernours. Afterwards, assembling the people in Ierusalem, he stood vp in the midst of them, and spake vnto the whole congregation to this effect: You men of Iury, there is none of you but knoweth that God hath our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob in perpetuall memory, and that in regard of their iustice, he hath neuer failed to haue care of vs: by his mercy likewise I haue receiued the fauour from the King to repaire your wals, and finish the rest of the Temple. I therfore pray you (who are assuredly perswaded of the enuy and hatred the neighbouring nations beare vnto you, who hearing that we are intent and busie in our building, will ouerpresse vs, and labour by all meanes possible to hinder vs) first to assure your selues in Gods prouidence; who will oppose himselfe against the hatred which they beare vs, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in prosecution of the building, but with all care continue the worke, in that the opportunitie of the time doth challenge our diligence gence therin. After he had ſpoken to this effect; he gaue order that the Gouernours ſhould take the meaſure of the wall, and diſtribute the taske amongſt the people, according to the burroughs and townes, and according to euery mans ability: and after hee had promiſed to imploy both himſelfe, and all his family therein, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly. Hereupon the Iewes (incited by his authority) addreſſed themſelues to the worke; which name of Iewes was firſt impoſed both on them and their religion, by reaſon of the Tribe of Iuda, who firſt of all came into theſe places.

2 Eſdras 4.6.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Cœloſyria, vnderſtanding the wals were raiſed with ſuch haſte and diligence, were ſore aggrieued, and reſolued with themſelues to lie in ambuſh, and to hinder them in their deliberations; ſo that they ſlew diuers Iewes, and ſought the meanes likewiſe to murther Nehemias himſelfe: and hauing hired certaine ſtrangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in waite for him. They bred alſo a feare and trouble amongſt them, by ſpreading certaine rumours, that diuers nations intended to make war againſt them: by which reports (being too much diſtracted) they deſiſted ſomewhat in the proſecution of their building. Yet none of theſe things could weaken Nehemias diligence or reſolution, but that (keeping a court of guard round about him) he inſtantly proſecuted his purpoſe, ſetting light by all occurrents; ſo great was his affection to accompliſh his intent. And for that cauſe did he carefully and intentiuely ſtand vpon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he beleeued that after his departure the Iewes would not finiſh the building of the walles. He commanded afterwards, that the workemen in their trauell ſhould haue their furnitures faſt by them, ſo that both Maſons and labourers carried their ſwords.

The ardent care in building the wals of Ieruſalem.

Moreouer, he gaue order that they ſhould haue their targets by them; and he placed certaine trumpeters, ſome fiue hundred foote diſtant the one from the other, charging them that as ſoone as they diſcouered the enemy from any part, they ſhould incontinently ſound the allarum, and giue notice vnto the people to arme themſelues, and prepare for the fight, for feare they ſhould be ſurprized and found naked. He himſelfe alſo walked the round, about the City by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or ſleeping at his pleaſure, but onely for neceſſity ſake: and this labour endured he for the ſpace of two yeeres, and three months: for the wall of Ieruſalem was builded againe in that time, in the eight and twentieth yeer of the raigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered ſacrifices vnto God, and ſpent eight dayes in feaſting. When the rumour was ſpred abroad that this building was finiſhed, the inhabitants of Syria were ſore diſpleaſed. But Nehemias perceiuing that the City was weakely manned, beſought the Prieſts and Leuites to forſake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he builded them houſes vpon his owne charge. He ordained likewiſe, that they that intended their husbandry, ſhould bring the tenths of their fruits vnto Ieruſalem, to the intent that the Prieſts and Leuites by enioying their continuall maintenance, might intermit no time in the ſeruice of God: wherein he was willingly obeyed. By this meanes, the City of Ieruſalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably executed diuers other worthy actions deſeruing praiſe, he died at ſuch time as he was loaden with age. He was a man of good nature, iuſt and highly affectionated towards his countrey: he left the City of Ieruſalem incompaſſed with a wall, for a perpetuall memorie of his loue vnto his countrey. All theſe things hapned during the raigne of Xerxes.

CHAP. VI.

How during the raigne of ARTAXERXES, the whole Nation of the Iewes were in danger to bee extinguiſhed by AMANS treachery.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. Eſter 1.

AFTER the death of Xerxes, the kingdome fell to Cyrus his Sonne, who by the Grecians was called Artaxerxes. Vnder his gouernment all the race of the Iewes, both men, women and children, were in danger to be vtterly exterminated: the cauſe whereof I will hereafter declare. But firſt of all it beboueth mee to ſpeake ſomewhat of the King, and declare how it came to paſſe, that he married an Hebrew woman of the blood royall, by whoſe meanes (as it is ſaid) our Nation was preſerued. After that Artaxerxes had taken the Kingdome vpon him, and eſtabliſhed Gouernours ouer one hundred and ſeuen and twenty Prouinces, from India as farre as Æthiopia; in the third yeere of his raigne, he entertained and feaſted all his friends with great magnificence, the Nations of Perſia likewiſe with their Gouernors

(according as it became a King ſo opulent,who was prepared for one hundred and eighty daies to make ſhew of his wealth and bounty.)He feaſted after this,for the ſpace of 7.dayes the Embaſſadours of all nations in the City of Suſa:and the ſetting forth of the banquet was ſuch,as enſueth. He ſate in a Tent,whoſe pillars were of gold and ſiluer, couered with linnen and ſcarlet vailes,which were of that greatnes,that diuers thouſands of men might take their refection therin. All the acates were ſerued in veſſels of gold, inriched with precious ſtones very glorious to behold. The King likewiſe commanded his ſeruants (that attended the feaſt) that they ſhould enforce no man to drinke,by filling continually,according to the manner of the Perſians, but to permit euery one of the gueſts to drinke according to his diſcretion. He ſent alſo thorowout all the countrey,commanding a ceſſation from all labour, and that euery one ſhould make holyday for many dayes in honour of his royalty. The Queene Vaſthi alſo made a banquet vnto her women in the royall Palace. Now wheras the King was deſirous to ſhew the maieſty of his Queene to thoſe he had inuited, he ſent vnto her, commanding her to reſort vnto the banquet in more royall maner then the reſt of her attendants:but ſhee too curiouſly tied to the obſeruation of the law of the Perſians (which forbiddeth women to be ſeene by ſtrangers) went not vnto the King: and notwithſtanding he ſent his Ennuches diuers times vnto her, yet perſiſted ſhee in her refuſall to come vnto him. Whereupon the King (mooued with diſpleaſure)gaue ouer his banquet, and ariſing therfro,he called vnto him his ſeuen counſellers,to whom(according to the vſe of the Perſians) it belonged to expound the lawes; and accuſed his wife, telling them how grieuouſly he had beene wronged by her, for that being ſent for by him diuers times to accompany him at his banquet,ſhe had euery way refuſed to obey him: He therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what puniſhment appertained to her. One amongſt them called Muchæus anſwered, that the iniurie was not onely offered vnto him,but to all the Perſians: who being after that manner deſpiſed by their wiues, were like to paſſe their liues ignominiouſly, for that no one of them would acknowledge duty towards their husbands,taking their example from the Queenes diſobedience,which ſhe ſhewed towards him,who was the Gouernour ouer all. Whereupon he concluded,that ſhe that had thus diſhonoured him,ſhould be grieuouſly puniſhed: which done, he thought it meete that this ordinance of the Kings might be publiſhed thorow all nations,that Queene Vaſthi ſhould be ſeparated from his bed, and another woman choſen in her place. But the King,who vehemently loued her,and could hardly endure to be ſeparated from her,knowing that he could not keepe her contrary to law,was wholly deuoured in ſorrow, for that he might not be maſter of that which he deſired. Which when his familiars perceiued,they counſelled him to forget the memory and loue of a woman ſo vnprofitable,and to ſend and ſeeke out thorow al his countries for the faireſt woman amongſt them, whom he might chooſe and take to wife,that ſurpaſſed al others in beauty;for that by the interuiew & company of another woman, the great affection which he bare vnto Vaſthi,might be extinguiſhed. The King allowing and ratifying this counſaile of theirs, ſent out certaine meſſengers and deputies, commanding them to bring vnto his preſence the faireſt Virgins that were to be found in his kingdome:when as therfore they had aſſembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young Orphelin(without either father or mother) who was brought vp vnder her vncle(whoſe name was Mardocheus) of the tribe of Beniamin, and one of the greateſt men amongſt the Iewes. It came to paſſe, that this Eſther (for ſuch was her name)was iudged to be the faireſt amongſt the reſt,who for her amiable countenance made all men to ſtand and gaze to behold her. She therfore was deliuered in charge vnto one of the Eunuches,who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was poſſible,decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the cuſtome of noble women; and after this manner were foure hundred Virgins entertained for the ſpace of ſixe moneths. Now when he that was put in truſt with this commiſſion,thought theſe Virgins to be ſufficiently prepared, and that they deſerued to approach the Princes bed,he ſent euery day one vnto the King to keep him company:who after ſome embraces ſent her preſently backe againe vnto the Eunuch. But when as Eſther came vnto his preſence,he ſettled his affection more on her then on all the reſt,& being ſurprized with her loue,he tooke her for his lawfull wife:and the nuptials were ſolemnely celebrated in the ſeuenth yeere of his raigne,and in the twelfth moneth called by vs Adar, and generally Frebruary: and he ſent poſts thorow all his kingdomes to proclaime a feaſt in honour of his marriage: he himſelfe alſo feaſted the Perſians,and Medes,and the Princes of the nations, for a whole moneths ſpace for the ſame cauſe. At ſuch time as Eſther entred into the royall Palace,he ſet a diademe vpon her head, and ſo liued with her, that he neuer queſtioned with her either of her birth,or nation. Her vncle alſo came from Babylon to Suſa(the chiefe city of Perſia) where where euery day he walked before the Palace gate, enquiring how Ester did: for that he loued her as dearely as if she had been his owne naturall daughter. Now the King had made a law that no man should approach his presence, except he were called, during the time that he was in his Throne; and round about his seat there stood certaine officers with their axes, ready to punish those who being vncalled should attempt to approach the Throne. The King himselfe sate aloft, and holding in his hand a golden scepter, whensoeuer he intended to saue the life of any one that approached his Throne vncalled, he stretched forth the same and touched him therewith: who being thus touched, by these meanes auoided the penalty of death. And as touching these things we haue sufficiently spoken in this place.

The Kings command, that no man should approach his throne, except he were called Esther 4.

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodestes, two of the Kings Eunuches, had conspired against him; Barnabazus, who was of the Hebrew nation and one of their seruants, disclosing their treason, discouered it to the Queenes vncle Mardocheus, who by her meanes made the King priuy to their conspiracy. Who sore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination, and after he had commanded them to be executed on the gibbet, he for that time gaue no recompence to Mardocheus for the safegard of his life: he onely commanded his name to be registred and Chronicled in his Commentaries, commanding that he should attend in the Palace, and be esteemed for one of the Kings most inward friends. Now as often as Aman (the sonne of Amadath an Amalechite) came vnto the Palace to visit the King, all those that were either Persians or strangers (according to the Kings especiall direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus shewed him no honour (both by reason of that vpright iudgement that was in him, as also for that the lawes of the Iewes forbad the same. Which when Aman had obserued, he demanded whence he was: and vnderstanding that he was a Iew, he was much displeased, saying in himselfe, that the Persians who were of freer condition, cast themselues prostrate before him, and he that was but a slaue, disdained to do the like. Intending therfore to reuenge himselfe on Mardocheus, he thought it not sufficient to procure his punishmēt at the Kings hands, but resolued wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capital enemy of the Iewes, by reason that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his descent, had bin wholly ruinated by them.) For which cause, he addressed himselfe vnto the King, and accused them, saying, that there was a certaine cursed nation spred thorow his whole Kingdome, insociable, and abhorring the customes of other men, who vsed diuers lawes and ceremonies hatefull both for their manners and studies, to all the rest of his subiects, and all mortall men. This nation (saith he) if thou wilt doe a gracious and acceptable fauour vnto thy people, thou shalt vtterly extinguish, and leaue neither captiue nor slaue aliue amongst them. And lest your Maiesties tribute would bee any wayes impaired by these meanes, I promise you of mine owne reuenewes forty thousand talents of siluer; desiring rather willingly to forbeare so much money, then that your Kingdome should be vnpurged of such a cursed race of men. When Aman had made this his request, the King answered, that he forgaue him the money, and that hee permitted him to deale with that nation as best him liked. When Aman had obtained this his desire, he presently sent an edict thorow all nations in the Kings name, and to this effect: The great King Artaxerxes vnto his Gouernours of a hundreth and seuen and twenty Prouinces, extending from India as farre as Æthiopia: Health. Hauing obtained the Empire ouer so many Nations, and extended my dominion ouer the world, according to mine owne pleasure, without being constrained to offend any of my subiects, by vsing our power more proudly and importunately then becommeth vs, but shewing our selues fauourable and mercifull in prouiding for their peace, and plentifull estate, wee haue searched out the meanes thereof, to the intent that we might perceiue the fruite. Being therefore admonished by my friend Aman (who for his wisedome and iustice is more honoured then all other by me, and for his approoued fidelity, hath the second place in authority next me) that there is a certaine race of men intermedled among you, enemies to all humanity, vsing none but their owne lawes, and such as are different from others, disobedient to their Kings, and of depraued manners and customes, that neither allow our Monarchie, nor further our affaires: I will and command, that they (being made knowne by Aman, a man whom we hold as deare as our father) be slaine, with their wiues, and children; so as you spare none of them, attributing more vnto your owne mercy then our edict: and this command wee to be done the fourteenth day of the twelfth moneth of this present yeere, that in one day cutting off all our enemies, hereeafter it may be lawfull for you to liue in peace and security. This edict being spred thorow all places of the countrey, and published in euery city, all men addressed themselues against the prefixed day, vtterly to exterminate the Iewes: & no lesse diligence was there vsed in Susan the Metropolitane city. Meane while while the King and Aman feasted, and made good cheere, whilest the City hung in suspence, being troubled with the expectation of the euent of that which should follow. But Mardocheus hauing intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on sackcloth, & cast ashes on his head, walking thorow the City, and crying that their nation had not committed any crime that deserued death: and vsing these or such like speeches, he came vnto the Kings Palace, and stood before the gate, because it was vnlawfull for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like also did the Iewes that were in the Cities, where those edicts had been published against them, weeping and lamenting their miseries. But when the newes hereof was brought vnto the Queene, that Mardocheus stood before the Palace gate in a lamentable estate, she was sore troubled, and sent certaine of her seruants vnto him, to command him to exchange his attire; but they could not perswade him to put off his sackcloth, because the inconuenient, for which he had put it on, was not ouerpast. She therfore called vnto her, her Eunuch Acratheus, and sent him vnto Mardocheus, to know what hatefull accident had befalne him, that made him put on his desolate habit, and powre forth those lamentable teares (notwithstanding she had instantly praied him to disrobe him of the one, and dry vp the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch, of the edict made against the Iewes, & sent by the King vnto all his Prouinces; the offer of the money that Aman likewise had tendered to the King, whereby he had bought the vtter ruine of his nation at the Kings hands. Moreouer, he gaue him the copy of that which had beene proclaimed in Susan, to be deliuered vnto Esther: whom he commanded to beseech the King, and to esteeme it no dishonour to put on an abiect and base garment, to saue her nation, and to preserue the Iewes from that death, whereunto at that time they were exposed: for that Aman the next in honour to the King, had accused the Iewes, and incensed his Maiestie against them. When Esther vnderstood this, shee sent againe vnto Mardocheus, giuing him to vnderstand that she was not called for by the King; and that whosoeuer entred vnto him, and was not called, should die, except the King would warrantize him by stretching out his golden Scepter: for he, vnto whom the King intended that fauour, although hee were not called vnto him; yet suffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When these things were reported by the Eunuch from Esther vnto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, that she ought not so much to tender the particular respect of her life, as the liues of her whole nation; assuring her, that if at that present she had not care of them, their succours should wholly proceed from God by some other meanes then this: but she and her fathers house should be destroyed by them, whom she had contemned. Vpon this reply, Esther sent the same messenger backe againe vnto Mardocheus, commanding him to repaire vnto Susan, and to call a generall assembly of all the Iewes that remained there, willing them for three daies space to fast and abstaine from all kind of meate for her safety, and that both her selfe and her seruants would do the like, promising them that at that time she would present her self vnto the King, notwithstanding his contrary edict; and that if she must needs die, she would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, caused the people to fast, and to pray vnto God for her: he likewise himselfe besought him that it might please him at that present to haue compassion on their desolate and distressed nation; as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as he had pardoned them at such time as they had offended; so now also at this present he would deliuer them from that perdition which was denounced against them. For that they were not in danger to die infamously for any offence of their owne, but because hee onely had incensed Aman vnto displeasure, in that he would not adore him, or performe that honor vnto him, which is only due to God: for which cause in despite he had imagined this thing against them, who would not transgresse the diuine ordinances. The people likewise prayed to the like effect, beseeching God that he would haue care of their preseruation, & warrantize the Israelites in what place soeuer they were, from the misery at hand, which was before their eyes, & already expected by them. Esther also besought God (according to her countrey manner) casting her selfe prostrate on the earth, cloathed in sackcloth, and abstaining for three daies space from meate and drinke, and what thing soeuer else was delectable, beseeching God to haue compassion vpon her, that when she presented her selfe before the King, she might haue words fit to perswade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty farre more amiable then euer she had, to the end that by these two meanes she might be the better enabled to appease the King, if so be he were displeased against her; and to succour her brethren agitated and tossed in extreme danger, wherethrough the King might enforce his hatred against the enemies of the Iewes, and take compassion of their imminent danger, which without his preuention would surely fall vpon them. After she had in this sort for three daies space both fasted and prayed, she cast off her mourning attire, and and changed her habit, attiring her selfe like a maiesticall Queene, hauing two of her seruants on whom shee leaned, and the third that followed her, carried vp with the tops of her fingers her traine, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came she vnto the King, hauing her cheekes stained with crimson blushes, making shew of Maiesty mixed with beauty, and not altogether estranged from feare. But when she beheld the King sitting aloft in his throne, glorious in his garments distinguisht with gold, and adorned with pearle, and rich stones; a certaine feare suddenly fell vpon her, and by chance he had cast a frowning and yrefull looke on her; whereupon being presently astonished, her members failed her, her colour faded, and she fell betwixt her handmaids armes in a swoune. Hereon, the King (by the wil of God, as I verily esteeme) changed his affection; and (suspecting lest feare should cause his wife to fall into some grieuous accident) he suddenly leapt from his Throne, and embracing her with both his armes, he raised her vp, and kissed her, and spake comfortable words vnto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to suspect any sinister misfortune, for that she came vnto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was onely made for his subiects: for which cause he willed her (who was equall in gouernment with him) to feare nothing: whereupon he tooke his Scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queenes necke (according to the law) enforcing himselfe to deliuer her from all feare; by which meanes shee recouered her vigour and courage; and spake after this manner: O King (said shee) I cannot easily expresse vnto you the inconuenience that is suddenly fallen vpon me: For as soone as I beheld the great, faire, and redoubted Maiesty of your person, my spirits forsooke me, and my heart failed me. Now whilest shee spake these words with paine and feebleness, the King was touched with compassion; so as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (said hee) if thou demandest the halfe of my kingdome, I will grant it thee. But Esther onely requested this at his hands, that onely he and his intire friend Aman would vouchsafe to grace her with their presence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come vnto the banquet, and in the midst of their cups, the King commanded Esther to aske what shee would, and he would grant it her, assuring her that he would refuse her in nothing; yea, although she demanded the halfe of his kingdome. But shee deferred to discouer her suite vntill the next day, requiring him once more to repaire with Aman vnto her banquet. When the King had promised to reuisit her, Aman departed with great ioy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Esther, and no other had euer obtained the like honour amongst any Kings of that dominion. But in his returne perceiuing Mardocheus in the Court, he was sore mooued, because that (notwithstanding he had lookt vpon him) hee had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home vnto his house, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour (not onely the King, but the Queene also had done him; and how hee onely with the King had supped that day with the Queene; and was inuited the next day also to banquet with the King and her: notwithstanding he told them that he was discontented, because he saw Mardocheus the Iew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he should cause a gallowes to be raised of fiftie cubits high, and that the next day he should demand licence of the King, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the Iibbet. Aman praising his wiues counsell, commanded his seruants to prepare the timber, and erect the Gallowes in his Court, to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at Amans cursed hope, and knowing certainly what should happen, tooke pleasure to see it prepared. For the very same night he depriued the King of sleepe, who very loth to spend the time idlely whilest he was awake, but to imploy it in something that was profitable for his kingdome, hee commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the Kings his predecessors, & of those things that were done by himselfe, and to reade the same. When as therfore they were brought and read, he found that a certaine man whose name was there set downe, had receiued a great possession for reward in reacknowledgement of his vertue. Hee read likewise of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelitie; and consequently of others; till at last he came to the place where the Eunuches Bagotheus and Theodestes were noted downe, for a secret conspiracie against the person of the King; and how it was discouered by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretary (hauing onely recited this accident) turned ouer to another history, the King stayed him, & asked him if he found therein written, that he had giuen any recompence to Mardocheus? He answered that he found nothing set down. Whereupon the King commanded him to giue ouer, and inquired of those to whom that office appertained, what houre of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already discouered, he commanded that some one should certifie him, which of his familiars attended before the Palace. At this time it chanced ced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither ſooner then he was accuſtomed, with an intent to beſeech the King, that it might be lawfull for him to put Mardocheus to death. The yeere of the world, 3554. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 410.

Now when the officers had brought the King tydings that Aman was before the palace; they were commanded preſently to call him in. As ſoone as he came into the Kings preſence, he ſaid vnto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithee giue me thy counſaile, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatneſſe, whom I doe moſt affectionately loue? Aman thinking the aduice he ſhould giue, ſhould be giuen for himſelfe (becauſe he ſuppoſed that he only was beloued by the King more then all others) counſailed him that which in his opinion was the beſt, in this manner. For (ſaid hee) if you intend to inueſt the man with glorie, who (as you ſay) is beloued by you, cauſe him to be mounted vpon a braue horſe, and let him be apparelled in a royall habit, and put a chaine of gold about his necke, and let ſome one of thy chiefeſt friends march before him, and proclaime thorowout the Citie, that thus is the man honoured whom the King loueth. Aman gaue this counſaile, in that hee hoped that it ſhould be his owne fortune. But the King (highly contented with this his aduice) turning towards him, ſpake thus vnto him: Thou haſt a horſe, a garment, and a chaine, ſeeke out therefore the Iew Mardocheus, & giue them him, and march thou before him, making this publike crie: For (ſaid hee) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing bee committed to thy truſt, which thou haſt ſo faithfully counſailed. And this cõmand I to be done in this ſort; becauſe Mardocheus hath beene the preſeruer of my life. Aman hearing theſe words, beyond all expectation, was confuſed in his ſpirit, and beeing wholly diſcomforted, knew not which way to turne him, he therefore iſſued out, hauing with him the horſe, the purple habit, and the chaine of gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was cloathed in ſackecloth, he enioyned him to lay his mourning habit aſide, & to cloath himſelfe in purple. But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had hapned, & ſuppoſing that he mocked him) ſaid: O thou wickedeſt man amongſt men, doeſt thou thus mocke at our afflictions? Notwithſtanding, being afterwards informed that the King had beſtowed this honour on him for ſauing his life, and diſcouering the treacherie of thoſe Eunuches that would haue ſlaine him, he put vpon him the ſcarlet habite that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chaine about his necke, and afterwards mounting his horſe, he went round about the Citie, Aman alſo walking before him, and crying, that thus ſhould bee dealt and done with him whom the King honored, loued, and thought worthy of eſtimation. Now after they had circuited the whole Citie, Mardocheus gaue his attendance on the King, but Aman came not in preſence; ſo much was hee aſhamed at that which had hapned: for which cauſe he repaired home, & told his wife and friends, with teares, of all that which had hapned; who told him, that it was no waies poſſible for him to reuenge himſelfe as yet on Mardocheus, becauſe God was with him. Honour offered to Mardocheus. Eſther 7.

Now whileſt they were diſcourſing and debating this matter together, Eſthers Eunuches came to haſten Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadas one of the Eunuches ſeeing the Iibbet erected in Amans lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the ſeruants, wherefore it was raiſed vp: and vnderſtanding that it was for the Queenes vncle, whom Aman would require at the Kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time he held his peace. But when the King being ſeated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queene to declare what ſhe would require that he might grant her, ſhe began to lamẽt the danger of her people, ſaying, that ſhe with her whole nation were made a prey to the ſword, and that for that cauſe ſhe brake out into that diſcourſe: For (ſaid ſhe) I had not troubled your maieſty, neither had I beene aggrieued, if you had commanded that all the Iewes ſhould be ſold, and led away captiues to extreme miſerie; for that affliction might haue beene borne: ſhe therefore prayed him to redeeme them from thoſe miſeries. When as therefore the King demanded who it was, that practiſed that tyranny: ſhe began publikely to accuſe Aman, ſaying, that he alone was that wretched and enuious man, who had complotted their tragedie. Hereupon the King was very ſore troubled, & roſe from the banquet to depart into the garden: then began Aman to pray and beſeech Eſther to forgiue him his offence, for that at that preſent he was in a dangerous eſtate. Now whileſt he was fallen vpon her bed to beſeech her fauour, the King entred, & grew the more diſpleaſed at that he ſaw, and ſaid, O thou curſed amongſt men, dareſt thou attempt to enforce my wife? Aman was wholly confounded with this queſtion; ſo as hee had not a word to anſwer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadas ſtepping forth, accuſed him for that he had found him in his lodging erecting a Iibbet for Mardocheus, aſſuring the King that one of his houſhold ſeruants had told him it, at ſuch time as he was ſent to call him to the banquet; alledging moreo- Aman hauing all his trecheries and cruelty diſcouered, in the banquet is adiudged to the gallowes.

uer, that the Iibbet was fiftie cubits hie. Which when the King vnderſtood, he adiudged Aman to no other death, but that which he intended againſt Mardocheus; & thereupon preſently commanded that he ſhould be hanged vpon the ſame Iibbet, vntill he were dead. And in this place it behooueth me to admire the maieſtie of God, in conſidering what his wiſedome and iuſtice is, in that he not only puniſhed the wickedneſſe of Aman (as he had deſerued) but alſo cauſed him to fall into the ſame ſnare which he had prepared for another man. Thus died Aman, who had vniuſtly abuſed the Kings friendſhip: as for his goods they were giuen vnto the Queene.

After this, the King called for Mardocheus vnto him (for already he had notice that he was his wiues vncle) and gaue him the ring which he had giuen vnto Aman: the Queene likewiſe gaue him his goods, and required the King to deliuer the nation of the Iewes from that diſmay wherinto they were fallen, through the perill of their liues: letting him to ſee thoſe letters which were ſent by Aman the Amadathite thorow all his countries, aſſuring him that ſhe could not liue to behold the death of her brethren, and the totall ruine of her countrey. The King aſſured her, that he had vndertaken nothing that might diſcomfort her: auowing to her, that he would not contradict her wil, wiſhing her to write her ſelf in the Kings name all that which ſhe wold haue done in the behalfe of the Iewes; promiſing that when ſhe had done the ſame, he would ſeale it with his owne ſeale, giuing her authority to ſend the ſame thorow all his realms: to the end that they that read thoſe letters, confirmed by the Kings ſeale, ſhould not any waies contradict the execution of the ſame. Whereupon he ſent for his ſecretaries of eſtate, cõmanding them to write vnto the magiſtrates of all the nations as touching the Iewes, & to the princes and gouernors of one hundreth, twenty and ſeuen prouinces, from India as farre as Æthiopia. A haue offered them outrage in their aduerſitie. And I command that this bee done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preſeruation (when as they were appointed to be ſlaine) which day I deſire to fall out fortunate to thoſe that loue vs, and a monument of reuenge on thoſe that pretended our ruine. My pleaſure likewiſe is, that all men, cities and nations ſhould know, that whoſoeuer ſhall neglect, through obſtinacy, to fulfill the tenor of this my mandate, he ſhall be purſued with fire and ſword: and let theſe copies be ſet vp thorowout all our dominions, and let each man of the Iewes vpon the prefixed day, prepare himſelfe to be reuenged on his enemies. The yeere of the world, 3554. before Chriſts Natiuity, 410. " " " "

As ſoone as the Poaſts had receiued theſe letters, they preſently mounted on horſebacke, and road each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a royall habit, and adorned with a crowne of gold on his head, & a chaine of gold about his necke, iſſued forth: and the Iewes of Suſan, ſeeing him thus honoured by the King, ſuppoſed that his good hap was an aſſurance of their owne: & when the Kings letters were publiſhed, a ioy as it were a bright beam of conſolation enuironed the Hebrew nation, as well thoſe that were in the citie of Suſan, as they that were amid the countrey; ſo that diuers men of other nations circumciſed themſelues, for feare they had of the Iewes, ſuppoſing that in ſo doing they ſhould be in ſecuritie. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians Diſtre) the Poaſts that carried the Kings letters certified them, that they ſhould exterminate their enemies on that very day, whereon they themſelues were in danger to be exterminated. The gouernours likewiſe of the Prouinces, the Lords, Kings, and Secretaries, did honour to the Iewes: C for the feare they had of Mardocheus conſtrained them to moderate themſelues; and after the Kings letters were publiſhed thorow all the countrey, it came to paſſe that the Iewes ſlew about fiue hundreth of their enemies. But after the King had declared vnto Eſther, the number of the dead that periſhed in the City, ſuſpecting with himſelfe what might happen thorow the whole countrey, and had likewiſe queſtioned with her if ſhe requeſted any further matter, promiſing her that he would ſee it executed: ſhe beſought him that it might be lawfull for the Iewes to reuenge them yet once more the next day vpon their enemies, and to hang Amans ten ſons vpon the Iibbet: which the King (being loth to contradict Eſther) permitted the Iewes to doe: they therfore returning the 14. day of the moneth Diſtre, ſlew about three hundreth more of their enemies; yet aliened they not in any ſort the ſmalleſt portion of their goods. Furthermore, the D Iewes ſlew in the champain countrey, and in the Cities, about ſeuenty fiue thouſand of their enemies, whom they diſpatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, and ſolemnized the day following. The Iewes that were at Suſan, aſſembled themſelues likewiſe on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banquetted the whole day. Whence it commeth to paſſe, that all the Iewes which are throughout the world, keepe and ſolemnize this day for a feſtiuall, and ſend preſents the one vnto the other. Mardocheus alſo wrote vnto the Iewes, who liued vnder the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to obſerue thoſe dayes, and to ſolemnize them; willing them to charge their ſucceſſours to doe the like, to the end that this feaſt might continue for euer, and outliue all obliuion. For ſince on that day they ſhould haue beene made away by Aman, they ſhould do well if after they had eſcaped that danger, and taken reuenge on their enemies, the very ſame day they ſhould obſerue the ſame to giue thankes vnto God: For this cauſe the Iewes keepe a ſolemne feaſt on theſe dayes, and call it Purim, as who ſhould ſay, Lottes. But Mardocheus was great and mighty with the King, adminiſtring the kingdome with him; he had alſo a part of the greatneſſe of the Queene: and for this cauſe the affaires of the Iewes had better ſucceſſe, then was hoped for. See here how matters paſſed, during the raigne of Artaxerxes.

AFTER the death of Eliaſib the high Prieſt, Iudas his ſonne ſucceeded in the office. And after his death Iohn his ſonne obtained the place; in whoſe time Bagoſes generall of Artaxerxes army polluted the temple, and made the Iewes tributaries; ſo that before they could offer their ordinary and daily ſacrifices, they were compelled to pay for euery lambe fifty drachmes, which hapned vpon this occaſion: Iohn had a brother called Ieſus, whom Bagoſes fauoured, and promiſed to giue him the high Prieſthood. Ieſus wonne by theſe perſwaſions, quarrelled with his brother Iohn: who was ſo much prouoked againſt him, that he ſlew his brother Ieſus

Iesus in his choler. It was a thing very ſtrange, that Iohn being a Prieſt, ſhould commit ſuch an impietie againſt his brother, and yet farre more ſtrange, in that ſo cruell an act, and an offence ſo impious, hath neither hapned amongſt Greekes nor Barbarians. God alſo left it not vnpuniſhed, but for the ſame ſinne the people were reduced vnder captiuitie, & the temple was polluted by the Perſians. When Bagoſes had intelligence, that Iohn (the high Prieſt among the Iewes) had ſlaine his brother Iesus in the temple, he reſorted thither in all haſte, & began to vtter, and break forth into bitter threats againſt the Iewes: Haue you (ſaid he) beene ſo bold as to commit murther in your temple? And when he thought to haue entered into the ſame, they hindered him. Whereupon hee replied: Am I therefore more polluted then the body that lyeth dead in the Temple? And hauing ſpoken thus, he entered thereinto, and for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres Bagoſes being thus animated againſt the Iewes, puniſhed them for murthering Iesus. After that Iohn was deceaſed, Iaddus his ſonne was made high Prieſt; who had a brother called Manaſſes: Sanaballath ſent by the latter King Darius to gouerne Samaria (for he alſo was of the race of the Chutæans, from whom iſſued the Samaritans) knowing that Ieruſalem was a famous Citie, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble vnto the inhabitants of Aſſyria, & Cœloſyria; he willingly marrieth his daughter Nicazo to this Manaſſes, with an intent that this marriage ſhould be as a pledge of his good will to the nation of the Iewes,

Alexander made King after Philip his father King of Macedon.

ABOVT that time, Philip King of Macedon died in the citie of Ægæas, being traiterouſly ſlaine by Pauſanias the ſonne of Ceraſtes, of the race of Oreſtes; and his ſonne Alexander ſucceeded him in the kingdome: who paſſing ouer Helleſpont, gaue battell vnto the huge armie of Darius neere the riuer Granic, and there obtained a famous victorie. And hereupon he alſo inuading the countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Ionia, & ouer-runne Caria) finally ſet vpon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in another place. But the Elders of Ieruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed, for that Iaddus brother, who was at that time high Prieſt, and had married a forraine woman, ſhould be companion and aſſociate with him in the Prieſthood; ſo as they mutined againſt him. For they ſuppoſed that that marriage would be but a meanes to animate thoſe who had a minde to prophane marriages, and prooue an inducement to other to communicate in marriage with ſtrangers: remembring them that the cauſe of their euils, and firſt captiuitie was, becauſe ſome of them had fallen, and offended by coupling themſelues with women of forraine nations.

They therefore commanded Manaſſes either to forſake his wife, or elſe neuer more to approch the Altar. The high Prieſt likewiſe being incenſed againſt his brother, as well as the people, draue him in like manner from the ſacrifice. For which cauſe Manaſſes (addreſſing himſelfe to his father in law Sanaballath) told him that although he loued his daughter Nicazo very intirely, yet would he not notwithſtanding condeſcend for her ſake to be depriued of the Prieſthood (which was the greateſt dignitie that could be among their nation, & which had euer continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath anſwered and promiſed him, that he would not onely continue him in the Prieſthood, but alſo would giue him the power and dignitie of the high Prieſthood, & make him gouernour of all places that he commanded, prouided the marriage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter & him, were continued. He furthermore aſſured him that hee would build a temple, reſembling that in Ieruſalem) vpon the mountaine of Garizim which was the higheſt among the reſt, permitting him to doe the ſame with Darius conſent. Manaſſes puffed vp by theſe promiſes, remained with Sanaballath, & grew in hope that he ſhould obtaine the Prieſthood by Darius meanes: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore diuers other, both Prieſts and common people, among the Iſraelites, were intangled in ſuch marriages, there aroſe no ſmall commotion in Ieruſalem. For all they of this condition retired themſelues to Manaſſes, whom Sanaballath furniſhed with money, and lands to till, and houſes to inhabit in all ſorts, to fauour the intent of his ſonne in law.

Manaſſes, vnder hope of greater fortunes, retaineth the forraine wife he had.

The Apoſtaſie of the Prieſts.

At the ſame time Darius vnderſtanding that Alexander, hauing paſſed the Helleſpont, had ouercome thoſe gouernours, whom he had eſtabliſhed neere vnto the floud Granicus, and that he paſſed further, ſpoyling of his countrey; he gathered together both his horſemen and footemen, reſoluing to make head againſt the Macedonians, before they ſhould gaine all Aſia: he therefore paſſed Euphrates, & mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encoũter & fight with his enemies in the coũtry.

Sanaballath

Sanaballath ioyful of Darius descent, incontinently told Manasses that he would fulfill his promises, as soone as Darius should returne from the conquest of his enemies. For not only he, but also all the Asians perswaded themselues most assuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battell against the Persians, by reason of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Persian encountring with the Macedonian was ouercome, and after he had lost the greater part of his army, and left his mother, wife and children prisoners, he himselfe fled into Persia. Alexander arriuing in Syria, seized Damasco, tooke Sidon, and besieged Tyre: and by his letters sent vnto the high Priest of the Iewes, he required him to send him some supplies in his warre, and to sell his army victuals for their money; assuring him that if he desired the friendship of the Macedonians, he would giue him that tribute which he paid to Darius, besides other good turnes. The high Priest answered Alexanders messenger, that he had sworne vnto Darius neuer to beare armes against him, during his life time; against which oath of his, he would neuer worke any indignitie. Which when Alexander heard, he was sore displeased, and resolued notwithstanding to continue the siege at Tyre, vntill such time as it was taken; yet threatned he that as soon as he had taken the same, he would lead forth his army against the hie Priest, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keepe their faith. For which cause sparing no labour, he ouercame Tyre, and after he had giuen order to the estate thereof, he came vnto Gaza, and tooke it with Babemeses the Captaine of the garrison that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunitie to make himselfe great, forsooke Darius & followed Alexander, leading with him eight thousand of his subiects: and finding him vpon the beginning of the siege of Tyre, he offered to surrender him all those places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had done Darius. Alexander accepted him willingly: whereupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole estate; giuing him to vnderstand that Manasses (who was brother to Iaddus the high Priest of the Iewes) was his sonne in law, who with diuers of the same nation, were desirous to build them a Temple in the countries vnder his dominion, assuring the King of much profit thereby, because in so doing, the force of the Iewes should be dismembred into two parts, and they might not conspire together to make any new insurrection or trouble, as in times past they had done during the gouernment of the Kings of Assyria.

Alexanders victory against Darius.

When Sanaballath had permission from Alexander to build this Temple, with the greatest speed he might, he finished the same, and made Manasses the high Priest thereof, supposing that it was the greatest aduantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seuen moneths after the surprizall of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander also razed Gaza, and prepared himselfe to come suddenly vpon Ierusalem. Which when the high Priest Iaddus vnderstood, hee was much grieued, and sore afraid, not knowing how to grow in fauour with the Macedonians: and on the other side knowing that the King was displeased against him (because before-time he had disobeyed him:) Hee therefore commanded the people to make their prayers vnto God, and he in his owne person offered sacrifice; requiring God that it would please him to be a shield of defence, and succour to their nation, and to deliuer them from those imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whilest he slept, God appeared vnto him, and willed him to be of good courage, and commanding him that as soone as he had circuited the walles, he should open the gates boldly, and command the rest of the people to attire themselues in white; and that accompanied with them, he should march forward in those Priestly ornaments, which were ordained by the law, to the end that in this equipage they might goe and meet with Alexander, without apprehension of any future euill, because that God had peruerted the same. As soone as he awaked from his sleepe, he was very ioyfull, and certified the rest of this prediction of God; and performing that which had beene commanded him, he expected in this manner the approach of the King; and when he knew that hee was not farre off from the Citie, hee marched forth to meete him, accompanied with the Priests, and a multitude of other people, presenting a most royall manner of entertaine, and farre different from that of other nations; neere vnto a place called Sapha; which word signifieth a watch (by reason that from that place a man may discouer the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem.) The Phœnicians and Chaldæans that were of Alexanders traine, grounding their hopes vpon his displeasure, made their attempt to sacke the Citie, and to hew the high Priest in pieces: but it fell out quite contrary. For Alexander espying the people from afarre in white rayments, and the Priests going before them in their fine rochets, and the high Priest attired in a robe of purple, bordered with gold, hauing his Miter on his head, and his plate of gold, wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himselfe marched forward before the rest of his companie, and fell fell proſtrate on his face before that Name, ſaluting firſt of all the high Prieſt; and at the ſame inſtant all the Iewes together ſaluted the King with one voice, and circled him in round about. The Kings of Syria and the reſt that ſaw that which hapned, were wonderfully aſtoniſhed, and thought that the King was out of his wits: Parmenio onely drew neere vnto him, and asked him what he meant to adore the Prieſt of the Iewes, whereas all other men odored him? To whom he anſwered, I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Prieſt worſhippeth: for in my ſleepe I ſaw him in ſuch a habit, as I ſee him in at this preſent, at ſuch time as I was in Dio a Citie of Macedonia: and whileſt I conſulted with my ſelfe by what meanes I might attaine to the conqueſt of Aſia, he counſelled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, aſſuring me that it would be he that would guide both me and mine army, and would deliuer the Empire of the Perſians into my hands. Since that time I haue not ſeene any one attired after the ſame manner: and at this preſent beholding this man, and remembring me of the viſion, and exhortation that he gaue mee in my ſleepe, I hope that mine army being conducted by diuine prouidence, I ſhall ouercome Darius, and diſcomfit the Perſians, and that my purpoſe ſhall haue a happy iſſue.

Alexanders ſacrifice in the Temple, the confirmation of his conqueſt by Daniels prophecy, his bounty to the Iewes.

When he had anſwered Parmenio in this ſort, he gaue the high Prieſt his hand, and went with him into the City, being conducted by the Prieſts: after this, when he came vnto the Temple, he offered ſacrifice, according to the high Prieſts direction, whom he honoured likewiſe with very great reuerence. And when as likewiſe Iaddus ſhewed him the prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declared that a certaine man of the nation of the Greekes, ſhould deſtroy the eſtate of the Perſians, and that in his opinion it ſhould be: thereof Alexander was very ioyfull, and diſmiſſed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day aſſembling the Iewes, he commanded them to demand certaine fauours at his hands: whereupon the high Prieſt anſwered, that he required the exerciſes of the ordinances of their forefathers, and that euery ſeuenth yeere they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They beſought him likewiſe, that by his permiſſion the Iewes that were in the countries of Babylon and Media, might liue according to their lawes. And he promiſed them willingly to doe all that which they deſired. He made Proclamation alſo among the people, that if any one of them ſhould beare armes with him (in liuing according to the cuſtome of their nation) he was ready to receiue them with him: and diuers tooke pleaſure to ſerue vnder him in the warres.

After that Alexander had in this ſort demeaned himſelfe in Ieruſalem, hee marched with his armie againſt the neighbouring Citie: and whereſoeuer hee went, hee was receiued with great affection. But the Samaritanes, whoſe Metropolitane Citie at that time was Sichem (ſituate neere vnto the mountaine of Garizim, in which there dwelt diuers Iewes alſo, that were reuolted from their nation) ſeeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Iewes, they reſolued to demeane themſelues like Iewes. For ſuch is the nature of Samaritanes (as we haue declared heretofore) that when the Iewes are in affliction, they deny all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confeſſe the truth:) but when they perceiue any beame of good aduenture ſhining vpon them, ſuddenly they vaunt of their alliance, ſaying, they are neere akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manaſſes the ſonnes of Ioſeph. They came therefore to the Kings preſence, and met him neere vnto Ieruſalem, with great magnificence, and demonſtration of ſingular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approched neere vnto him (being accompanied with thoſe men of warre that Sanaballath had ſent vnto the King) beſeeching him that he would viſit their City, and honour their Temple with his preſence: whereupon he promiſed that at his returne he would viſit them. They required him alſo, that hee would acquit them of the tribute of the ſeuenth yeere, becauſe they did not ſowe in the ſame. He asked them who they were that made that requeſt? They anſwered him, that they were Hebrewes: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sydonians. Hee asked them againe, if they were Iewes? and they ſaid, they were not. Well (ſaid he) I haue made this grant vnto the Iewes: when as therefore I ſhall returne, if I be more particularly informed, I ſhall doe that which ſhall be held requiſit. Thus diſmiſſed he the Sichemites, but hee commanded Sanaballaths men of war to follow him into Ægypt; promiſing in that place to impart poſſeſſions vnto them by lot; which afterwards he did (enioyning them to liue in garriſon in the Citie of Thebais, to make good that country.) After Alexanders death, his Empire was diuided amongſt his ſucceſſors, and the Temple builded neere vnto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accuſed in Ieruſalē for eating vnlawful meats, or for tranſgreſſing the Sabbath, or for any ſuch like fault, he fled vnto the Sichemites, ſaying, that he was accuſed vniuſtly. In that time deceaſed the hie Prieſt Iaddus: and Onias, his ſonne ſucceeded him. This was the eſtate of them of Iernſalem at that time.

and policie: for hee entred the Citie vpon a Sabbath day, vnder pretext to offer sacrifice; and whilest the Iewes suspected nothing, but spent the day in idlenesse and quiet, hee surprized the Citie without resist, and ouerpressed the Citizens with hatefull captiuitie. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the Acts of Alexanders successors) witnesseth no lesse, reproching vs of superstition; as if intending thereby, that by that meanes we lost our Citie. He writeth to this effect. There is a certaine nation, which are called Iewes, who inhabit a Citie which is called Ierusalem, both strong and mightie. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomeis hands, because they would not stand vpon their guard, and through their importunate superstition, they permitted themselues to be subdued by a Tyrant conquerour. See here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation. But Ptolomey leading away with him diuers prisoners of the better quarters of Iudæa, and the places neere vnto Ierusalem, of Samaria and mount Garizim, sent them into Ægypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Ierusalem were most firme in maintaining their oathes and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, hee sent Embassadours vnto them: hee put diuers of them into his garrisons, giuing them the same priuiledges in the Citie of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had receiued their oath, that they should be faithfull vnto his successors, in memory of the great trust and fauours he had bestowed on them, many of the other Iewes likewise of their owne accord went into Ægypt, partly allured thereunto by the plentie of the countrey, partly by the liberalitie of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continuall seditions betwixt their posteritie and the Samaritanes: for that they would keepe and maintaine the customes and ordinances of their forefathers; whereupon diuers warres arose amongst them. For they of Ierusalem said that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would that the offerings and sacrifices should be sent thither: the Samaritanes contrariwise commanded them to be brought to the mount Garizim.

PTOLOMEY PHILADELPHVS causeth the lawes of the Iewes to be translated into the Greeke tongue: and dismissing many captiue Iewes, dedicateth many presents in the Temple of God.

The yeere of the world, 3680. before Christs Natiuitie, 284.

Hedio in Rufinus, chap 2. The library of Ptolomey Philadelphus.

AFTER him Philadelphus succeeded in the kingdome of Ægypt, and held it for nine and thirty yeeres space. He it was that translated the law into the Greeke tongue, and deliuered the Iewes from that seruitude, wherein they were enthralled in Ægypt, to the number of sixescore thousand, vpon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalerius Master of the Kings library, endeuoured to his vttermost to gather vp all sorts of books that were in the world, and bought all that which was agreeable to the Kings intent, who aboue all things was curious to assemble diuersitie of bookes. Hee being one day demanded by the King, how many thousands of volumes he had already gathered: hee answered him, that hee had already assembled about some two hundred thousand volumes: but that shortly he would gather to the number of fiue hundred thousand. Besides, he certified him, that he had beene lately aduertised that there were diuers volumes among the Iewes, wherein many things as touching their lawes and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and deserued to be put in so memorable and famous a library as his was: which being written and set downe in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greeke tongue. For their characters seeme to haue some reference to the Syriacke, and their pronunciation likewise not much dissonant from the same: and notwithstanding they haue their phrase proper and peculiar vnto themselues. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated: for the King defraying the charge, might easily cause it to be done, to the end that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his Library. Hereupon the King praising Demetrius care in collecting and gathering bookes, wrote vnto the high Priest of the Iewes, commanding that this translation might be finished. In the meane time a certaine man called Aristæus, who was intirely beloued and befriended by the King, by reason of his modestie, and had diuers times before that present resolued with himselfe to sollicite the King, to dismisse all the Iewes that were in his kingdome, supposing that at that instant hee had fit opportunitie offered him to make his request, hee spake vnto Sosibus the Tarentine, and Andrew the chiefe Captaine of the Kings guard, beseeching them to fauour him in that which he intended to moue the King in. Hauing therefore sounded the affections of these noble men, he addressed himselfe himſelfe vnto the King, and ſpake vnto him after this manner: Since, my ſoueraigne, it behoueth vs not to deceiue our ſelues by diſſimulation, but it neceſſarily importeth vs to diſcouer the truth: wheras we haue concluded with our ſelues, not onely to tranſcript, but alſo to tranſlate the lawes of the Iewes, the rather to performe ſome acceptable ſeruice to your Grace; what honeſt pretext is there left for vs to attaine thereunto, as long as there are ſo great a number of Iewes kept in thraldome in thy kingdome? You ſhall therefore do a worke anſwerable to the greatnes of your courage and benignitie, if you deliuer them from their miſery, conſidering that hee who gaue them their law is God, who gouerneth your kingdome (as by diligent inquiſition I haue certainly apprehended) for both they and we adore one God Creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Iupiter, for as much as he maintaineth our life & the liues of all men. For that honour therefore which you owe vnto God, ſend backe theſe people into their countrey, and permit them to inhabit the ſame, who amongſt all men are moſt ſingularly affected to their religion. Neither hath your Grace occaſion to ſuſpect, that I offer theſe ſupplications and prayers vnto you in their fauour, and for their profit, becauſe I am either allied or deſcended of any of their tribes: But where there is but one God, who is the Maker of all men, and I my ſelfe am aſſured, that he taketh pleaſure in thoſe men that addict themſelues to beneficence, this is the onely cauſe that induceth me to make this requeſt vnto you. When Ariſtæus had ended this diſcourſe of his, the King beholding him with a cheerefull and pleaſant countenance, asked him how many thouſands he thought they were, whoſe liberty he required? Andrew (being hard at hand) anſwered, that there were more then one hundreth and twenty thouſand. Whereupon the King replyed, Is this demand Ariſtæus a matter of ſmall conſequence, which thou requireſt? Soſibius and the other aſſiſtants anſwered, that his reacknowledgement which he made vnto God, who had giuen him the kingdome, was worthy the greatneſſe of his courage; ſo that reioycing at this their content, he charged him at ſuch time as they deliuered the men of warre their pay, they ſhould ouer & aboue the ſame, pay euery one of them that had priſoners with them, ſixſcore drachmes: and as touching the requeſt made by them, he promiſed them to diſpatch his letters pattents, in moſt ample manner, to bring a happy iſſue to Ariſtæus ſuit; or rather to ſatisfie the will of God, which was eſpecially to be reſpected. Whereunto conforming himſelfe, he ſent out his Proclamation: certifying thereby that he not onely ſet them at liberty, who had beene brought thither by his father, or thoſe of his army who attended him; but them alſo who before-time had beene in his kingdome; or that ſithence likewiſe had beene brought thither: and notwithſtanding it was told him that the money that would be required for their ranſome, would amount to more then foure hundreth talents; yet ceaſed he not to confirme that which he had promiſed. But that it may more plainly appeare how great his royall magnificence was, I haue thought good to inſert in this place the copie of the Edict, which he ſent abroad to this effect: Whoſoeuer of you that in my fathers ſeruice (by bearing armes vnder him) haue made any roades into Syria and Phœnicia, and after the conqueſt of Iudæa haue taken any priſoners, and brought them to our Cities and countries, with an intent to ſell them: all they alſo, who haue heretofore detained any, or at this preſent haue any ſuch captiues in their poſſeſſion, they are to ſet them at libertie that liue vnder their thraldome, receiuing for the ranſome of euery perſon ſixeſcore drachmes: namely, the men of warre, at ſuch time as their wages ſhall be paid them: as for the reſt, they ſhall receiue their money out of the Kings treaſurie. For I am of that opinion, that contrary to my fathers mind, and againſt all right, they haue beene taken priſoners, and that their country hath bin in this ſort euilly intreated, by the inſolency of the ſouldiers, who haue thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, in transferring them into Ægypt. Hauing therefore an eſpeciall reſpect of iuſtice, and intending to ſhew mercy to thoſe who are wrongfully oppreſſed, I command that all thoſe Iewes, who are detained in ſeruitude be diſcharged, and that they who held them captiue, receiue the ranſome publiſhed by vs; ſo as no deceit or fraud be vſed therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled, our will is, that this Edict of ours be publikely proclaimed three daies after it ſhall come vnto your hands, and that thoſe, who hold ſuch priſoners in their poſſeſſion, declare how many priſoners they hold. For we ſuppoſe, that in ſo doing, it ſhall redound to our profit. Moreouer, it ſhall be lawfull for any man that will, to accuſe the contemners of this decree, and our pleaſure is that ſuch as contradict the ſame, ſhall haue their goods confiſcate to the Kings vſes. When this Edict of the Kings publiſhed to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that onely point was omitted, that concerned thoſe that beforetime had beene, and afterward the ſecond time were led away priſoners, in whoſe behalfe hee had giuen no direction; he ſhewed himſelfe moſt bountifull in like manner toward theſe:

theſe: And gaue order that the number and tallie ſhould be ſpeedily gathered, and the money diſtributed to the Committees, and Treaſurers appertaining to him. Which being ſpeedily performed in the ſpace of ſeuen daies, all the Kings ordinance was accompliſhed, and there was laid out for the ranſomes of them all, to the ſumme of more then foure hundreth and ſixtie talents: For the Maſters exacted ſixeſcore drachmes for the children alſo, grounding themſelues vpon the Kings Edict, by which it was ordained that for euery perſon they ſhould haue that ſumme, extending the ſame euen vnto the children.

Theſe things being thus magnificently exployted, according to the Kings command, hee gaue Demetrius in charge to make a Decree, as touching the tranſlation of the bookes of the Iewes. For the King did nothing raſhly, but adminiſtred all things with great wiſedome, and circumſpection; and for that cauſe the copie of Demetrius ſuggeſtion, and the letters ſent to this effect, are orderly regiſtred, and recorded in writing: the number likewiſe of the preſents that were ſent, and by whom they were offered. So that whoſoeuer ſhall behold the ſame, he ſhall incontinently iudge by the curious workemanſhip, the high perfection of the workeman, and by the excellencies of the pieces, he ſhall incontinently know by whom each of them was faſhioned.

Demetrius exhortatory letter to Ptolomey as touching his Library.

The copie of the aduice and ſuggeſtion made by Demetrius is this: Demetrius to the great King, Health. Moſt mightie Prince, Since you haue committed the truſt vnto mee to finde out thoſe bookes that are deficient in your Library, and to ſearch for ſuch volumes as hitherto haue beene hid from my ſight, to the end that I might gather them and perfect them, and that thoſe which are loſt, might be reſtored with all the diligence that thereunto belongeth, after that I had vſed herein all the care that in me was poſſible; I giue you to vnderſtand, that amongſt others we want the bookes of the lawes of the Iewes. For in that they are written in Characters and Hebrew words, wee haue no notice thereof; where-through they haue beene more negligently handled then was behoouefull: for that vntill this day it hath neuer hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended ſo farre. It therefore behoueth thee to haue them exactly interpreted; for ſince that thoſe lawes proceeded from God himſelfe, it is moſt certaine that of all other lawes in the world they are the wiſeſt and incorrupteſt. For which cauſe, Hecatæus the Abderite ſaith, that neither Poets nor Hiſtorians haue made any mention of them; neither of thoſe, who haue beene policied and gouerned vnder the ſame: becauſe in themſelues they are pure, and are not to be declared by impure lips. May it therefore pleaſe your Maieſty to write vnto the high Prieſt of the Iewes, commanding him to ſend you ſixe Ancients of euery tribe, ſuch as he ſhall know to be moſt expert in their law, by whom we may cleerely apprehend the ſenſe contained in thoſe bookes, to the end that hauing the faithfull interpretation of thoſe things that are contained therein, we may collect and gather them together, to the full ſatisfaction of your Maieſties deſire.

The Kings liberalitie towards the Iewes.

When the King had in this ſort beene both aduiſed and ſuggeſted, hee wrote vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt of the Iewes, as touching this matter: giuing him likewiſe to vnderſtand of that liberty by him granted vnto the Iewes that were in his kingdome: He ſent him alſo fiftie talents of gold, to make cups, ewers and veſſels, with an infinite number of precious ſtones, commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Iewels, to ſuffer the workemen to chooſe what ſtones they beſt liked. Furthermore, he willed that a hundreth talents ſhould be giuen for the ſacrifices and oblations, and other vſes of the Temple. But after that I haue declared what was the Copy of the Letter ſent vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt, and the manner how hee obtained that Sacerdotall dignitie; I will ſet downe both the rich preſents, and their curious workemanſhip.

After the death of Onias the high Prieſt, his ſonne Simon ſurnamed the Iuſt, ſucceeded him in his place, who for that cauſe was ſo called, by reaſon of the piety which he ſhewed toward God, and the good affection which he bare vnto his countrimen. This Simon dying & leauing behind him one only ſon, of young & tender yeeres, who was called Onias: his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we ſpeake at this preſent) tooke vpon him the Prieſthood, and to him wrote Ptolomey in ſuch manner as is hereafter expreſſed. King Ptolomey to the high Prieſt Eleazar, health: Whereas diuers Iewes dwelt in my kingdome, whom my father had honoured (though during the raigne of the Perſians they were drawne thither as priſoners) ſome of whom he hath eſtabliſhed to be Chieftaines in war, vnder honorable wages & conditions: To other ſome borne in his time in Ægypt, he hath committed his forts and garriſons, to the end they might be reſpected among the Ægyptians: After that I haue bin called to the Gouernment, I haue behaued my ſelfe graciouſly towards all men, and eſpecially towards thoſe of your nation, of whom I haue deliuered more then one hundreth thouſand out of captiuitie, diſburſing their ranſome out of mine owne cofers: I haue likewiſe inrouled ſome of thoſe that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of warre: I haue receiued ſome into my Court, whom I tooke to bee faithfull and loyall, & in my opinion well-worthy of ſuch preferment: ſuppoſing that the moſt acceptable and the deareſt preſent I might offer vp vnto God, for his prouidence extended toward mee in aduancing me to the kingdome, was to performe the ſame. And being deſirous not onely to gratifie them, but alſo all thoſe Iewes that are in the whole world, I haue determined to cauſe your law to bee tranſlated; that after it hath beene tranſcripted out of Hebrew into Greeke, I might place it in my librarie. You ſhall therefore do well, if you chuſe me out ſixe diſcreete and learned men of euery tribe amongſt you, who are already ſtept in yeeres, and ſend them vnto me, who by reaſon of their age ſhall be well inſtructed in your lawes, and ſufficiently enabled to expound the ſame. For in ſo doing, I ſhall accept it at your hands, as a great honour. For this cauſe I ſend vnto you Andrew the principall Captaine of my guard, and Ariſtæus alſo (whom we eſpecially honour) to conferre with you: by whom I haue ſent you one hundreth talents of ſiluer, as the firſt fruits of thoſe gifts and ſacrifices, which we intend to offer in the Temple. You ſhall doe vs an eſpeciall fauour, if you ſignifie your mind vnto vs by your letters.

As ſoone as Eleazar had receiued the Kings letters, he returned him an anſwer full of honour and affection, according to the tenour which enſueth: The high Prieſt Eleazar to King Ptolomey, Health. If you, your Queene Arſinoe, & your children be in health, all our affaires likewiſe haue no leſſe fortunate ſucceſſe. Wee haue receiued your princely letters with no ſmall ioy, and haue both read and conſidered vpon the contents thereof; we haue alſo publiſhed them in the preſence of all the people, and haue declared vnto them your pietie towards God, and haue ſhewed them thoſe viols which you ſent vs, twenty of gold, and thirty of ſiluer; with fiue veſſels, and a Table which in way of preſent you haue ſent vnto vs. We haue likewiſe ſhewed them thoſe hundreth talents which Andrew and Ariſtæus (very vertuous and excellent learned men, and honoured by you amongſt your deareſt friends) haue brought vnto vs, to be employed in ſacrifices and other neceſſities of the Temple. Know therefore, that whatſoeuer ſtandeth either with your content or profit, wee will enforce our owne natures, to the end we may acknowledge the benefits, which you haue diuers waies beſtowed vpon our nation. We haue therefore duely and continually offered ſacrifice for you, your Queene Arſinoe, your children and friends: the people likewiſe haue prayed that God would ſend you happy ſucceſſe in whatſoeuer you deſire, that your kingdome may be continued in peace, and that the tranſlation of our law may be accompliſhed in ſuch ſort, as you deſire, for your owne commodity. To that intent we haue choſen ſixe Elders out of euery Tribe, whom we ſend vnto you, together with the originall of our law. Our requeſt is, that according to your accuſtomed pietie and iuſtice, you returne vs both our lawes and theſe Interpreters in ſafety, as ſoone as they haue ſatisfied your expectation. Fare you well.

Eleazars letters in anſwer to Ptolomey.

This is the anſwer which the high Prieſt ſent vnto him. Yet haue I thought it to be a matter meerely vnneceſſarie to ſet downe the names of the ſeuentie two Elders in particular, who were ſent by Eleazar together with the law, notwithſtanding they were ſet downe in the Epiſtle. Yet thinke I it not amiſſe, to recite the excellency and faſhion of thoſe preſents that were ſent by the King, and offered vp vnto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards the ſeruice of God. For in performance therof, he ſpared no immeaſurable expence, but continually aſſiſted the workemen, and examined their workemanſhip, to the end that nothing might be careleſly finiſhed, or negligently performed. I will therefore ſet downe (as neere as in me lieth) the excellencie of euery piece (although it may be thought that the courſe of hiſtorie requireth it not) but therefore will I diſcourſe the ſame, becauſe my deſire is by ſo doing to expreſſe vnto the Readers, how great the liberality and generoſitie of the King hath beene. And firſt of all I will begin to deſcribe the Table.

The deſcription of thoſe preſents which Ptolomey dedicated in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The King deſirous to make it great in all dimenſions, deſired to know the greatneſſe of that which was at Ieruſalē, to the intent that he might cauſe it to be far greater. And hauing certaine notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, he ſaid that he would haue it fiue times greater then the other: but that he feared, leſt being ſo great, it would be vnfit to offer ſacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the oblations, which hee offered, ſhould not only ſerue for ſhew, but that they might alſo be ſomwhat proper for the vſe and ſeruice of the Temple. For this cauſe, concluding that the firſt was of ſufficient and conuenable meaſure, hee reſolued his ſhould not exceede the other in greatneſſe; but that equalling the ſame in quantitie of gold, it might exceed the other in varietie and beauty of workmanſhip. For he was ingenious to obſerue the nature of diuers things, and to inuent new and vnex-pected fashion: so that by his ripe iudgement, hee shewed the workemen such inuentions, as beforetime had not beene in vse; and commanded them to make and finish them, hauing alwaies an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to worke by. He vndertooke therfore to make the Table of two cubits and a halfe in length, of one in bredth, and of one and a halfe in height, all of massiue gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large; enriched with mooving waues, on which there was a bend grauen with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being triangulary, euery angle presented the same engrauing; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no waies different figure, represented it selfe: within the inside of this border it was inchased with diuers goodly figures, but on the outside it was farre more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eye. For this cause the vpper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we said) were apparant at such time as the table was turned, each one seeming of equall magnitude with the other. Vpon the graued bends there were precious stones inchased, distant by equall proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tyed by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselues to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the manner of an ouall; and there was a border of golden twigs engrauen round about the Table: vnder the ouals there was a crowne garnished with clusters of diuers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung downe, the spikes of corne stood vpright, and all was inclosed with pomgranats, and the precious stones were inchased in gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to present each sort of fruit in their natiue colours. There was also a ranke of ouals vnder the crowne, not vnlike to the former, made of gold: so that on both sides, both the variety and delicacie of the worke appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the table, in which there appeared not any difference, on what soeuer side it was turned; and from the top vnto the lower foote one and the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some foure fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the feet of the same were staied, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and claspes of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better be seene, and that on what side soeuer it were turned, it might alwaies seeme the same. They engraued also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were diuers kinds of precious stones, shining like starres: & amongst the rest there were Rubies and Emeralds of most orient brightnes, as also all other sorts of stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beauty or price. Neere vnto this labyrinth from the one end vnto the other, there were certaine corded pleits in the middle like vnto a Rhombus or Losenge, vpon which there were certaine pieces of Crystall and Amber, enchased and placed the one by the other in equall distance, and proportion: which gaue a marueilous contentment to whomsoeuer beheld the same: The Chapters of the feet were made after the forme of a Lilly; the leaues whereof bent themselues vnder the Table, whereas otherwaies the stalke seemed to be stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands bredth large, adorned with a Carbuncle in euery part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feete was staied; and on euery one of them was there ingrauen by curious workmanship Iuie, and vine branches loaden with clusters of grapes; so made to life, that they seemed to be very grapes indeed. For the whole was so subtill and delicate, that when the wind blew, the workemanship waued and was carried vp on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather naturall, then counterfaited by art. The work was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seames and ioynts might not any waies be seene. The thicknes of the table was no lesse then halfe a cubit.

See heere what this present was, which through intire affection the King presented; wherein the price of the stuffe, the diuersitie and beauty of the workmanship, and the excellencie of the engrauing was accomplished in perfection. Moreouer, in this hee so farre inforced himselfe to perform so much, that if it might not surpasse the other which was already in the temple, at least-wise in art, new inuention and excellencie of proiect, it might be farre more excellent and admirable. He gaue besides this, two vessels of gold, scaled from the bottome as farre as the halfe part of the Cup; and besides that, inriched with diuers precious stones curiously and diuersly enchased. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubit hie, made of all sorts of precious stones, and at the foote thereof were ingrauen spires, after the manner of twigs, and fast by them a certaine fould like vnto a net made in ouall fashion, that ascended euen vnto the brims. The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatnes of foure fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies, iuy, flowers, and vines with their clusters

Two golden standing cups.

A cluſters of grapes engrauen round about. This was the beauty and excellency of thoſe two cups, each of them containing twenty and foure pintes. There were alſo others made of ſiluer, ſo tranſparent, as if they had beene of the pureſt cryſtall, thorow which all things that were put into them, were naturally and manifeſtly diſcouered. Hee cauſed alſo thirtie ewers to bee made, in which all the gold that was not couered with precious ſtones, was ſhadowed with Iuie leaues, and vine branches moſt curiouſly engrauen: and all theſe things were not onely miraculouſly wrought by the wonderfull cunning of the workemen; but were in like ſort ſeconded by an ambitious diligence of the King, who thinking it not enough that without parſimonie he had vndertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forſaking his more ſerious affaires) viſit the ſhops, and examine the workes; and that which more and more increaſed their diligence, was, for that they ſaw him ſo intent vpon the buſineſſe, which made them the more earneſt vpon their worke.

Two ſiluer ſtanding cups. Thirty viols. Ptolomeis charge and diligence in the finiſhing of his preſents.

And theſe were the preſents which were ſent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Ieruſalem. All which being conſecrated & laid vp in the Temple by the high Prieſt Eleazar, after he had greatly honored thoſe that brought them thither, and deliuered into their hands certaine preſents to be tendred in his behalfe vnto the King, he diſmiſſed and ſent them backe againe. No ſooner were they arriued in Alexandria, but the King (hauing notice thereof, and how the ſeuentie two Elders were come with them) he ſent to ſeeke out his Embaſſadors, Andrew and Ariſtæus, who came and preſented him with letters from the high Prieſt Eleazar, and anſwered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face. And being deſirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Ieruſalem to expound and interpret the law, he contrary to his ordinary cuſtome and manner, diſmiſſed all thoſe that reſorted thither for their particular affaires, to whom he was accuſtomed to giue audience euery fift day; as it was his ordinary manner alſo to giue monethly ſatisfaction to forraine Embaſſadours. Hauing therefore for that time diſmiſſed them, he kept thoſe by him whom Eleazar had ſent vnto him; who comming to his preſence (accompanied with thoſe preſents which the high Prieſt had deliuered them to preſent vnto him, with the originall wherein the law was written with golden letters) he asked them where their bookes were: and they diſcouering and opening them, ſhewed them vnto him. After the King had ſeene them, he was very much aſtoniſhed, to ſee the membranes and parchments ſo delicate, and to behold the whole forme thereof ſo perfectly conioyned, that it was impoſſible to diſcouer the ſeames: and he told them that he gaue them thanks for that they were come vnto him, and more great thanks vnto him, that he had ſent them, and the greateſt and moſt ſpeciall thanks vnto God, who was the Author of theſe lawes. Whereupon, the Elders and thoſe that aſſiſted them, cryed out all together, and wiſhed that all good hap might befall the King: who through the exceſſiue ioy that he conceiued, burſt out into teares: For naturally extreme ioy and moſt grieuous ſadneſſe haue like effects. After he had commanded that theſe bookes ſhould be committed to their truſt, who were deputed to that office, at length he ſaluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behoouefull for him firſt of all to debate with them vpon the matter, to which intent hee had ſent for them: and afterwards to giue them entertainment: In a word, hee confeſſed vnto them, that their acceſſe was ſo gratefull vnto him, that he promiſed them, ſo long time as he liued, he would euery yeere renue and honour the memory of the ſame (and by good hap it was the very ſame day wherein he ouercame Antigonus by Sea.) His pleaſure was alſo, that they ſhould be his gueſts, and he cauſed diuers goodly lodgings to be aſſigned them vnder the Caſtle.

The 70. Interpreters comming to Alexandria are royally entertained.

Nicanor likewiſe, who had the charge to entertaine ſtrangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily imployed in the ſame) to prepare for euery one of them ſuch things, as were neceſſary for their dyet and entertainment. For ſo was it ordained by the King, that in euery Citie that had any particularitie in their manner of life; there ſhould be a Commiſſary appointed to prouide for forrainers that arriued in that place, to the intent they might be intreated according to their cuſtomes: intending thereby, that their entertainment ſhould be the more agreeable vnto them, and that they might be the leſſe tired with forraine nouelties. This cuſtome of his was put in practice at this time by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his owne perſon diſpoſed all that which was neceſſary for that hoſpitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in two ſeuerall parts (according as the King had commanded him) ſo that ſome of them might ſit on either ſide of him, and the reſt might be placed neere vnto his table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kinde of enteruiew. When they were in this ſort placed, the King commanded Dorotheus to entertaine them in like manner, as he was wont to doe thoſe, who repaired vnto his Court from Iudæa. Hereupon, he diſmiſſed the Ægyptian Prieſt, and other that were woont to make the ordinary prayers: which done, he commanded that one of the elders called Eliseus (who in like sort was a Priest) to blesse the table: whereupon he standing vpright in the midst of them all, besought God to blesse both the King & his subiects with all happinesse. Whereupon there arose an applause and acclamation of all men, intermixed with ioyfull delight; which being ceased, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheere, with that which was set before them. When the King had held his peace so long as he thought conuenient, he began at last to play the Philosopher, asking of euery one of them certaine questions in Physicke, praying them to decide and discusse the same: and when as each of them in order had very pertinently answered to the question that was propounded vnto them, the King tooke great pleasure therein, and for twelue daies space hee continued this feast. Whoso desireth to know the questions that were proposed vnto them in particular, let him reade the booke which Aristeus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was not onely astonished at their answers, but the Philosopher Menedemus also: who hauing affirmed that all things were administred by diuine prouidence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this discourse was, this qnestioning debate was finished. But the King protested in their presence, that their accesse had infinitely contented and instructed him, in that by their meanes he had obtained the good hap to bee informed by them how to gouerne his kingdome. Whereupon hee commanded that each of them should haue three talents giuen him, and that they might bee conuayed to their lodgings. Some foure dayes after, Demetrius tooke them with him, and led them ouer that trench of the Sea, that containeth seuen furlongs, and that bridge which couereth the Iland with the continent, and towards the northermost end therof, he assigned them a lodging remote from all noise, and fit for contemplation: to which place after he had brought them, he besought them, that since they had all those things that were necessary for the interpretion of their lawes, they would intend the same without any discontinuance of the worke, vntill they had brought it to perfection; and they for their parts imployed all their labour and diligence that was in them possible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning vntill three houres after noone: after which time they imployed the rest of the day in their refection; and to that end they were furnished in all aboundance with all sorts of victuals. Ouer and besides, Dorotheus presented them with a part of diuers dishes, which were prepared for the King: for so had his Maiestie commanded it. Thus euery morning entred they the Kings Palace, and after they had saluted him, they retired themselues to their accustomed place; and after they had washed their hands in the Sea-water, and were purified, they set them downe in that manner to proceed, and prosecute their translation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the worke was fully finished in the space of seuentie and two daies: Demetrius assembled all the Iewes in that place where the law had beene translated, and caused it to be read ouer in the presence of the interpreters themselues. Which done, the assembly approoued the exposition of the interpreters; and praised Demetrius, by whose suggestions, and inuention they inioyed so great a good. They requested likewise, that this exposition should be perused, and ouerread by the Nobles and Gouernours. After this, both the Priest, the Elders of the interpreters, and the Magistrates of the people required, that since this translation was so happily atchieued, it might remaine vnaltered; so that no iot thereof might be changed.

The translation of the Bible into the Greeke tongue.

Which resolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceiued any thing in that translation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he should consider thereupon and giue notice thereof, to the end it might bee corrected: dealing herein very discreetly, to the end that that which had once beene adiudged good, should continue inuiolable for euer. The King therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeauours and purpose in that behalfe so happily and profitably finished: but aboue all things, he tooke pleasure in reading of the law, admiring at the deepe conceit and wisedome of the Law-maker; and began to question with Demetrius, by what meanes it came to passe, that neither any Poet, nor Historiographer had made mention of that law, notwithstanding that in it selfe it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gaue this answer: that no man was so hardy to touch that worke, by reason that it was diuine and euery way venerable: assuring him also, that certaine men who had attempted to set their hands thereto, had beene punished by God: giuing him to vnderstand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce certaine contents of that law into his history, had beene distraught in minde for more then thirtie daies, and that hauing some intermission of his fit, he appeased God by prayer; thereby easily coniecturing what was the cause of his malady. Moreouer, he was certified by a vision that appeared vnto him in his sleepe, that this inconuenient befell him, in that he had too curiously searched into sacred and diuine matters, and had intended to communicate the same with pro-

Gods iustice vpon those Ethnicks that intermeddled with the Sacred Scriptures.

A prophane men: from which enterprize ſith he had deſiſted, he recouered his right wits againe. He likewiſe inſinuated further, that Theodeſtes the tragicke Poet, intending to make mention in ſome of his Poems of a certaine hiſtory written in the ſacred Scriptures, was ſtrooken blind; and acknowledging the cauſe hereof to proceede from his audacious preſumption, he was reſtored his ſight after he had appeaſed Gods diſpleaſure. The yeere of the world, 3684. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 380.

When the King had conſidered on theſe words, according as Demetrius had diſcourſed them vnto him, he proſtrated himſelfe on the earth, and commanded that the bookes ſhould be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integrity. Furthermore, he exhorted the Tranſlators to repaire oftentimes vnto him from Iudæa, aſſuring them that in ſo doing, the matB ter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time hee thought good to diſmiſſe them: but when they ſhould returne vnto him again of their owne motion, they ſhould obtaine all that which their wiſedome deſerued, or his magnificence might impart vnto them. This ſaid, he gaue them leaue to depart, after he had giuen each of them three ſeueral ſutes of apparell, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certaine bed or curious ſeate to ſit and banquet vpon. This gaue he them for themſelues. But to Eleazar the high Prieſt he ſent by them ten couches, whoſe feete were of ſiluer, and the furniture correſpondent, and a veſſell of thirty talents. Tenne purple robes likewiſe, and a magnificent Crowne, and one hundred pieces of fine linnen: and beſides that, he ſent in way of preſent vnto the Temple, Ewers, Baſons, and two golden veſſels: beſeeching Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his C ſubiects had a will to come vnto him, he would permit him, aſſuring him that he would highly eſteeme the conuerſation of ſo learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleaſure in ſuch affaires. See heere how Ptolomey Philadelph eſteemed and honoured the Iewes.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Aſia honoured the nation of the Iewes, and gaue them liberty and freedome to dwell in thoſe Cities that were builded by them.

D THEY receiued honor likewiſe at the hands of the Kings of Aſia, becauſe they had borne armes vnder them. For Seleucus ſurnamed Nicanor, highly reſpected them, and permitted them to dwell in thoſe Cities, which he built in Aſia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewiſe, which was the Metropolitane and chiefe City. Moreouer he ordained, that they ſhould be held in as great eſtimation, as either the Macedonians or Greekes that inhabited therin: ſo that euen vnto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Iewes refuſing to anoint themſelues with forraine oyle, doe receiue a certaine ſumme of money from the maſters of the exerciſes in lieu of the oyle. Which when the people of Antioch intended to aboliſh, during the preſent warre, Mutianus at that time Gouernour of Syria, oppoſed himſelfe againſt them. Againe, when as Veſpaſian and his ſonne Titus had conquered the world, although E the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priuiledges that the Iewes enioyed might continue no more; yet could they not obtaine the ſame. Whereby the humanity and valour of the Romanes may appeare, and in eſpeciall of Veſpaſian and Titus, that notwithſtanding they had been ſo trauelled by the wars of the Iewes, and were ſo bitterly incenſed againſt them, for that they had not by laying down their armes ſubmitted themſelues, but had continued war againſt them to the vttermoſt; yet depriued they them not of their fore-ſaid priuiledges, but ſurmounted their diſpleaſure, which they had long before conceiued againſt them: and in like ſort had not regard to the requeſt of two ſo puiſſant Cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were: In ſuch ſort as they granted nothing in fauour of them, neither ordained any thing in diſfauour of thoſe whom they had ouercome in warre, to the intent to aboliſh one only iot of thoſe priuiledF ges which they had in times paſt; but ſaid that they that had reſiſted them by armes, & who had bin ouercome, were ſufficiently puniſhed for their obſtinacy: and as touching thoſe that had not committed any offence, they ſaw no reaſon to depriue them of their rights and prerogatiues. We know likewiſe, that Marcus Agryppa was of the ſame opinion, as touching the Iewes. For whereas the Ionians were ſedicioully bent againſt them, and beſought Agryppa that it might be onely lawfull for them to make vſe of the priuiledge, which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greekes intituled by the name of God) had giuen them; requiring that if the Iewes were of their blood, they might be tied to adore the ſame gods which the Ionians worſhipped: When as therfore fore this matter was referred to the determination of the Iudges, the Iewes had the day, and obtained the liberty to liue according to their owne lawes and customes: and he that at this time pleaded their cause, was Nicholas Damascene. For Agryppa pronounced, that it was vnlawfull for them to innouate any wayes: And if any man desire to haue exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twenty three, and twenty fourth booke of the histories of Nicholas. Neither ought this iudgement of Agrippacs to seeme in any sort strange: for at that time our Nation had not by any warres procured the Romans displeasure. But vpon iust occasion may a man admire the magnanimity of Vespasian and of his sonne Titus, who behaued themselues with such moderation after so great a warre, and so grieuous battels, as they had fought against vs.

Antiochus the great, King of Asia and Syria, vexeth the Iewes.

Now will I returne to my purpose, from whence I haue digressed. At such time as Antiochus the great raigned in Asia, the countrey of Iewry was grieuously spoiled, and both the Iewes and the inhabitants of Cœlosyria endured many miseries. For Antiochus making warre against Ptolomey Philopator and his sonne, called Ptolomey the Famous, they were pittifully perplexed. For whether Antiochus either ouercame or was ouercome, they were continually spoiled: so that betwixt the prosperity and aduersity of Antiochus, they fared like a shippe tossed and tormented with a storme. Finally, after Antiochus had ouercome Ptolomey, he conquered Iewrie. After the death of Philopator, his son sent a great army into Cœlosyria vnder the conduct of Scopas, who seized a great number of those Cities; and our nation also was inforced by warre, and conquered by him. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, neere vnto the flood Iordan, and obtained the victory, discomfiting the greater part of the enemies army; at which time Antiochus recouered againe those Cities of Cœlosyria, which were before-time surprized by Scopas. He tooke Samaria also: which when the Iewes perceiued, they submitted themselues of their owne accord vnto him, and hauing entertained him in the Citie of Ierusalem, they gaue both his army and his Elephants abundance of prouision, and willingly assisted him with their forces, to subdue those garrisons which Scopas had planted in the fortresses of the higher City. For which cause Antiochus supposing it to be a matter behouefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardnes which the Iewes had expressed in his seruice, wrote vnto his Captaines and friends, signifying vnto them how forward the Iewes had bin in his wars: and to expresse likewise what gifts he intended to bestow vpon them.

Ptolomey Epiphanes king of Egypt warreth against the kings of Syria

The yeere of the world, 3760. before Christs Natiuity, 204.

Hereafter I will insert the copie of his letters, which he wrote in fauour of them, after I haue recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane writeth, answerable to this purpose, which I will recite out of the sixteenth book of his histories. Scopas (saith he) the Generall of Ptolomeys army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter ouercome the whole nation of the Iewes. He reciteth also in the same booke, that after that Scopas had beene ouercome, Antiochus seized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and anon after the Iewes, which dwelt at Ierusalem where the Temple was, ioyned themselues with him: and although we are to speake more amply and particularly of that apparition that hapned neere vnto the Temple; yet notwithstanding we will defer the recitall thereof vntill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to returne vnto our purpose: I wil recite in this place the copy of those letters which were sent by the King. King Antiochus to Ptolomey; Health. Whereas the Iewes haue giuen vs a most apparent testimony of their affection towards vs, since the first time of our entrance into their country, and haue magnificently entertained vs at such time as we were in person before their City, by presenting themselues before vs with all their Elders; and haue also furnished vs largely with all that which was necessary for our souldiers and our Elephants; and haue likewise taken armes with vs against the Ægyptian garrison: we haue thought it a matter answerable to our honor, to affoord thē some satisfaction in repairing their City, ruinated by humane casualties, to the intent it might be inhabited and peopled againe, by gathering together those Iewes that are scattered abroad in diuers places, and planting them againe in the same. And in especiall (to the end that the seruice of God may be renued) we haue set downe a certaine summe of money to be imployed in sacrifices, and in buying beasts for their offerings, wine, oyle, and incense; that is to say, twenty thousand sicles of siluer; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one thousand, foure hundred and sixtie measures of wheate, and three hundred, seuenty and fiue measures of salt. And my will is, that all these things that are abouenamed, be deliuered vnto them according to the forme of our ordinance. We likewise command, that the worke of the Temple be finished with the galleries, and other necessary buildings; and that all the stuffe of timber be brought out of Iudæa and other places, and especially out of Libanus: without any taxe or tillage: which exemption also shall take effect in all other necessaries, that are requisite towards the reparation of so famous Antiochus Epistle to Ptolomey, as touching the liberty of the Iewes.

A mous a temple. My pleasure likewise is, that all they of the same Nation gouerne their estate, according to their owne lawes. Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the temple also, and the singing men be freed from all taxations, that are paid by the powle, and the tributes of the crowne, and al other whatsoeuer. And to the end that the city may be the sooner builded, I grant vnto all them that inhabit the same at this present, or that hereafter shall transport themselues thither within the moneth of October to inhabit, the same exemption of all charges for three yeeres space. We forgiue them moreouer the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recouer themselues of their losses. We will also that those Citizens that haue bin forcibly led from thence into seruitude, be set at liberty, both they themselues, as also those that are of their alliance; commanding their goods to be restored vnto them. Farewell.

The yeere of the world, 3760. before Christs Natiuitie, 204.

B These were the contents of this Letter. And to yeeld the more honour vnto the Temple, he sent an Edict thorow all his kingdome to this effect: That it should not be lawfull for any stranger to enter within the inclosure of the Temple, without the Iewes permission; except those that should be purified, according to the law and custome of the place. That no man should bring into the City any flesh of horse, mulet, wild or tame asses, leopards, foxes, or hares, or generally of any cattell prohibited to be eaten by the lawes of the Iews. That it should not be lawful likewise for any man to bring their skinnes into the City, or to nourish any such beasts in the same; but that it might only be lawfull to vse those beasts which might be sacrificed vnto God, according to the law of their ancestors. That whosoeuer should contradict those inhibitions, he should pay

C 3000. drachmes of siluer vnto the Priests. Furthermore, to expresse his piety & fidelity towards vs, at such time as he heard of the troubles that hapned in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also vnto Zeuxis gouernour of one of the higher prouinces, & his intire friend, commanding him to send certaine of our nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing vnto him to this effect: King Antiochus to Zeuxis his father, Health. If thou art well, I am glad of it: I likewise am no lesse healthy. Vnderstanding that those of Lydia & Phrygia are newly grown to rebellion, I haue thought good (according to my duty) to preuent the same: and whil'st I consulted with my friends what was to be done, it hath been thought fit that two thousand families of the Iewes, with all their houshold s should be sent thither, all which should be drawne out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to

D plant them in garisons, and places of securitie. For I am perswaded of their good affection and zeale towards vs, both in respect of their deuotion towards God, as also for the testimony which our predecessors haue borne of them; namely, that they are faithfull, and ready to execute that wherein they are employed. And although it be a difficult matter to remoue them, yet resolue I my selfe that it shall be done; and withall, I permit them to liue according to their lawes. Now when they shall arriue in that place, thou shalt bestow on euery one of them places to build them houses on, with sufficient lands both for tillage and to plant their vineyards in: for which they shall pay no tribute for ten yeeres space: and during such time as they may gather of their owne for their sustenance, they shall be allowed their prouision of corne for them and their seruants. Our wil is also that they, who shal be employed on necessary affaires, be sufficiently prouided of that they need, to the intent that being so bountifully dealt withall by vs, they may shew

E thēselues the more affectionate in that which concerneth vs. Thou shalt giue order also to the vttermost of thy power, that this natiō be no waies ouerpressed, or interessed by any man. Farewel.

The yeer of the world, 3764. before Christs Natiuity, 200.

Hitherto we haue sufficiently declared, what friendship Antiochus the great bare vnto the Iewes. After this, Antiochus contracted alliance and friendship with Ptolomy, who gaue him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and assigned him for her dowrie Cœlosyria, Samaria, Iudæa, and Phœnicia: and for that these two Kings diuided the tributes betweene them, the chiefest in authoritie in euery Prouince, redeemed the exaction of their countrey, and paid the sum agreed vpon to the Kings treasurie.

The Samaritanes molest the Iewes.

The yeere of the world, 3770. before Christs Natiuity, 194.

At that time the Samaritans puffed vp with their prosperitie, vexed the Iewes, spoiling their country, & leading them away prisoners perforce. This hapned vnder the high Priest Onias. For after the decease of Eleazar, Manasses his vncle obtained the Priesthood; and after the death of Manasses, Onias the son of Simon surnamed the Iust, enioyed this dignity. Simon was brother to Eleazar, as I haue heretofore declared. This Onias was of no great capacity, & withall was very couetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty talēts of siluer, which his predecessors were wont to pay to the Kings of Egypt, of that tribute which the people paid vnto him. Wherupon Ptolomey Euergetes, the father of Philopater, was grieuously incensed against him; so as he sent an Embassador to Ierusalem to accuse him, for that he failed to pay his accustomed tribute, threatning him, that if henceforward hee receiued it not, hee would diuide his countrey amongst his souldiers, ſouldiers, and ſend them to inhabit the ſame. When the Iewes were aſcertained of his complaints, they were confuſed, and amazed: but Onias was no whit mooued thereby, becauſe he was wholly giuen ouer to couetouſneſſe.

CHAP. IIII.

IOSEPH the ſonne of TOBIAS preuenteth the imminent calamitie of the Iewes, and becommeth PTOLOMIES friend.

The taxation of the high Prieſt for offending the King.

BVT a certaine man called Ioſeph, the ſonne of Tobias, and of Onias ſiſter, who was the high Prieſt, being young in yeeres) but honoured in Ieruſalem for his wiſedome, foreſight, and iuſtice) hauing certaine notice by his mother of the arriuall of this Embaſſadour, came vnto the Citie (for he had beene abſent in the village of Phicala where he was borne) and ſharply reproued Onias his vncle on the mothers ſide, for that he did nor any waies prouide for the ſecuritie of his Citizens, but ſought to draw his countrey-men into a generall hazzard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was leuied for the tribute: Whereby hee told him that he had obtained the gouernment ouer the people, and purchaſed the high Prieſthood. And that if he were ſo bewitched with money, that for the loue of the ſame he could haue the patience to ſee his countrey in hazzard, and behold his Citizens alſo ſuffer all that which cruelrie could inflict vpon them; he counſelled him to repaire vnto the King, and to require him to beſtow the whole or the halfe of the tribute vpon him. Hereunto Onias anſwered, that hee would no more execute the gouernment, and that if it were poſſible for him, hee was ready to giue ouer the Prieſthood, and that therefore hee would not repaire vnto the King, becauſe hee was not any waies mooued with theſe occurrences. Whereupon Ioſeph asked him, if hee would permit him in the peoples behalfe to goe Embaſſadour vnto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias anſwered that he gaue him free leaue. Vpon this occaſion Ioſeph went vp into the Temple, and ſummoned the people to a generall aſſembly, exhorting them to be no waies troubled, and to conceiue no feare through the negligence of his vncle Onias, requeſting them to be confident in heart, and eſtranged from al ſiniſter ſuſpicion; promiſing them that he himſelfe would go in Embaſſage vnto the King, and faithfully plead their cauſe before him, & perſwade him that they had committed no inſolent neglect, or contempt againſt his maieſtie. Which when the people vnderſtood, they gaue Ioſeph hearty thankes. Whereupon he preſently came downe from the temple, and honourably entertained the Embaſſadours that came from Ptolomey, and hauing preſented them with gifts of great price, and feaſted them magnificently for many daies, he ſent them backe to their Prince; aſſuring them that he would in perſon follow them. And the rather was hee incited to this iourney, becauſe the Embaſſadour had perſwaded him to repaire into Egypt, vnder ſuch aſſurance, that he would obtaine all his requeſts at Ptolomeys hands; the rather for that hee was won with the yonng mans free ſpirit and noble entertainment.

The Kings Embaſſadour honourably entertained, who reporteth Ioſephs liberalitie vpon his returne into his countrey.

Aſſoone as the Embaſſadour returned into Egypt, he certified the King of Onias ingratitude, and Ioſephs humanitie: certifying him that hee would come in perſon to intreat pardon for the people, for that offence they had committed againſt him; and the rather, for that he was in eſpeciall authoritie among the people: and ſo farre vſurped hee vpon Ioſephs praiſes, that both the King and the Queene Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithſtanding hee was as yet abſent. But Ioſeph ſent vnto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Hauing therefore furniſhed himſelfe with apparell, veſſels, and horſes, with the expence of almoſt twenty thouſand drachmes, he arriued in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and gouernours of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the King was accuſtomed euery yeere to ſell them to the men of moſt reſpect in euery city: Theſe meeting with Ioſeph on the way, began to mock at his baſeneſſe and pouerty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the King was at Memphis, he ſet forward & went out to meet him. When as therfore the King, accompanied with the Queene & Athenion his friend, who had diſcharged the place of Embaſſadour in Ieruſalem, came riding onward in his charriot; Athenion (who had beene honourably entertained by Ioſeph) perceiuing him vpon the way, certified the King that it was he, of whom he had ſpoken vpon his returne from Ieruſalē; proteſting on his behalf that he was both a good & honorable young man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him aboue the reſt, and made him mount his charriot. Where he was no ſooner ſeated, but the King began to accuſe Onias for that which hee had committed. But Ioſeph ſaid vnto him, Pardon him, O King, and haue reſpect to his olde yeeres. For you know

A know that ordinarily old men and young children haue one and the ſame vnderſtanding; but for our ſelues, who are yong, you ſhall haue what you pleaſe to require, without any pretext or cauſe of diſcontent. Hereupon the King tooke pleaſure in the good behauiour and pleaſant diſcourſe of the young man, and began to loue him the more, as if he had receiued a preſent atteſtation of his wiſedome: whereupon he commanded that he ſhould be lodged in his owne Palace, and that daily he ſhould accompany him at his princely Table. The yeere of the world, 3770. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 194.

As ſoone as the King came backe to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria ſeeing Ioſeph ſitting neere vnto the King, were ſore diſpleaſed: and the day drawing neere wherein they were to receiue the aſſurance of their tribute, they that were of the greateſt reckoning in their Country farmed the ſame; ſo that the tributes of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, Iudæa, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thouſand talents. Whereupon Ioſeph ariſing, blamed the farmers, for that they had plotted amongſt themſelues to beate downe the price of the tributes, promiſing to giue the double; and that he would likewiſe returne the forfeitures that were leuied vpon the goods of ſuch as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gaue eare to this diſcourſe of his with great content, and ſaid, that he approued the ſale of theſe tributes vnto Ioſeph, who in this ſort augmented his reuenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could giue ſureties: he made him anſwer with a bold courage: O King (ſaid he) I will giue thee ſuch pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and ſuch as you cannot miſtruſt. When as therefore the King inſtanted him to produce them: I will (ſaid he) O King, preſent thee for ſureties, thy ſelfe, and the Queene thy wife, that one of you may be a ſurety for me to the other. Ptolomey ſmiling hereat, granted him the farme of the tribute, without further ſurety. This fauour of his diſpleaſed thoſe Gouernours of the Cities that were come into Ægypt, in that they ſaw themſelues contemned and conſtrained to returne with ſhame vnto their houſes. But Ioſeph obtained 2000. footmen from the King, to the end to enforce the tribute from thoſe Cities, who were negligent in their paiments: and after he had borrowed fiue hundreth talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria. The tributes of Cœloſyria committed to Ioſeph.

As ſoone as he came to Aſcalon, he demanded the paiment of the tribute at the Citizens hands, which they not onely refuſed to performe, but moreouer vpbraided him with iniurious words. For which cauſe laying hold on about ſome twenty of the principals among them, he put them to death: and hauing gathered their ſubſtances together, hee ſent the King ſome thouſand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomey admiring at his wiſedome, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to diſpoſe of all things at his pleaſure. The Syrians vnderſtanding hereof, were ſore abaſhed; and perceiuing that the Aſcalonites were ſlaine by Ioſeph, through the ſeuerity of his iuſtice and their diſobedience, they opened him the gates, and receiued him willingly, and paied him their tributes. Wheras alſo the Scythopolitanes in way of contumacie refuſed to lay downe according to order, their accuſtomed tributes; he ſlew the chiefeſt amongſt them: the confiſcations of whoſe goods he ſent vnto the King. When as therefore he had gathered much ſiluer, and made great gaines of the purchaſe of the tributes, to the intent to eſtabliſh and make his power of more continuance, he liberally employed his gettings; conſidering with himſelfe, that it was a part of wiſedome to keepe and entertaine his good hap, by thoſe riches which he himſelfe had gotten: For he ſent many preſents both to the King and Queene, and beſtowed liberall bounty both on their familiars and fauourites, and alſo on all thoſe which had any authority, credit or fauour in the Court, to winne and bind them vnto him by his beneuolence. And in this felicity of his continued he the terme of twenty two yeeres; during which time he was the father of ſeuen children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, whom he begot on the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he married vpon this occaſion which enſueth. The Aſcalonites and Scythopolitanes puniſhed for their contẽpt. Ioſephs wealth and children.

Walking vpon a time in Alexandria in the company of his brother (who led with him his daughter already mariageable, to the intent to beſtow her vpon ſome Iew of good quality (whilſt he ſate at meate with the King, there entred into the banquet a certain faire damſell, trained vp in dancing, with whom growing enamoured, he told his brother thereof, praying him that ſith by the lawes of their countrey it was forbidden that a Iew might marry with a ſtranger, that he would hide his fault, and be a faithfull aſſiſtant vnto him, to the end that hee might enioy her whom his heart deſired. His brother promiſed him to ſhew his willing forwardneſſe herein; and in the meane time he adorned and decked his owne daughter, and brought her by night vnto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who ſhe was, by reaſon he had drunke ouermnch) and had her company. burningly inflamed with the loue of this Dancer, and told his brother that he was in danger to G be enamoured all his life time; & that notwithstanding the King would not grant her vnto him.
His brother told him that he ought not to vexe himselfe, promising him that he should assuredly enioy her whom he loued, and that already she was his wife; opening vnto him how all things had hapned, and how he had rather wrong his owne daughter then to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Ioseph had praised the kinde and naturall affection of his brother towards him, he tooke his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath beene said. Who being thirteene yeeres old, gaue testimony of that naturall spirit, and dexterity that was in him; by reason whereof his brethren conceiued a certaine hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled them in all things, and had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate H him. Whereas therfore Ioseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest iudge-ment, and vnderstanding; hee sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned backe vnto him rude, and illettered, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, he sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desart place distant from the high way some seuen daies iourney, and gaue him with him three hundreth couple of Oxen, to sowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

When as therefore he came vnto the place, and perceiued that the yokes were missing, he asked aduice of some of the husbandmen: who counselled him to send some one backe vnto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would bee spent in sending backe a messenger, deuised a cunning expedient stratageme, more then might be expected from one of his yeers. For he caused tenne couple of Oxen to be slaine, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the skinnes, and fashion couples thereof, and hauing yoked his Oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home vnto him. Who loued him the more intirely, by reason of his wise-dome, and the subtilty of his vnderstanding; praising besides that his resolution and execution, esteeming him the more, for that he was his onely true son, to the generall discontent of the rest.

Ioseph sendeth his sonne Hircanus to Ptolomey.

When as therefore newes was brought vnto Ioseph, that about that time King Ptolomey was blessed with a young sonne, and how all the chiefest Lords of Syria, and the countries vnder his obeysance, repaired to Alexandria in great pompe to celebrate the birth day of the Kings sonne; K hee being of himselfe vnable (by reason of his age) to repaire thither, he sounded his children, whether any one of them would goe and visit the King. When as therefore the eldest sons had excused themselues, and made refusall to vndertake the iourney, pretending that they were of insufficient ability to performe the message, and all of them gaue counsell that their brother Hir-canus might be sent: Ioseph tooke great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would goe to King Ptolomey: who promised to vndertake the iourney, and told his father that he needed no great sum of money to performe the voyage; becausse in the way he would trauell frugally, & content himselfe for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Ioseph was very glad to heare of his sonnes prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for awhile, he coun-sailed his father, that he should not present the King with any thing out of Iudæa, but that hee should write vnto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliuer such summes of money as he thought conuenient to buy that which he found to be most magnificent & of best esteeme in that Citie. Ioseph imagining with himselfe, that perhaps he would only employ some ten talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsell, wrote vnto his factor Arion (who had the vse of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering vp his money in Syria, hee was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the Kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to defray the same. Hauing therefore letters of credence vnto him, he iournied towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote presently vnto all the Kings friends, that by some meanes they would make him away.

The yeere of the world, 3780. before Christs Natiuity, 184.

Treason intended against Hircanus.

As soone as hee was arriued in Alexandria, and had deliuered his fathers letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would haue? hoping that he would craue but ten, or some little ouerplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth and reproued him for his prodigalitie, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with much trauel, & thrifty sparing; and refusing his demands, he praied him to imitate his fathers example who begot him: and in a word he told him, that hee would deliuer him no more then ten talents; & that for no other vse, then to buy gifts to present the king withall. Whereupon Hir-canus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra, praying

ing her that she would moderate the young man (for Arion was in great estimation with the Queene, who for this cause acquainted the King with the matter. Whereupon Ptolomey sent for Hircanus, and said vnto him; that he maruelled that being sent vnto him from his father, he had not as yet visited him; and besides that, he had committed his fathers agent to prison: he therefore commanded him to yeeld him a reason thereof. Whereunto he answered, that there was a law among the Iewes, that no man should taste of the sacrifices that had not first of all visited the Temple, and sacrificed vnto God; and that in that respect he had not hitherto visited his Maiesty, because he expected certaine presents to present his Highnesse with from his father, who was his bounden seruant. Furthermore, he alleadged, that he punished his fathers seruant, because he had disobeyed his commandement, which he ought not to doe, whether his master were either noble or ignoble: and if (said he) we chastise not such men, as they haue deserued, expect (O King) that you also shall be neglected by your subiects.

Hircanus apologie of his actions.

When Ptolomey heard these words, he began to smile, and wondred at the magnanimitie of the yong man. Arion perceiuing that the King held himself satisfied, and that he was like to haue no assistance at his hands, deliuered Hircanus the thousand talents, and by this meanes was he set at liberty. Some three daies after, Hircanus came and saluted both the King and Queene; who entertained him graciously, and feasted him kindly, for the affection sake which they bare vnto his father. He priuily enquiring among the marchants, bought one hundreth young lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age; paying a talent for euery one; and the like number of Virgins for so many talents. Being therefore inuited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, because that (by reason of his young yeeres) they that assigned the places, according to euery mans dignity, made small account of him. Now when as all the guests, after they had eaten their meates, laid all their bones before Hircanus, so that the table was loaden round about him, a certain pleasant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whose merry conceits and iests the King very willingly listned vnto) during the time he was at meat, being sollicited by those that were at the table, came vnto the King and said vnto him, See here, my liege, what store of bones are before Hircanus: hereby you may coniecture, that his father hath fleeced all Syria, as he hath bared these bones of flesh. The King laughing at Triphons words, asked Hircanus how he came by so many bones before him? Not without great cause (said he) O King; for dogs deuoure the flesh with the bones, as these doe (in which speech he glanced at those who sate with him at the table, because they had no bones before them) but men eate the flesh, and cast the bones away, as I doe, because I am a man. The King wondring at his discreete answer, commanded all the rest to applaud him, in approbation of his witty vrbanity.

Hircanus iests

The next day he sought out all the Kings friends, and the Principals in court, and saluted them one by one, enquiring of their seruants, what presents they would court the King with vpon the birth of his sonne? Who told him, that some of them would giue twelue talents, and other some that were in dignity, would present them according to their ability. Whereupon Hircanus made a shew of discontent, in that he wanted power to offer such a present, pretending that he had no more but fiue talents. All which these seruants presently reported to their masters: who were very ioyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceiued that Ioseph should be blamed, and would offend the King through the abiectnes of his present. Now when the day of the solemnity was come, and they likewise that pretended to present the King most magnificently, offered no more then twenty talents: Hircanus presented the hundreth young Lads he had bought, to the King, and the Virgins vnto Cleopatra: for whom hee had paid a talent by the powle. At this vnexpected magnificence of his gift, al men were amazed: but besides this, he gaue gifts of diuers talents to the King and Queenes fauourites and seruants, and their attendants; whereby hee warranted himselfe from the danger that might fall vnto him by their means. For the brothers of Hircanus had written vnto them, to murther him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this young man, and willed him to aske whatsoeuer gift he best liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would please the King to recommend him by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the King had singularly honoured him, and had giuen him many bountifull rewards, he wrote vnto his father and his brethren, & all his Gouernours, and Commissaries, and in that sort sent him away. His brothers hearing newes how hee had in all things highly contented the King, and that hee returned with great glory, they issued out to meete with him, with an intent to murther him, with their fathers knowledge. For he being displeased with him, by reason of his abouenamed large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yet concealed he his discontent for feare of the King. But when his brothers came and encountred when as vpon his repaire vnto Ieruſalem, he perceiued that no man entertained him, he was aceiuing and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus ſurnamed Soter, the ſon man of good conceit and great courage; who eſtabliſhed the people of the Iewes in their entire peace, and hath releaſed them from pouerty and many diſaſters, and had held the tributes of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres. His vncle Onias dyed alſo about

The letter of the King of Lacedemon to the High Prieſt of the Iewes. 1 Machab. 12.

ARIVS King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We haue found out a certaine writing wher-in it is recorded, that the Iewes and Lacedemonians are of the ſame race, and both of them deſcended from Abraham. It is therfore requiſite, that ſince you are our brethren, that you giue vs to vnderſtand wherein we may pleaſure you. The like will we doe alſo, and will repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours, ſhall in eommunity be yours. De- moteles our meſſenger bringeth you our letters folded in ſquare, the ſeale whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. Theſe were the contents of the Lacedemonians letters: After the death of Ioſeph it came to paſſe, that the people began to mutine in the quarrell of his children. For the elder brethren made warre againſt Hircanus, who was the younger, by meanes whereof the people were diuided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the High Prieſt Simon alſo, by reaſon of his affinity with them, followed their party. Whereupon Hircanus reſolued to repaire no more vnto Ieruſalem, but fixing his habitation on the other ſide of Iordan, he made continuall war againſt the Arabians, ſlaying a great number of them, and taking many priſoners. He builded a huge tower of white marble from the bottome to the top, & on the ſame planted he the figures of many liuing creatures in ſculpture of great height. About the ſame he drew and forced a deepe trench of flowing water; & hauing hewed the front of the rocke that ſtood oppoſite againſt his building, he made diuers caues therin, many furlongs long.
He alſo made diuers chambers therin, both to eate, ſleep, and dwell in. He drew thither likewiſe currents of ſpringing water, in ſo great aboundance, that it gaue much delight to thoſe that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of euery caue was ſo little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made ſo narrow, becauſe they might the better ſerue for his ſecurity and refuge; that if ſo be he were at any time aſſailed by his brethren, he might auoid the danger of ſurprizall. Moreouer, he builded many huge halles, which he adorned with great and goodly gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him Tyre, and is ſituate betweene Arabia and Iudæa, on the other ſide of Iordan, not far from the country of Elſebonitis. He commanded in this country ſome ſeuen yeeres, all that time that Seleucus raigned in Syria. After whoſe death, his brother Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdome.
Ptolomey alſo King of Egypt (who was likewiſe called Epiphanes) died, and left two children very young behind him, of whom the eldeſt was called Philometer, and the yonger Phiſcon. When as therefore Hircanus perceiued Antiochus grew mighty and ſtrong, and feared to be puniſhed by him for his executions done againſt the Arabians, he ſlew himſelfe with his owne hands, and

Ieſus created High Prieſt by Antiochus Epiphanes. Ieſus depriued of the Prieſthood.

ONIAS the High Prieſt being dead about this time, Antiochus gaue the Prieſthood to Ie- ſus his brother. For that ſon, vnto whom Onias had left the ſucceſſion, was as yet very young (of whom we will ſpeake in conuenient time and place.) This Ieſus (Onias brother) was depriued of the Prieſthood, through the Kings diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him, who

gaue it ſhortly after to his younger brother called Onias: For Simon had three ſonnes, who, as we haue declared, ſucceſſiuely poſſeſſed the Prieſthood: this Ieſus cauſed himſelfe to be called Iaſon, as his other brother cauſed himſelf to be called Menelaus, wheras his name was Onias. But Ieſus, who had firſt of all beene eſtabliſhed in the place of the high Prieſt, aroſe againſt Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were diuided into factions, and Tobias ſonnes were on Menelaus ſide: but the greater number of people followed Iaſon: ſo that Menelaus and the ſonnes of Tobias being grieuouſly vexed by them, retired themſelues to Antiochus, giuing him to vnderſtand, that it was their intent to forſake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the Kings, & to liue after the manner of the Greeks; exhorting him to giue them licence to erect a place of Exerciſes in Ieruſalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them, they ſo demeaned themſelues, that there appeared no more ſigne of Circumciſion in them; ſo that at ſuch time as they were naked, there was no difference betweene them and the Greekes, and neglecting all the ordinances and cuſtomes of euery countrey, they conformed themſelues to the behauiour and manners of other nations. Antiochus hauing all things in his kingdome, according to his hearts deſire, reſolued to make warre in Ægypt: deſiring to be poſſeſſed of the ſame, both for that he contemned Ptolomeies ſonnes age (who were as yet weake) as alſo for that they were not as yet capable to manage their ſo mightie eſtates. Arriuing therefore neer to Peluſium with a great power, he circumuented by a ſubtill policy the young Ptolomey Philometor, and ſubdued Egypt: for after he had beſieged Memphis and taken the ſame, hee came to Alexandria, with an intent to beſiege the City, and to lay hold of the King who was therein. But he was driuen, not only from Alexandria, but alſo out of al Egypt, by the ſummons that was ſent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and diſlodge his army out of that countrey, as we haue heeretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly diſcourſe the acts & geſts of this King, who ouercame Iudæa, and ſpoiled the temple: for hauing onely made a brieſe mention of him in my former workes, I thinke it neceſſary in this place to make a more exact recitall of his Hiſtory.

AFTER that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the feare of the Romans, had forſaken that countrey, hee led his army againſt Ieruſalem, and encamped before the City, and ſurprized it by ſurrender, in that the gates of the City were ſet open vnto him by thoſe of his faction: all which hapned in the hundreth, forty and third yeere of the raigne begun by Seluchus. Now when he ſaw himſelfe Lord and maſter of Ieruſalem, he ſlew diuers of the contrary faction; and after hee had gathered together many great and rich ſpoiles, he returned backe to Antioch. This misfortune hapned ſome two yeeres after the ſurprizall of the City, in the hundreth, forty and fiue yeere of the raigne of that family, on the fiue and twentieth day of that month which we call Chaſleu, and the Macedons Apellaus, the Romanes Decembuer; in the hundreth, fiftie and three Olympiade; at which time he neither ſpared them who gaue him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, and effected him the meanes to ſpoile the ineſtimable riches of the Temple, with greater freedome: but being no leſſe tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, he ſpared neither. For hauing ſeene what quantity of gold was in the Temple, and how huge a number of preſents and precious ornaments were in the ſame, he was ſo ouercome with couetouſneſſe, that he brake and violated all conuentions and conditions. After therefore he had ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels dedicated vnto God, the golden candleſticke, the golden altar, the table of the ſhew-bread, the cenſers, and pulled downe the curtaines made of fine linnen and ſcarlet; after hee had emptied the treaſures that were hidden, and left nothing behind him of any value: hee drowned all the Iewes in grieuous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbad them to offer their vſuall and daily ſacrifice vnto God, according to the preſcript order of the law: and after he had ſpoiled the whole City, he ſlew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the reſt of them into captiuitie, with their wiues and children, to the number of ten thouſand. Furthermore, he burned the faireſt buildings of the City, and razed the walles, and raiſed a fortreſſe in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high citadell, commanding the reſt. For this cauſe, hauing incloſed it with high walles and towers, he planted a garison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scumme of the wicked Apostate Iewes, who were giuen ouer to all impieties, and who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischieuous iniuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and ordinance of the Iewes. He constrained them likewise to forsake their deuotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he reuerenced for Gods, building in euery City and Borough both Temples & Altars, on whom he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbad them likewise to circumcise their children, threatning to punish him whosoeuer he were, that was found to doe the contrary. Moreouer, hee chose certaine ouersecrs that should constraine them to fulfill his commandement; so that a great number of Iewes, some of their owne accord, other some for feare of threatned punishment, endeauoured themselues to satisfie the Kings decree. But those men who were of vpright hearts, and valiant minds, little respected these menaces: For hauing more respect to their lawes & customes, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced, if they performed not the edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruel punishment, for many daies, amidst the which they yeelded vp the ghost. For after they were whipt and maimed in their bodies, they were crucified and tortured aliue: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the neckes of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred scripture, they defaced and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruell death.

The diuel seeketh to abolish the Bible. The variable wits of the Samaritanes, which made them so odious in the sight of the Iewes.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Iewes, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, and called their temple of Garizim no more the temple of God, but (as we haue heretofore declared) they shewed their owne corrupt & vnconstant natures, and challenged their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent Embassadours to Antiochus with letters to this effect, To King Antiochus the mightie God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem. Our Ancestors enforced by the continuall pestilence that ranged in their countrey, and induced by a certen ancient superstition, haue bin accustomed to obserue that day as a festiuall, which the Iewes call their Sabbath; and hauing builded on the mount of Garizim a temple, & dedicated it vnto a god, who hath no name, hath offered vp in the same diuers and solemne sacrifices. But since that you haue inflicted punishment on the Iewes, according as their wickednes deserueth, the cõmissaries of the King, supposing that we were tied to their customes (by reason of some alliance between vs) couple vs with them, and charge vs with the same accusations: wheras we are borne Sidonians, as it appeareth by the rolles of our common-weale. We therefore beseech you, who are our benefactor and Sauiour, to command your gouernour Apollonius, and your steward Nicanor, not to molest vs any more, by charging vs with those accusations which appertaine vnto the Iewes: who neither are tied vnto vs by alliance, neither accord with vs in manners; but that our temple, which hath not hitherto borne the name or title of any God, may now be called the temple of Iupiter of Greece: by which meanes we shal be deliuered from all trouble, and being at liberty to attend our affaires, we may the easier & more willingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritanes the King answered, sending them backe their owne letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor; Health. The Sidonians of Sichem haue sent vs this suggestion; which we annexe vnto these our letters. Since therefore they, who were sent vnto vs to this intent, haue sufficiently approoued both to vs and our councell of friends, that they are vtterly strangers vnto those crimes, wherewith the Iewes are charged, and are desirous to liue according to the lawes of the Græcians, we absolue them in as much as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of Iupiter of Greece: we haue written to the like effect also to Apollonius our Magistrate. Iohn

A Iohn called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Iudas called Machabæus, Eleazar named Auran, and Ionathan called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained vnto his ſonnes, as touching the miſerable eſtate of their Common-weale, the ſacke of their Citie, the ſacriledge of the Temple, and the miſeries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the law, then to liue in ignominie. When as therefore the Commiſſaries deputed by the King, came vnto the Borough of Modim, to conſtraine the Iewes to performe that which was enioyned them, and to command them to ſacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who ſurpaſſed the reſt in honour, and other qualities, but in eſpeciall in excellency of deſcent and nobilitie) to begin firſt of all to offer ſacrifice, to the end that the reſt might follow him and be induced by his example; promiſing him that in ſo doing, the King would honour him greatly: Matthias anſwered thereunto, that he would in no ſort commit that idolatry, aſſuring them that notwithſtanding all other nations of the world, either in reſpect of loue, or for feare of iuſtice ſhould obey the edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he, nor any of his children could or would be induced to forſake their fathers religion. Now as ſoone as hee had returned this anſwer, and held his peace, a certaine Iew ſtepped forth to offer ſacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in ſuch ſort diſpleaſed, that both he and his ſonnes fell vpon him, and with their ſwords hewed him in pieces. He ſlew Apelles the Kings Captaine likewiſe, with certaine other ſouldiers, who would haue withſtood him. And not content herewith, he ouerthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice: If (ſaid he) any one be affectioned to the lawes of his fathers, and the ſer-
C uice of God, let him follow me: and this ſaid, he ſuddenly retired himſelfe into the deſart with his ſonnes, leauing the Borough vtterly diſpoſſeſſed. The reſt doing the like, retired themſelues into the deſart, with their wiues and children, and made their habitation in certaine caues. The Kings Captaines hauing intelligence hereof, gathered thoſe forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Ieruſalem, and purſued the Iewes into the deſart. And hauing ouertaken them, they laboured firſt of all, to make them ſubmit themſelues, and to make choice of that which ſtood with their profit, rather then to indanger themſelues, and inforce them to chaſtice their diſobedience, with blood in warre. But the Iewes reſpected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands, who had already concluded and reſolued among themſelues, rather to die then commit ſuch an impietie: For which cauſe they (who omitted no opportunitie) aſſailed the D Iewes on a Sabbath day, and burned them within their caues, who neither reſiſted their enemies, nor ſo much as clozed vp the mouthes of their caues: And therefore abſtained they from all defence by reaſon of the day, reſoluing with themſelues, in no ſort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to ceaſe from all labour on that day.) There were therefore about ſome thouſand ſtifled in their caues, accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithſtanding, diuers eſcaped, who ioyned themſelues with Matthias, whom they appointed likewiſe for their Captaine; who declared vnto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day, aſſuring them that if they did it not, but ſcrupulouſly obſerued the law, they themſelues ſhould be enemies vnto themſelues, if perhaps the enemy ſhould aſſaile them that day, and ſhould not ſtand vpon their guard: for by that meanes they ſhould be deſtroyed without reſiſt. By theſe words he perſwaded them to doe as hee had ſaid: and vntill this day it is a cuſtome among vs, that if need require, we make no difficultie to fight on the Sabbath day. Matthias therefore hauing aſſembled a ſufficient number of men about him, deſtroyed the Altars, and ſlew thoſe that had forſaken their religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For diuers were ſcatte-red heere and there among the nations, for the feare they had; theſe commanded he to circumciſe their children that were not circumciſed; driuing thoſe from euery place, whom Antiochus had ordained to ſee his law executed.

After therefore Matthias had gouerned for the ſpace of one yeere, hee fell ſicke of a moſt deſperate diſeaſe; for which cauſe he called for his ſonnes, and ſpake vnto them after this manner: My ſonnes, I muſt now walke the way that is deſtinated vnto all men: I therefore recommend and exhort you to follow my deliberation, and diligently to obſerue the ſame, remembring you of the intent of me your father, who haue begot and nouriſhed you, which is, to maintaine the lawes of our countrey, and to eſtabliſh our eſtate, which is vpon the point to be ouerthrowne, except you ſubmit vnto thoſe who either voluntarily or forcibly betray the ſame: ſhew your ſelues therefore to be worthy ſons of me who am your father; ſtrengthen your hearts with courage to ouercome all force and neceſſitie; thinking with your ſelues, that if God ſee that you be ſuch, he will not forſake you, but taking pleaſure in your vertue, he will once more grant you the fauour to recouer your former peace and libertie, and will eſtabliſh you in aſſured poſſeſſion of your ancient lawes. True it is, our bodies are mortall and subiect vnto destiny, but the memory of our vertuous actions are enfranchised by immortalitie: being therefore stirred vp with the loue thereof, striue and bestirre your selues to obtaine honour, to the end that proiecting mighty things, you make no difficulty to hazzard your liues in the execution of the same. Aboue all things, I exhort you vnto concord, to the end that in whatsoeuer one of you shall bee found » more naturally apt and fitted then another, he may prosecute the same without any contradicti- » on of the rest. AFTER Matthias had spoken in this sort vnto his sonnes, and prayed God to fauour their enterprizes, and to restore the people to their ancient policy, and the accustomed fashion of their life, which they had in former times continued and obserued; he died anon after, and was buried in Modin. After the people had grieuously lamented and mourned for him, for a certaine time; and performed publikely such honour in his funerals, as was agreeable to his estate: his sonne Iudas Machabæus tooke vpon him the gouernment of the warres, in the hundreth forty and sixt yeere; and by the assistance both of his brethren and other Iewes, hee draue the enemies out of the countrey, and put those of his owne nation to death, who had forsaken their religion; and purged the countrey of all vncleannesse, which had beene brought into it.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 9. Iudas Machabæus ouercommeth Apollonius in battell. Seron Gouernour of Cœlosyria is put to flight in Iudæa.

WHEN Apollonius, who was Antiochus Generall in Samaria heard hereof, he gathered his army together, and inuaded Iudæa: against whom Machabæus made head, and ouercame him in a battell, wherein there died many, and amongst the rest Apollonius; whose sword Machabæus got as his part in the spoile. There were a great number of them also who were wounded, and much bootie was taken in the enemies campe: after which execution inriched with spoiles, he retired himselfe. But Seron Gouernour of Cœlosyria hearing hereof, and vnderstanding that diuers had ioyned themselues with Iudas, and that hee had already about him a sufficient power to keepe the field, and bid the battell; hee thought that it concerned him to begin to punish those, who resisted the Kings Edicts. For which cause, after he had assembled all the forces that hee had, and besides them hired certaine apostate or fugitiue Iewes, hee marched forth against Iudas, and came as farre as Bethoron a village in Iewry, where he incamped. Iudas also came out to meete with him, determining with himselfe to bid him battell: and seeing that his souldiers would hardly be drawne out to fight (both by reason of their inequalitie of number, as also for that they had eaten no meate, but had fasted a long time) he encouraged them, saying, that the meanes to obtaine victory, and to haue the vpper hand ouer » their enemies, consisted not in the greatnesse of their number; but in their deuotion towards » God: whereof they had a most euident example in their forefathers, who had oftentimes de- » feated with a small number of men, diuers thousands of their enemies, because they fought for » iustice, for their law, and for their children: for the greatest force (said he) that a man may haue, » is to be innocent and without iniury. By these words perswaded he his souldiers, so that without any feare of the multitude of their enemies, they all together ranne vpon Seron, and encountring with him, they discomfited the Syrians. For their Chieftaine being slaine, all the rest betooke them to their heeles, in which thing onely consisted the safetie of their liues. Iudas therefore, pursuing them as farre as the champaine, slew about eight hundreth of them. The rest saued themselues in those quarters that bounded vpon the Sea.

CHAP. XI.

LYSIAS and GORGIAS lead their armies into Iewry, and are ouerthrowne.

The yeere of the world, 3799. before Christs Natiuitie, 165.

WHEN King Antiochus heard these tidings, hee was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, and hiring diuers strangers and mercenary Ilanders, he prepared himselfe to inuade Iudæa about the Spring time. But after the muster of his army, when he truly found that his treasure failed him, and that he was in great scarcitie of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his owne nature a man of great and magnificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolued first of all to goe into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affaires with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as gouerned all the countrey from Euphrates, as farre as the borders of Ægypt, and the lower Asia) giuing him likewise a part of his army and some of his Elephants. To him had the King giuen charge to see his sonne Antiochus well and carefully trained vp, vntill his returne: commanding him expressely, that when he had conquered Iudæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaues, and sell them to those that would giue most, and destroy Ierusalem, and vtterly abolish that race. The King hauing giuen this charge to Lysias, led forth his army towards the countrey of Persia, in the hundred, forty and seuenth yeere: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the Gouernours of the higher countrey.

Antiochus committing his kingdome Prouinces & son to Lysias charge, departeth into Persia.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the sonne of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authoritie amongst the Kings friends) and gaue them forty thousand footmen, and seuen thousand horsemen, to inuade Iewry. Who marching as farre as the Citie of Emaus, encamped in the plaine field, and strengthened their army with diuers allies out of Syria, and of the countries thereabouts, and with diuers Iewes also, who were Apostates. There came also certaine Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Giues with them, to manicle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

When Iudas had viewed the campe, and numbred the enemy, he encouraged his souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to inuocate and call vpon him, according to their law, and that clothing themselues in sackcloth, they should humble themselues according to their accustomed manner in such extreme dangers, and call vpon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so doing, God would haue compassion on them, and giue them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battell, according to the ancient custome of his countrey, by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for feare lest such men being too niggard of their liues, or distracted by such affections, should not fight couragiously; he stood vp in the midst of them, inciting his souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words: My countrimen and companions, neuer haue wee hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to expresse our courages, and contemne our dangers, then at this present. For at this time, if you fight couragiously, you may recouer your liberty: which of it selfe is so acceptable vnto you all, that being of it selfe most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to bee affected, because by it onely you shall winne the meanes to serue God. As therefore you shall be disposed at this time, you may obtaine the same, and withall enioy a happy life (which consisteth in liuing according to our lawes, and ancient customes) if you behaue your selues valiantly: but if you proue cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremity of infamy, and hope no lesse then the vtter extermination of all your race. Thinke therefore with your selues, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your selues that in fighting for your liberty, for your lawes, and for piety, you shall obtaine immortall glory: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you may bid your enemies battell. Thus spake Iudas to his army, to encourage them.

Iudas oration to his soldiers.

Whil'st thus hee was intent about the future battell, certaine tydings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and fiue thousand footmen, to the end that (vnder the conduct of some fugitiues, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set vpon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to breake into the enemies army, especially for that he knew that their forces were diuided. Hauing therefore refreshed both himself & his army somewhat liuely, and left a number of fires in his campe, he marched all the night, and sought out the enemy, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiuing that the Iewes had forsaken their campe, supposed ſuppoſed that they were retired for feare into the mountaines to hide themſelues: For which cauſes trauelling onward, he determined to ſearch diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Iudas accompanied with three thouſand men (who were ſlenderly armed by reaſon of their pouerty) ſhewed himſelfe vnto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after hee had ſurueyed and ſeene their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how ſouldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithſtanding they ſhould be naked: for although they were in that eſtate, yet God (who tooke pleaſure in the greatneſſe of their courage) had already giuen them the victory againſt a number of armed ſouldiers: and ſuddenly hee commanded the trumpets to ſound, ſo that ruſhing in vpon his enemies on the ſudden, he diſmayed them, and diſcomforted their hearts. And after he had ſlaine diuers of them who reſiſted, and put all the reſt to flight, he purſued them as farre as Gadara; and the Plaines of Idumæa, of Azot, and of Iamnia. In this encountry there died about ſome three thouſand of the enemy. Notwithſtanding, Iudas would not permit his ſouldiers as yet to take the benefit of the ſpoile, becauſe they were as yet to fight againſt Gorgias and his army, aſſuring them, that as ſoone as they had valiantly executed the ſame, it ſhould be lawfull for them to make their booty, without feare, becauſe they ſhould haue no further enemies, either to feare or expect.

Iudas ouercommeth Lyſias army.

Whileſt he ſpake in this ſort vnto his ſouldiers, they that were with Gorgias, diſcouering from the top of a certaine hill, perceiued that the armie that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their campe was on fire: for although they were farre off, yet did the ſmoake aſſure them of the ſame. When theſe men vnderſtood that the matter had falne out in this ſort, and perceiued Iudas and his fellowes in battell ray expected their comming, they feared, and betooke them to flight. When as therefore Iudas perceiued that Gorgias troupes were diſcomfited, without ſtroke ſtriken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great ſtore of gold, ſiluer, ſcarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling place, with ioy, praiſing God for their happy ſucceſſe: for this victory did not a little aduantage them, towards the attainment of their libertie. But Lyſias being confuſed at the diſcomfiture of thoſe whom he had ſent, aſſembled another army of almoſt threeſcore thouſand choſen men, and fiue thouſand horſemen, to inuade Iudæa. After he had therefore made his entry by the mountaines, he incamped in Bethſura, a village of Iudæa.

Iudas gathereth a huge prey.

Lyſias once more inuadeth Iudæa, and loſeth fiue thouſand of his ſouldiers.

Iudas hauing knowledge thereof, came forth againſt him, accompanied with ten thouſand men; and diſcouering the number of his enemies far to exceed his (after he had beſought God by praier that it would pleaſe him to fight with him) he charged the vauntguard of the enemy with ſo great force, that he diſcomfited them, and ſlew about ſome fiue thouſand of them, leauing the reſt in great feare. Lyſias knowing the reſolution of the Iewes, and how they were preſt to die, except they might liue in liberty; on the other ſide redoubting their deſperations, more then their forces, he gathered together the reſt of his army, and returned backe to Antioch: where he ſoiourned, hiring many forraine ſouldiers, to make a greater army and preparation to inuade Iewry withall.

The Temple of Ieruſalem.

The yeere of the world, 3801. before Christs Natiuitie, 163.

After that Antiochus Captaines had beene diſcomfited ſo many times, Iudas aſſembled the people together, and told them, that after they had obtained ſo many victories through the mercy of God, it behooued them to aſcend vp vnto Ieruſalem, & to purifie the Temple that was deſolated; and to offer thoſe ſacrifices ordained by the law. Aſcending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple deſart, and the gates thereof burned, and graſſe growing within the ſame, through deſolation. Being therefore confuſed with ſo pitious a ſpectacle, he began to weepe with all thoſe that accompanied him: And hauing choſen out certaine of his beſt ſouldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garriſons that were in the fortreſſe; whiles he himſelfe purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly & reſolutely fulfilled, he ſent for new veſſels, a candleſticke, a table, an altar of incenſe, all made of gold. He put alſo vailes or hangings to the doores, accuſtomed to be ſpred abroad; and ſet gates to the Temple. And hauing throwne down the altar of burnt offerings, which had bin prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all ſorts of ſtones, neither hewne, nor hammered according to art. The fiue and twentieth day of the moneth of Chaſleu (with vs September) there were lights ſet vpon the candleſticks, and perfumes laid vpon the altar, and loaues impoſed vpon the table, & ſacrifices offred vpon the new altar. All which hapned the ſame day three yeeres, wherein before-time the ſacred Religion was changed into prophane and hatefull impiety. For the Temple was ruinated and left deſolate by Antiochus, and remained in that eſtate for the ſpace of three whole yeeres. For this deſolation hapned in the hundreth, forty & fift yeere, and the fiue & twentieth day of the moneth called Apellæus or Auguſt; in the hundreth, fifty and three Olympiade: and the Temple was repurged on the ſame day,

The yeere of the world, 3801. before Chriſts Nativity, 163.

After that Iudas had reeſtabliſhed the ſeruice of the Temple, both hee and his countrimen ſolemnized a feaſt for eight daies, omitting not any kinde of honeſt pleaſure, banquetting them ſumptuouſly and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Pſalmes. Thus reioyced they at this reeſtabliſhment, ſeeing that contrary to all hope after ſo long time, they had recouered the cuſtomes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: ſo that a decree was made for thoſe that ſhould come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the ſpace of eight daies the

He incloſed the City likewiſe with a wall, and builded high towers thereon, in which hee planted garriſons againſt the incurſions of the enemies. Hee fortified the City of Bethſura alſo, that it might ſerue as a fort againſt the enemy.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed thus, the nations round about diſpleaſed with the reeſtabliſhment and force of the Iewes, oppreſſed diuers, whom they ſurprized by ambuſhes and treachery. On thoſe Iudas made continuall war, to hinder their incurſions, and to make them partakers of thoſe euils they had inflicted vpon the Iewes. So that inuading Acrabathan, hee ſlew the Idumæans

After this he departed from thence, and made warre vpon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty armie, vnder the conduct of Timotheus. Theſe did hee encounter with and ouercome, and tooke their City of Iazor, and burned it, and led away their wiues and children into captiuity, and afterwards returned into Iudæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, aſſembled themſelues together in Galaad againſt the Iewes, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who hauing retyred themſelues to the fort of Dathema, ſent letters vnto Iudas, giuing him to vnderſtand, that Timotheus intended to ſurprize the place wherunto they were retreated, and requeſted

E IVDAS bethinking himſelfe of that which beſt concerned him in theſe two vrgent and inſtant occaſions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thouſand choſen men with him, and to goe and ſuccour thoſe Iewes that were aſſailed in Galilee: and himſelfe, accompanied with Ionathan his other brother, and eight thouſand fighting men, repaired vnto the countrey of Galaad; leauing the gouernment of the reſt of the forces in the hands of Ioſeph the ſonne of Zachary, and with Azarias, commanding them to haue a carefull and diligent eye to Iudæa, and not to enter battell with any one, vntill his returne. Simon arriuing in Galilee, fought againſt his another Castle where the Iewes were inclosed, and shut vp by Timothy and his army; and attaining the same about the mornings brie, he surprized the enemy, at such time as they were raising their ladders to scale the walles, and addressed their engins for battery: wherupon he caused the trumpet to be sounded, and after he had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinsmen and friends being in great danger, & had distributed his forces into three battalions, he set vpon the enemies rereward. Timotheus souldiers perceiuing that it was Machabeus, whose valor and good hap they had already approued to their great losse, they without delay tooke themselues to flight. But Iudas with his army followed after them, and slew about eight thousand of them, and marching towards Malla (a city of the enemies) he surprized the same, and slew all the men therein, and afterwards consumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he tooke and destroyed Chaspoma, Bosor, and diuers other places in Galaad.

Iudas succoureth the besieged Iewes.

Timothies souldiers slain. Malla taken and burnt. Chaspoma & Bosor taken. Timothy gathereth new forces, and is ouercome by Iudas.

Anon after Timothy leuied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his succour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his passed he the floud, and encamped neere vnto a towne called Rapha; exhorting his souldiers to behaue themselues like valiant men against their enemies the Iewes, and to hinder their passage ouer the streame: foretelling them, that if they should win the passage, both he and his were assured of the worst. Iudas vnderstanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him al his forces, and marched hastily against the enemie; so that hauing passed the riuer, hee set vpon them, killing diuers of them that resisted, and grieuously affrighting the rest, who casting away their armes, were constrained to flie. There were some of them, who saued themselues by swiftnesse of foote: and some also, who retired themselues into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be secured and so to escape: but after that Iudas had taken in the City where the temple was, he slew them, and burnt the same, enforcing his enemies to suffer diuers and dreadfull sorts of death. After this execution, hee led away with him from Galaad all the Iewes, their wiues and children, and substance, and brought them with him vnto Iudæa. When as therefore hee drew neere vnto the towne of Ephron, which was situate directly in his way, so that it was impossible for him to march any other waies or returne home, except they levelled their way (which they refused to doe) he sent Embassadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free passage thorow their City. For they had made Baricadoes of stones to cut off the passage. When as therefore the Ephronites would giue no eare vnto him, he besieged their city for a day and a nights space, and took and burned the same, and slew all the men that were therein; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and so great a number was there of those that were slaine, that he marched vpon the bodies of dead men.

The Iewes are brought out of the country of Galaad into Iudæa. Ephron besieged & burnt.

After they had past Iordan, they came into a great Plaine, wherein the City of Bethsan (by the Greekes called Scythopolis) confronted their eies; from whence they departed and came into Iudæa with ioy and gladnes, singing and praysing God, & vsing their accustomed pastimes and songs of victory. This done, he offered vp sacrifices of thanksgiuing for their happy successe, and the safety of his armie; for that in all those battels and encounters he had not lost one Iew.

An admirable victory of Iudas Machabæus, who in all these conflicts lost not one man.

In the meane while two captaines, to wit, Ioseph the sonne of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garrison of Iudæa (whil'st Simon went into the countrey of Galilee against those of Ptolemais, and Iudas and Ionathan his brother were in Galaad against the Ammonites) desirous also for their part to obtaine the honour and reputation of valiant men of war by some notable exploit; tooke their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Against these issued out Gorgias, who was Gouernour in that place, and charged them in such sort, as the Iewes lost some two thousand men, and fled as farre as the marches of Iudæa. This mischiefe fell vpon them, because they had disobeyed Iudas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For besides many other proiects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foresaw that if they should attempt any thing contrary to his command, they should haue but bad successe therein. Iudas and his brethren making war against the Idumæans, gaue them no respit, but continually charged them on euery side: they tooke also the City of Chebron, and destroied all the fortifications in the same, and burnt the towers, spoyling all the countrey of the enemies, and razed the City of Marissa likewise. Afterwards comming to Azot, they tooke and spoiled it, and carried away a great quantitie of booty from thence, and returned backe into Iudæa in safety, ioyfull of their victory.

Polybius Megalopolitane of the cause of Antiochus sickneſſe.

AT that time Antiochus trauelling along the higher countries of his kingdome, vnderstood that there was a very wealthy Citie in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a rich Temple of Diana, repleniſhed with all sorts of presents: wherein also he was enformed, that Alexanders armes and curets, who was Philip King of Macedons sonne, were reserued there of long time. Vpon these considerations he was incited to repaire vnto Elymais, which he besieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his siege, but sustained the same valiantly, he failed of his purpose. For they draue him from their City, and sallying out vpon him, they pursued him so hotly, that he fled backe to Babylon, and lost a great number of his men. Whileſt thus he was discomfited, for that he had beene frustrated of his hope, newes was brought him of the ouerthrow of his Captaines, whom he had left to warre against the Iewes, and how they of Iewry were now the stronger, and had the vpper hand. This trouble seconding his former discontent, he was surprized with despaire, and fell sicke; which sickneſſe aggrauated with other accidents, increased in such sort, that hee knew well that he should die: and for that cause he called for his most familiar friends, and certified them, that his sickneſſe was violent and desperate, and that he was seized with such affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Iewes, and destroyed their Temple, committed horrible sacriledge, and contemned the reuerence of God: and whileſt thus he spake vnto them, he gaue vp the ghost. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwise praise-worthy) for that hee writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would haue spoiled the Temple of Diana in the countrey of Persia. For sith he had onely intended to commit sacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to suffer punishment for the same. And if it seemeth good vnto Polybius, that Antiochus was punished by death for this occasion, it is farre more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the sacriledge he had committed in the Temple of Ierusalem. But our purpose is not to argue against those that maintaine, that Polybius reasons are of greater truth and consequence, then ours are.

Antiochvs Evpator discomfiteth the Iewes, and besiegeth Ivdas, and shutteth him vp in the Temple.

Antiochus appointeth Philip gouernour of his kingdome, and committeth his sonne Antiochus to his charge.

The Macedons in the Castle of Ierusalem doe much harme to the Iewes.

Iudas Machabæus besiegeth the Castle.

The fugitiue Iewes flie out of the Castle, and require Antiochus assistance.

BEfore Antiochus gaue vp the ghost, hee called for Philip one of his chiefest familiars, and made him Gouernour of his kingdome. And hauing deliuered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other iewels, he charged him to beare and deliuer them to his son Antiochus, requiring him earnestly to haue care of his bringing vp, and to maintaine the kingdome in his behalfe, vntill he comming vnto the yeeres of discretion, were fit to manage it himselfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred, forty and ninth yeere of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lysias had certified the people of the Kings death, he proclaimed his sonne Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, surnaming him Eupator, (according to the instructions that were giuen him.) About that time, the garrisons and Apostataes that were in the fortresse of Ierusalem, did much mischiefe vnto the Iewes. For setting vpon those at vnawares, who ascended the Temple to worship and offer their sacrifice, they slew them: for the fortresse commanded the Temple. For these causes Iudas resolued to cut off these garrisons, and to that intent he assembled all the people, and besieged it. This enterprize was vndertooke in the yeere one hundred and fiftie, after that Seleucus had vsurped the gouernment of those countries. Hauing therefore made him certaine engines, and raised diuers rams, he industriously continued the siege: But diuers of those Apostataes that were reuolted, and of that garrison, issued out by night, and assembling together such men as were of so malicious nature as themselues, they came vnto King Antiochus, requiring him that he would not suffer them to be abused in such sort by those of our nation; nor so carelesly neglected by them, considering their disgrace grew by his fathers seruice, for whose sake they had forsaken their owne religion, and followed his lawes and ordinances. Furthermore they inferred, that the fortresse was in danger to be surprized by Iudas, and his associates, except some present succours were sent vnto them. When Antiochus the yonger had notice hereof, he was sore displeased, and sent for his Captaines and friends, commanding manding them to hire ſtrange ſouldiers, and all thoſe in his kingdome, who were of yeeres to beare armes; ſo that he gathered in ſhort time an army of one hundred thouſand footmen, and twentie thouſand horſemen, and thirtie two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed he out of Antioch, committing his army to Lyſias direction. As ſoone as he came into Idumæa, he went vp vnto Bethſura a walled Citie, and very difficult to be ſurprized, which he beſieged and began but with ſuch a diſaduantage, that the Bethſurians reſiſting him valiantly, and ſallying out vpon him, burned thoſe preparations and engines which he had furniſhed for the battery of the towne. When as therefore a long time was conſumed about the ſiege, Iudas hauing intelligence of the Kings approach, raiſed his campe from before the Caſtle of Ieruſalem, and marching forward to meet the enemy, he ſhut his army in a certaine ſtreight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, ſome ſeuenty ſtounds diſtance from the enemies campe.

Iudas with his forces encountreth the King at Beth-zacharia.

The King hauing tidings hereof, raiſed his ſiege from Bethſura, and marched toward the ſtreight wherein Iudas army was incloſed, and about the morning hee ſet his ſouldiers in battell array. He firſt of all cauſed his Elephants to march one after another thorow the ſtreight (for that it was impoſſible for them to march in ſquare. About euery Elephant were one thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen. Theſe Elephants bare high towers on their backs, garniſhed with Archers. Touching the reſt of his forces, he cauſed them to aſcend two ſeuerall wayes by the mountaines, vnder the conduct of his moſt intireſt friends, commanding them with a huge ſhout and cry to charge their enemies, and to diſcouer their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Iewes: whereupon, the mountaines reſounded with fearefull cries of Antiochus army: Yet was not Iudas any waies amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, hee ſlue almoſt ſixe hundred of the forlorne hope. But Eleazar, ſurnamed Auranes, Iudas brother, ſeeing a huge Elephant among the reſt armed with royall trappings, and ſuppoſing that the King was vpon the ſame, he ranne againſt him with a mighty courage; and after he had ſlaine diuers of them that enuironed the Elephant, and ſcattered the reſt, he thruſt his ſword into the belly of the beaſt, and wounded him to the death: ſo that the Elephant falling vpon Eleazar, ſlew him with the waight thereof; and thus nobly died this worthy man, ouerthrowing a great number of his enemies, through his infinite valour. Iudas ſeeing his enemies forces ſo great in number, retired backe to Ieruſalem to continue his ſiege: and Antiochus ſent part of his army to Bethſura to ſurprize the ſame, and with the reſt he himſelfe marched onward to Ieruſalem.

Iudas returneth to Ieruſalem, and Antiochus followeth him.

The Bethſurites being afraid of this mighty army of the King, and ſeeing their neceſſary prouiſions failed them, yeelded vp their Citie, after they had taken the Kings oath, that they ſhould receiue no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this City, he offered them no iniury; onely he thruſt them out diſarmed from the Citie, and planted a garriſon therein. Hee ſpent a long time alſo in beſieging the Temple of Ieruſalem, for that they who kept the ſame, defended it valiantly. For againſt euery engine the King builded and raiſed vp againſt them, they erected a contrary engine. Their onely want was victuals, becauſe their old prouiſion was conſumed, and the ground had not bin manured that yeere becauſe it was the ſeuenth; in which, according to the law, the countrey and ſoile ſhould not be ſtirred: which was the cauſe that diuers of thoſe that were beſieged, fled ſecretly for want of victuals, inſomuch that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this eſtate were they who were beſieged in the Temple.

The Bethſurites yeeld vp their Citie.

The Temple of Ieruſalem beſieged.

When as King Antiochus and Lyſias the Generall had receiued tidings, that Philip comming out of Perſia, intended to make himſelfe Maſter and Lord of the countrey; they concluded to giue ouer the ſiege for that time, and to march forward againſt Philip, without giuing any inkling thereof either to his ſouldiers or Captaines. He onely commanded that Lyſias ſhould communicate the ſame with the Captaines, without diſcouering of his deliberation or enterprize againſt Philip; and to tell them that for theſe reaſons he leuied the ſiege: firſt, for the length thereof; next, for the ſtrength of the place; Laſtly, for want of victuals, and for many affaires that required ſome circumſpect and carefull foreſight in the kingdome: Furthermore, for that he thought it moſt expedient to capitulate with the beſieged, and contract friendſhip with all the nation of the Iewes, promiſing and permitting them the exerciſe of their religion, becauſe they onely rebelled, for that they were depriued of the ſame; and for that hee was aſſured, that hauing the grant thereof, they would each of them returne into their owne countries. When Lyſias had expreſſed and publiſhed theſe reaſons, all the Armie and the Captaines approoued the ſame.

Antiochus hearing newes of Philips intent to inuade Perſia, giueth ouer his ſiege to meete him.

WHEREVPON Antiochus sent a herauld to Iudas and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to liue according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and hauing taken an oath and assurance from the King; they surrendred vp the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entred the same, and seeing it to be a place so well fortified, he contrary to his oath, commanded his army to leuell the wall that enuironed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with him the High Priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the King to murther Menelaus, if he intended that the Iewes should liue in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the author of all those euils, by reason of the counsaile he had giuen to Antiochus his father, to inforce the Iewes to forsake their religion. The King for that cause sent Menelaus vnto Berœa a city of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enioyed the High Priesthood for the terme of ten yeers. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his onely ambitious desire of authority had inforced our nation to reuolt from their religion. As soone therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made High Priest, who was called Iacimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slew him. But Onias the son of the High Priest (whom as we haue heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancy) seeing that the King had slaine his vncle Menelaus, and giuen the Priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the Priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Lysias, he fled vnto Ptolomey King of Ægypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queene Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signiorie, where he builded a Temple like vnto that which was at Ierusalem: whereof we shall hereafter haue more fit opportunity to speake.

BACCHIDES Generall of DEMETRIVS army, commeth to make warre against the Iewes, and returneth backe againe vnto the King without performance of any thing.

AT that time Demetrius, Seleucus sonne fled to Rome, and tooke possession of Tripolis in Syria, and after he had set the Diademe vpon his head, and had leuied and hired certaine souldiers, he inuaded the kingdome: where he was receiued to the generall content of all men, who submitting themselues vnto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them aliue vnto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had raigned two yeeres, as we haue already declared in another place. To this new elected King, diuers Iewes (banished for their impietie) and with them the High Priest Alcimus made their resort: who in generall accused their nation, and as principals Iudas and his brethren, obiecting against them, that they had slaine his friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the Kingdome and expected his comming, some of them were slaine; and that the rest being driuen from their natiue countrey, were banished into other places: requiring him that hee would send some one of his friends to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Iudas and his brethren. Demetrius was much mooued by these reports of theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose gouernment at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gaue an army, ioyning with him the high priest Alcimus, with commission to kill Iudas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his army, came into Iudæa, and sent a certaine herauld to Iudas and his brethren, to intreat with him vpon certaine articles of peace, because his intent was to surprize them by some subtitie and treacherie. But Iudas smelling his drift, gaue little trust vnto him: for in that hee came thither with so great an armie, he easily coniectured that he intended no peace; but to make warre: notwithstanding some of the people gaue eare vnto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their countryman, they submitted themthemſelues vnder his gouernment. Hauing therefore receiued an oath from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers ſhould any waies be endamaged by them, they committed themſelues to their protection. But Bacchides ſetting light by his oath, ſlue threeſcore of them; and by this breach of his faith towards theſe, he cauſed others (who intended to ſubmit themſelues) to forſake and flie his gouernment. As ſoone as therfore he had remooued his army from Ieruſalem, he came vnto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of thoſe which had fled, and ſome others among the people, he ſlue them all, commanding all thoſe that liued in the country to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place for the guard of his perſon a part of his army: and that done, he returned vnto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the meane while Alcimus intending to aſſure his eſtate and gouernment; and ſuppoſing that it ſhould be ſo much the better confirmed, if ſo be he could obtaine the good will of the people, he vſed all kind of plauſible and familiar ſpeech vnto them; and deuiſing with euery man pleaſantly and graciouſly, hee adioyned in ſhort time great forces to thoſe which he had before: amongſt whom there were many fugitiues and vngodly men, by whoſe helpe and aſſiſtance he marched thorow the country, killing all thoſe whom he found to be of Iudas faction. Iudas perceiuing that Alcimus hauing gathered great forces, had already ſlaine diuers of the moſt vprighteſt men, and ſuch as feared God in all his nation, he addreſſed himſelfe alſo to ouerrunne the countrey, and ſlue as many of Alcimus partakers, as he could meet with. Who perceiuing in himſelfe that he was vnable to reſiſt Iudas, made his account to recouer Demetrius fauour. For which cauſe he repaired to Antioch, and incenſed Demetrius grieuouſly againſt Iudas, accuſing him for inforcing many iniuries againſt him: proteſting that he ſhould endure farre more, except he were preuented and puniſhed by a good army ſent out againſt him.

DEMETRIVS imagining, that if Iudas ſhould increaſe in power, it ſhould be ſome preiudice to his eſtate, he ſent Nicanor his moſt intire and faithfull friend, to make war againſt him: (who was one of them alſo, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Hauing therefore furniſhed him, in his owne opinion, with a ſufficient army, and able to make head againſt Iudas, he commanded him to ſpare no one of that nation. As ſoone as Nicanor came to Ieruſalem, hee intended not incontinently to make warre vpon Iudas, but caſt with himſelfe to ſurprize him by ſome ſubtilty: to this intent he ſent him a peaceable meſſage, alleadging that it was neither neceſſary nor conuenient for him to fight or hazzard his fortune; proteſting vnto Iudas, that he would offer him no iniurie; and that he reſorted thither with his friends, onely to expreſſe the good affection of king Demetrius towards him, and how well he was affected towards the nation of the Iewes. Iudas and his brethren beleeued this falſe embaſſage of Nicanors, and ſuſpecting no kinde of ſiniſter dealing, they gaue him credit, and entertained both him and his army. When as therefore Nicanor had ſaluted Iudas, he conferred with him, and in the meane while gaue a ſigne vnto his ſouldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiuing and diſcouering his treaſon betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled vnto his ſouldiers. When Nicanor ſaw that his intent and ſubtilty was diſcouered, he reſolued to make open warre vpon Iudas, and to bid him battell neere vnto a borough called Caphar-ſalama: in which place obtaining the victory, he conſtrained Iudas to retire himſelfe into the fortreſſe in Ieruſalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the ſiege of Iudas in the Temple of Ieruſalem, certaine of the Prieſts and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reuerence, they ſhewed him thoſe ſacrifices, which (as they ſaid) they intended to offer vnto God for the Kings proſperity and health. But he blaſpheming, threatned them; that if the people did not deliuer Iudas into his hands, he would deſtroy the Temple vpon his return, and with theſe menaces he departed out of the city. Which when the Prieſts heard, they began to ſhed aboundant teares, praying God that it might pleaſe him to defend his ſacred Temple, together with thoſe which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

When as therfore Nicanor departing from Ieruſalem, arriued neere vnto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great ſupply of ſoldiers came vnto him out of Syria. Now Iudas was encamped in another borough called Adas, about thirty furlongs diſtant from Bethoron, hauing with him at the moſt not aboue one thouſand men. Notwithſtanding he exhorted exhorted his ſouldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies; neither to thinke with themſelues againſt how many they were to fight; but againſt whom, and for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether couragiouſly ſet vpon the enemy, at ſuch time as he ſhould lead them forth to the onſet. Whereupon aſſailing Nicanor, there aroſe a dangerous conflict betweene them; wherein Iudas had the vpper hand: for hee ſlew a great number of the enemy, and finally, Nicanor himſelfe fighting couragiouſly, was ſlaine; and ſo ſoone as he fell downe dead, his army betooke them to flight. For hauing loſt their Chieftaine, they diſperſed themſelues, and caſt away their weapons: Iudas ſpeedily purſuing them, made a great ſlaughter, and by ſound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that he had diſcomfited the enemy. Whereupon the inhabitants thereabout vnderſtanding heereof, betooke them to their weapons, and meeting with thoſe that fled in the foreward, ſlew them, ſo as no one eſcaped from this battell, notwithſtanding they were to the number of nine thouſand. This victory hapned on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countrimen call it, and the Macedonians Diſtre: And hereof each yeere there is both a ſolemne feaſt and memoriall obſerued. From this time forward the nation of the Iewes were in quiet without any inuaſion, and liued in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combates and dangers. Whereas therefore the high Prieſt Alcimus intended to beate downe an old wall of the Sanctuary, which had beene builded by the holy Prophets, he was ſuddenly ſtrooken by God; ſo that he incontinently loſt his ſpeech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured many grieuous torments for diuers dayes, at laſt he died miſerably, after he had enioyed the Prieſthood for the ſpace of foure yeeres.

Who vnderſtanding of the great power of the Romanes, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spaine, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perſeus and Philip, and beſides all theſe, the great King Antiochus determined to make friendſhip with them, and ſent Eupolemus the ſonne of Iohn, and Iaſon the ſonne of Eleazar his two intire friends vnto Rome, to intreat the Romanes to be their allies and confederates, and to write vnto Demetrius, that he ſhould giue ouer to warre againſt the Iewes. When the Embaſſadors that were ſent from Iudas, were arriued in Rome, the Senate entertained them; and after they had diſcourſed with them vpon the occaſion of their Embaſſage, they accepted and concluded vpon their alliance, and made a Decree, the Copie whereof was then brought into Iudæa, and the originall reſerued in the Capitoll, engrauen in a Table of Braſſe. Which arreſt or Decree of the Romanes, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare vnto the Iewes, contained theſe Articles: That no man vnder the obedience of the Romanes, ſhould maintaine warre againſt the nation of the Iewes: neither ſhould furniſh them with victuals, ſhips, or ſiluer, who ſhould make warre vpon them. And if any enemies ſhould aſſaile the Iewes, the Romanes ſhould giue them ſuccour to the vttermoſt of their power. And that likewiſe if any one ſhould make warre againſt the Romanes, the Iewes ſhould ſuccour them. That if the Iewiſh nation would adde or diminiſh any thing of that aſſociation, it ſhould be done with the common aduice of the people of Rome, and that that which ſhould be ordained, ſhould remaine irreuocable. This arreſt was written by Eupolemus the ſonne of Iohn, and by Iaſon the ſonne of Eleazar, at ſuch time as Iudas was high Prieſt, and his brother Simon Generall ouer the Armie. And vnderſtanding that Iudas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out againſt him with twenty thouſand footmen, and two thouſand horſemen. Now Iudas had not on his ſide in all aboue two thouſand men, who perceiuing the multitude of Bacchides ſouldiers were afraid; ſo that ſome of them forſaking their campe, fled away: by which meanes there remained no more with Iudas, but eight hundred men. But Iudas replyed to this effect: God forbid (said hee) that the Sunne should see mee turne my backe vpon mine enemies. And if by this meanes I meete with my death, and that I must needs spend my last blood in this battell, I will neuer soyle so many notable actions so worthily atchieued, nor staine so much glory obtained with so great vertue by one ignominious flight. And hauing in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those souldiers that were with him, hee commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselues altogether against the enemy.

BVT Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battell, placing the horsemen on both the wings; his light-armed souldiers and archers in the front of the army; and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and hee himselfe led the right wing of the battell. And in this array he approached Iudas campe, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding all his souldiers to giue a great shout, and to charge their enemies. Iudas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruell conflict, which continued vntill the Sun-set. And when as Iudas perceiued that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certaine number of his most resolute followers, and drew towards that quarter, and setting vpon them, he brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to flie, and pursued them as farre as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiuing the flight of those in the right, went after Iudas, and inclosed him on the back-part. Hee being vnable to flie, and seeing himselfe inclosed by his enemies, resolued with his souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore hee had slaine a great number of his enemies, and being infeebled more through wearinesse, then by the wounds receiued of them, hee fell to the ground, and was himselfe at last slaine likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploits. His souldiers seeing him dead, and hauing no Gouernour of respect left amongst them after the losse of so valiant a Captaine, betooke them all to flight. Simon and Ionathan his brothers vpon intreatie recouered his body, and carried it to Modim (a place where his father was buried) there was hee interred by all the people, who wept for him diuers dayes, and honoured him publikely according to the custome of their countrey. Such was Iudas end, who was a valiant man, a great warrier and very respectiue of the commandements of his father Matthias, hauing done and suffered all that he might for the libertie of his countrey. Being therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he hath left behind him a perpetuall renowne of his worthy acts, and an honourable memory of himselfe obtained by the libertie, in which hee reestablished his nation, retyring them from the seruitude of the Macedonians: who dyed also after he had discharged the office of the high Priest, for the space of three yeeres.

Iudas dispersed the enemies army, killeth some, and at last is slaine himselfe.

CHAP. I.

IONATHAN after the deceaſe of his brother IVDAS, ſucceedeth him in the gouernment.

WE haue declared in our former booke, how the nation of the Iewes (after they had beene vnder the ſubiection of the Macedonians) recouered their libertie: wee haue likewiſe diſcouered the great and grieuous conflicts, which Iudas their Captaine performed, and in which he finally died in the behalfe of their libertie: how likewiſe (after the death of Iudas) all the wicked Apoſtate Iewes, who had reuolted from their religion, tooke courage, moleſting and doing many iniuries to the reſt of their countreymen. Finally, how beſides their malice, the famine inuaded the countrey; ſo that diuers being vnable to ſuſtaine theſe two mortall ſcourges of famine & war, were cõſtrained to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Macedonians. In the meane while, Bacchides gathering togethe the falſe Apoſtataes (who were falne from the religion of the Iewes, with an intent to liue after the prophane manner of the Paganes) committed the gouernment of the countrey vnto them: who laying hold on Iudas friends and partakers, betrayed and deliuered them to Bacchides: who firſt of all tormented and beat them at his pleaſure, and afterwards put them to death. This ſo grieuous affliction (then which the Iewes had neuer endured a worſe, ſince their returne from Babylon) was the cauſe that thoſe of Iudas faction, who were yet aliue, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addreſſed themſelues to Ionathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Iudas vertues, and to haue no leſſe care of his countreymen, then the other had; who fought for their libertie vntill his laſt breath, requiring him not to abandon the gouernment of his nation, eſpecially in that ſo miſerable eſtate wherein they were plunged. Ionathan anſwered them, that hee was ready to die for them, and being in all things eſteemed no leſſe valiant and politique then his brother Iudas, he was proclaimed Generall and Chieftaine of the Iewes.

The Iewes compelled by the Apoſtates and by famine, ſubmit themſelues to the Macedonians.

Ionathan by the publike inſtigation of the Iewes vndertaketh the gouernment.

Bacchides hauing notice hereof, feared leſt Ionathan ſhould be no leſſe infeſtuous to the King and Macedonians, then his brother Iudas before him had beene; for which cauſe he ſought the meanes to make him away by Treaſon. But both Ionathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence hereof; and hauing diſcouered his practice, they tooke all their families with them, and fled into the deſart that confined the Citie Ieruſalem: and retiring themſelues neere vnto a water called the lake of Aſphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceiued that they miſtruſted him, and were driuen thither; he went out againſt them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other ſide of Iordan, hee gathered his army together. Ionathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to ſeeke him, ſent his brother Iohn (ſurnamed Gaddis) vnto the Arabians Nabatheans, to commit the truſt of their goods vnto their hand, vntill the end of the warre betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whileſt therefore Iohn marched towards the Nabatheans the ſonnes of Amaræus laid an ambuſcado for him (who were of the Citie of Medaba) and after they had furiouſly ſet vpon him on the way, and laid hold on whatſoeuer he brought with him, they at length ſlew him and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were ſhortly after puniſhed by his brethren, as we will make manifeſt in that which afterward followeth.

Iohn the brother of Iudas is ſlaine by Amars ſonne.

Bacchides aſſaileth Ionathan on the Sabbath day, and loſeth two thouſand of his men.

When Bacchides knew that Ionathan was incamped in the marſhes of Iordan, he made choice of the Sabbath day to ſet vpon him, hoping that he would not defend himſelfe on that day, becauſe of the prohibition of the law. But he contrary to his expectation, incouraged his companions, and declared vnto them how it concerned their liues to be valiant, for that it was impoſſible for them to eſcape, becauſe they were ſhut vp in the midſt betwixt the flood and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the flood on their backes. As ſoone therefore as hee had made his prayer vnto God, that it might pleaſe him to grant him the victory, he ſet vpon the enemie with a ſtout courage, and ſlew a great number of them: and perceiuing Bacchides how with great fierceneſſe hee ſet forward againſt him, he ſtretched out his right hand to ſtrike him; but he preuenting the ſtroke by ſtepping aſide, Ionathan and his companions leapt into the riuer, and ſo ſaued themſelues by ſwimming ouer to the other ſide of Iordan, becauſe the enemies durſt not paſſe the water to purſue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Caſtle of Ieruſalem (after he had loſt about ſome two thouſand of his men.) After this, he fortified diuers Cities (which were beforetime ruinated) namely Iericho, Emaus, Betheron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in euery one of them certaine towers, and great and ſtrong walles, and afterwards he planted garriſons therein, to ſally out vpon the Iewes, and vexe them; but in eſpeciall he fortified the Cittadel of Ieruſalem, in which he kept for hoſtages the children of the principalleſt men of Iudæa.

The Caſtle of Ieruſalem fortified.

Simon reuengeth his brother Iohns blood, on the ſonnes of Amaræus.

About that time there came a certaine man to Ionathan and his brother Simon, bringing them newes that the ſonnes of Amaræus would ſolemnize their nuptials, and were to lead the bride from the Citie of Gabatha, which was daughter to one of the nobleſt amongſt the Arabians: for which cauſe ſhe ſhould be conducted with great magnificence and ſumptuous pompe. Ionathan and his brother, ſuppoſing that a fit opportunity, was offered them to reuenge their brothers death, and to puniſh the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done vnto their brother, they tooke with them the greateſt forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba; where they lay in ambuſh vnder the couert of a mountaine. But when they ſaw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroome, and a great troupe of their friends likewiſe, according to the accuſtomed customed manner of marriages, they brake out of their couert, and put them all to the ſword; and after they had ſeized their Iewels, and all other bootie of that company that followed them, they retired backe againe ioyfully hauing obtained their purpoſe: and thus reuenged they the death of their brother Iohn vpon the ſonnes of Amaræus. For not onely theſe alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wiues and children, were all of them ſlaine, to the number of foure hundreth. And in this manner Simon and Ionathan returned into the marſhes aforeſaid, and aboad there. But Bacchides hauing fortified all the garriſons of Iudæa, returned backe vnto the King. And at that time the eſtate of the Iewes was in peace for the ſpace of well-ny two yeeres.

The yeere of the world, 3808. before Chriſts Nativitie, 156.

But the wicked, and ſuch as were reuolted from the religion of the Iewes, ſeeing that Ionathan and his followers conuerſed in the countrey in great aſſurance, by reaſon of the peace; they ſent certaine Embaſſadors vnto King Demetrius, requiring him to ſend them Bacchides, who might apprehend Ionathan, declaring that it might eaſily bee done, and that in one night breaking in vpon them, he might murther them all before they were aware. When Bacchides by the Kings commandement came into Iury, he wrote vnto all his friends both Iewes & alſo his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Ionathan: but when by no policie nor proweſſe of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Ionathan hauing notice of their ambuſhes, ſtood vpon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was diſpleaſed with the Apoſtataes or fugitiues, obiecting againſt them that they had deceiued both the King and him, and laying hold on fiftie of the principalleſt of them, he put them to death. But Ionathan and his brother, with thoſe of their company, retired themſelues vnto Bethalaga (a certaine village in the deſart) for feare of Bacchides, in which place he builded towers, and walles to keepe his garriſon in more ſecuritie. Bacchides vnderſtanding hereof, tooke the army that hee had with him, and thoſe Iewes that were his confederates, and marched forward againſt Ionathan; where battering thoſe fortifications that were made by him, he beſieged him for many daies. But Ionathan for all his buſie ſiege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but reſiſted him valiantly; and leauing his brother Simon in the Citie to make head againſt Bacchides, he ſecretly ſtole out, and gathered a great number of ſouldiers that fauoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides campe; and after he had there ſlaine a number of them, he gaue his brother Simon notice of his comming: who, aſſoone as he heard the noiſe in the enemies campe, haſtily iſſued forth with his ſouldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians engines, and for his part alſo made a great ſlaughter of them. Bacchides ſeeing that he was circumuented by his enemies, and that both before and behind he was preſſed by them, being aſtoniſhed at this ſo hard, ſudden and vnexpected encounter, was almoſt out of his wits; ſo ſore was he confuſed at the iſſue of his ſiege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cauſe he diſcharged all his choler vpon thoſe Apoſtataes, (ſuppoſing he was abuſed by them, who had ſent vnto the King and had cauſed him to be ſent thither:) and full gladly would he haue returned home, could he but make an end of the ſiege without his diſhonour.

Demetrius by the ſollicitation of the fugitiues ſendeth Bacchides againſt Ionathan with an army.

Bacchides diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates for that they could not ſurprize Ionathan, killeth fiftie of them.

Ionathan and his brother beſieged in Bethalaga.

Ionathan ſtealing out of the Citie, aſſaileth Bacchides by night.

Bacchides reuengeth himſelfe on the fugitiues, and is inforced to retreat.

CHAP. II.

IONATHAN conſtraineth BACCHIDES to make peace with the Iewes, and to depart out of the countrey.

BVT Ionathan knowing his deliberation: ſent an Embaſſadour vnto him to conclude a peace and amitie betwixt them, with this condition; that they ſhould each of them deliuer vp thoſe priſoners that were taken on either ſide. Bacchides ſuppoſing that his requeſt would be to his great honour, and that a fit occaſion was now offered him, whereupon he might raiſe his ſiege without any diſgrace, promiſed Ionathan his friendſhip; ſo that both of them ſwore from that time forward neuer to make warre the one againſt the other; and each of them both receiued, and reſtored their priſoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch vnto his King, and after that retreat hee neuer made warre againe vpon Iudæa. But Ionathan hauing obtained this ſecuritie, went and dwelt in the towne of Machmas: where adminiſtring and gouerning the Common-weale, he executed ſuch ſeuere iuſtice on thoſe that were reuolted from the religion of their countrey, that he cleanſed the nation of all ſuch kinde of men.

ALEXANDER the sonne of ANTIOCHVS EPIPHANES, maketh warre against DEMETRIVS.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Alexander the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes commeth into Syria, and seizeth Ptolomais.

IN the hundreth and sixtie yeere, Alexander the sonne of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and seized the City of Ptolemais, by treason of those souldiers that were therein; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that hee granted no man accesse vnto him: for beeing locked vp in a royall fort defenced with foure towers (which himselfe had builded neere vnto Antioch) he suffered no man to approach his presence, but was careleſse and wholly negligent in his affaires; liuing in pleasure and idleneſse: whereby he grew into great hatred amongst his subiects, as we haue already declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolemais, hee gathered all his forces and marched forth against him.

CHAP. IIII.

DEMETRIVS couenanteth a peace with IONATHAN.

Demetrius warre against Alexander. 1 Machab. 10.

MORE OVER, he sent Embassadors vnto Ionathan, that might confirme an alliance and ratifie a friendship betwixt them: for he determined with himselfe to preuent Alexander, for feare lest he capitulating with him first of all, should obtaine his assistants. And this did he especially for the feare he had of Ionathan, lest remembring those iniuries he had beforetime receiued at his hands, he should oppose himselfe against him. Hee therefore sent vnto him requiring him to assemble his forces, and to make preparation for the warre: commanding likewise, that those Iewes should be deliuered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut vp for hostages in the fortresse of Ierusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himselfe in this sort, Ionathan resorted to Ierusalem, and in the presence of all the people, and of the garrison that was in the fortresse, he read the Kings Letters; and after the reading thereof, the curſed and reuolted Iewes that were in the fortresse were sore afraid, seeing that the King permitted Ionathan to leuy an army, and to receiue the hostages. But he receiuing them into his hands, restored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this meanes remained Ionathan in Ierusalem, where he made diuers reparations and buildings, according as him pleased. For he builded the Citie walles of hewne stone, to make them more forcible against the assaults of warre. Which when they perceiued who were in the garrisons thorowout all Iudæa, they forsooke them all, and retired backe to Antioch, except they that were in the Citie of Bethsura, and those in the fortresse of Ierusalem: for they consisted for the most part of those Iewes that had abandoned their religion, who for that occasion feared to forsake their garrisons.

The Macedonians forsaking their garrisons, resort to Antioch.

CHAP. V.

ALEXANDER draweth IONATHAN to his partie.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8.

BVT Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made vnto Ionathan, and being well assured how valiant he was, and how hee behaued himselfe against the Macedonians; moreouer how hee was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: Hee told his friends and familiars that it was impossible for him to meet with a better allie at that time then Ionathan, who had approoued himselfe a valiant man against his enemies, and for particular causes bare hatred against Demetrius, from whom he had receiued many iniuries, and on whom hee had wrought sundry reuenges: for which cause if they thought it good to draw him vnto their side against Demetrius; the time was very fit to entertaine and confirme a mutuall peace betweene them: which aduice of his being approoued by his fauorites; he sent a Letter vnto Ionathan to this effect: King Alexander to Ionathan his brother, Health: We haue long sithence vnderstood of your valour and fidelitie, which hath caused vs to send our Embassadors vnto you, to intreat with you of alliance and amitie betwixt vs; and from this day forward, we elect and ordaine you hie Priest of the Iewes, & receiue you into the number of our chiefest friends. Moreouer in way of present, I send you a purple robe, and a crowne of gold, exhorting you, that since you are thus honoured by vs, you will in like sort yeeld vs an answerable respect and friendship. Ionathan hauing receiued this Letter, inuested himselfe in the habit of the high Priest, and the day

A of the feast of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth yeere after the death of his brother Iudas. (For during all that time there had not beene any high Priest.) He assembled also a great number of souldiers, and caused a great quantitie of armours and weapons to be forged. The yeere of the world, 3813. before Christs Nativitie. 151.

When Demetrius heard these newes, hee was much troubled, and accused himselfe of sloth and too much negligence in looking to his affaires, for that hee had not preuented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Ionathan, but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. He sent Letters likewise to Ionathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Ionathan, and to all the nation of the Iewes, Health. Since you haue obserued the friendship that you beare vnto vs, and haue not intangled your selues with our enemies, notwithstanding their diuers sollicitations, we praise your fidelitie, and pray you to persеuere in the same estate, assuring you that you shall receiue the like fauours from vs, in all integritie. For I will forgiue you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you haue vsually paid, either to the Kings my predecessors, or to me; and from this time forward, I acquit you from those tributes you are to pay hereafter. And moreouer, I release you of the price of salt, and of the gold which you were wont to giue vnto vs for our Crowne. We likewise acquit you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, and the halfe of the fruit of your trees, which heretofore you haue beene accustomed to pay me, to keepe and hold them peaceably from this time forward. I acquit you also at this present for euer, of all that which the inhabitants of Iudæa, and the three Prouinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the C City of Ierusalem be held sacred, and to haue the right of the freedome, except from all tributes and tenths, both in it selfe, and also all the countrey belonging thereunto. And I commit the fortresse in the same to the hands of Ionathan the high Priest, permitting him to plant such a garrison therein, as in his opinion shall be held both honest and lawfull; and such as will faithfully maintaine it to his vse. I will also that all the Iewes, who are imprisoned in my countrey, be set at libertie. Moreouer, it is my pleasure, that no horses of the Iewes be taken vp to runne poast for vs: I grant also on the Sabbaths, and other festiuall daies; yea, three daies also before euery one of those feasts, liberty and freedome be vsed. And my will is, that the Iewes, who inhabit within my dominions, be likewise freed of all molestations. The like priuiledge grant I them that will beare armes with me, to the number of thirtie thousand: who in what place soeuer they shall be, D shall haue no worser entertainment then mine owne army: and part of them will I place in my garrisons; the rest shall be of my guard; and I will make them Captaines in my Court, and will permit them to liue according to the ordinances of their countrey, which they shall obserue: and I will also that the three gouernments annexed to Iudæa be made subiect vnto the same lawes. My pleasure is in like manner, that the high Priest shall take order, that no Iew adore in any other Temple then in Ierusalem, and of my owne charge I giue euery yeere a hundreth and fiftie thousand sicles of siluer to be imployed in making sacrifices: and that which shall bee ouer and aboue those sacrifices, my pleasure is that it shall be yours. Moreouer, I acquit the Priests and Ministers of the Temple, of the ten thousand drachmes of siluer (which the Kings leuied on the Temple) becausе they appertaine vnto the Priests who serue in the Temple; as I haue bin rightly informed. I grant also to all those who shall repaire vnto the Temple of Ierusalem, for refuge, and within the precincts thereof (whether it be for money due vnto the King, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof, and receiue not any damage in their goods. I permit also, that the Temple be repaired and builded at my charge. My will is also, that the walles of the City be reedified, and that certaine towers be builded about the same, at my costs. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build fortresses and strong holds in, thorow all the countrey of Iudæa, and to place garrisons in them, my will is that all this be done and fortified, at the charges leuied out of mine owne coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made vnto the Iewes.

The battell betweene Alexander and Demetrius, and of Demetrius death.

But King Alexander hauing gathered great forces, as well of strange and hired souldiers, as of those who in Syria had reuolted from Demetrius, let forth his whole army against the enemy; and after the ensignes were displayed and the onset giuen, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders souldiers that fought against it to flie; and his men pursuing them hard at heeles, spoiled their campe. But the right wing in which the King himselfe was, being forced to retire, was discomfited: and as for the rest, they betooke them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly, slew some of his enemies, and in pursuing other some, who could not endure his fierce assault, was in the end, by setting spurres to his horse, mainely carried into a deepe and muddie bogge, whereinto by misaduenture his horse fell, and being vnable to get out, he was slaine in that place. For being discouered by his enemies, they turned backe vpon him; and hauing inclosed him they, they altogether ſhot their arrowes againſt him: who being on foot and fighting valiantly, was G at length ſlaine, after he had receiued diuers wounds, and was no more able to ſuſtaine himſelfe. Thus dyed Demetrius, who departed this life the eleuenth yeere of his raigne, as we haue diſcourſed in another place.

CHAP. VI.

ONIAS winneth the fauour of PTOLOMEY PHILOMETOR, and obtaineth leaue of him to build a Temple in Egypt, which was called the Temple of ONIAS.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 4. Onias the ſon of Onias the high Prieſt ſeeketh to build a Temple in Egypt.

BVT Onias the ſonne of the high Prieſt, called alſo Onias (who flying out of his countrey liued in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as wee haue heeretofore declared) ſeeing all Iudæa deſtroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending in his heart to purchaſe an immortall memory, hee determined to beſeech the King Ptolomey, and the Queene Cleopatra by Letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a Temple in Ægypt, reſembling in all points that which was at Ieruſalem, and that hee might haue libertie to plant Leuites and Prieſts in the ſame, of his owne kinred: And hereunto was he eſpecially mooued, by a certaine prophecy of Eſay, who more then ſixe hundreth yeeres before, had foretold that a Temple ſhould be aſſuredly builded in Ægypt, in honour of the Almightie God, by a Iew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, hee wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect:

The yeer of the world, 3814. before Chriſts Natiuity, 150.

During the time that I was imployed in your warres, and by Gods fauourable aſſiſtance haue » done you many ſeruices, I haue viſited Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, and haue beene in the Citie of » Leontopolis (which is in the territories of Heliopolis.) I haue alſo viſited diuers other places, » wherein the Iewes haue Temples, againſt all right and honeſtie: which is the cauſe that they » agree not among themſelues: as alſo the like hath hapned among the Ægyptians, through the » multitude of temples, and the great diuerſitie of religions. And hauing found out a very con» uenient place neere a Caſtle called Bubaſtis in the Plaine, where there is ſtore of all ſorts of » ſtuffe for building and cattell fit for ſacrifice: I beſeech you that it may be lawfull for me to pu» rifie the temple that is leuelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no ſacred pow» er; and that in the place thereof, it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a Temple in ho» nour of the higheſt God, according to the patterne and the ſame dimenſions of that Temple,
» which is in Ieruſalem, for the preſeruation and proſperitie both of you, your Queene, and chil» dren; and to the intent that thoſe Iewes that dwell in Ægypt may aſſemble and ſerue God there-
» in; for that by how much the more there is vnitie and concord among themſelues, by ſo much

» ſaith thus: There ſhall be (ſaith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many other things alſo » hath he foretold as touching this place.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote vnto King Ptolomey. And by his anſwer which he made hereunto, a man may eaſily coniecture what pietie was both in him, and Cleopatra his ſiſter, and wife. For they haue returned the ſin and tranſgreſſion of the law, which through this meanes fell vpon Onias head, by this anſwer that enſueth: King Ptolomey and Queene Cleopatra to Onias the » high Prieſt, health. We haue peruſed your Letters, by which you require vs to giue you licence

» cleane and full of execrable beaſts, ſhould be agreeable vnto God: but ſince that you informe vs,
» that the Prophet Eſay did long time ſithence prophecy the ſame, we giue you licence, if it may » be done according to the law, and with this condition, that we commit not any ſin againſt God.

A Temple builded in Ægypt by Ptolomies conſent.

Vpon this anſwer, Onias (taking poſſeſſion of the place) builded therein a Temple, and erected an Altar vnto God, according to the module of the Temple of Ieruſalem; but farre leſſe, and leſſe rich. Yet thinke I it no wayes requiſit to declare the dimenſions thereof, neither the veſſels in the ſame, becauſe I deſcribe them particularly in my ſeuenth booke of the warres, and captiuitie of the Iewes: neither wanted there ſome Leuites and Prieſts, who being anſwerable to Onias in deuotion and zeale, frequented the Diuine Seruice in that place, and renued the ceremonies. But let this ſuffice for the preſent as touching the Temple.

Sedition betwixt the Iewes and Samaritanes, as touching their Temple.

But it came to paſſe, that the Iewes of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the ſeruice and worſhip of the Temple vpon the mount Garizim, vnder Alexander the great, fell at oddes, and debated their differents before Ptolomey. For the Iewes ſaid that the Temple in Ieruſalem ſalem builded,according to Moſes lawes and ordinances,was the lawfull Temple;but the Samaritanes maintained,that that which was builded on mount Garizim,was the true Temple. They therefore beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſit in iudgement, with the aſſiſtance of his friends,to heare their allegations in this behalfe,and to condemne the party vnto death,who ſhould be found faulty in his proceſſe. Now the aduocates which pleaded for the Samaritanes, were Sabbæus and Theodoſius: and Andronicus the ſonne of Meſſalam defended the cauſe of thoſe of Ieruſalem, and the other Iewes. And both of them ſwore both by God and the King, that they would bring their prooues according to the law, beſeeching Ptolomey to adiudge him to death,whom he ſhould finde to haue falſified his oath. The King therefore ſate downe with his friends, both to heare the cauſe,and determine vpon their differents. But the Iewes of Alexandria were ſore mooued and diſpleaſed againſt them, that had drawne the preeminence of the Temple in Ieruſalem into queſtion,and were highly diſcontent that a Temple ſo ancient and famous, and ſo eſteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, ſhould in ſuch ſort bee diſgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbæus and Theodoſius ſuffered Andronicus to declaime firſt:who began to approoue the lawfulneſſe,holines,and religion of the Temple in Ieruſalem out of the Law;and by the ſucceſſiue gouernment of the high Prieſts,who from father to ſonne,and from hand to hand, had receiued this honour; therein alleadging that all the Kings of Aſia had honoured the Maieſtie of that place with preſents and rich oblations: wheras neither in record of men, nor courſe of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had beene in any eſtimation. By theſe and ſuch like words, Andronicus perſwaded the King,that the Temple of Ieruſalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moſes, inuiting him to adiudge Sabbæus and Theodoſius to death. This may ſuffice as touching the differents of the Iewes of Alexandria, and ſuch things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

ALEXANDER after DEMETRIVS death honoured IONATHAN greatly.

AFTER that Demetrius was ſlaine in fight (according as wee haue heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter anſwerable to his dignity, to contract affinity with him; firſt,ſince he had obtained his fathers Empire by the fauour of God: and next,for that hee had ouercome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to theſe his demands, and entertaining them with great pleaſure,wrote backe that hee was very glad that he had recouered his fathers kingdome; promiſing him to giue him his daughter in marriage; giuing him to vnderſtand,that he would meete him at Ptolomais,and bring his daughter vnto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After he had written theſe letters, Ptolomey made his ſpeedie repaire to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he deliuered him his daughter,with ſuch a dowry of gold and ſiluer, as well beſeemed his Kingly magnificence. Vnto the ſolemnizing of this marriage, Alexander by letters inuited the High Prieſt Ionathan, commanding him to repaire vnto him to Ptolemais. Where,after he was arriued,and had both preſented his ſeruice with other magnificent preſents to both the Kings; hee was highly honoured by both,inſomuch as Alexander conſtrained him to put off his ordinary garments,and to put on a purple robe,and after that to ſit vpon a royall Throne; commanding his Captaines to march before him thorow the City; and to command by publike edict, that no man ſhould dare to ſpeake any thing againſt him; neither offer him any cauſe of diſcontent in what ſort ſoeuer. All which the Captains performed;ſo that they,who purpoſely and maliciouſly repaired thither to accuſe him, ſeeing the honour that was done vnto him by this publication, fled away haſtily, for feare leſt ſome miſhap ſhould befall them. This King Alexander loued Ionathan ſo intirely, that he affoorded him the chiefeſt place amongſt the number of his deareſt friends.

DEMETRIVS the ſonne of DRMETRIVS ouercommeth ALEXANDER, obtaineth the Kingdome, and contracteth friendſhip with IONATHAN.

The yeere of the world, 3818. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 146.

IN the hundreth, ſixty and fift yeere (of the raigne of the Greekes) Demetrius the ſonne of Demetrius (accompanied with diuers hired ſouldiers, whom Laſthenes Candidot furniſhed him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which newes as ſoone as Alexander heard, he was grieuouſly vexed and troubled: for which cauſe he inſtantly poſted from Phœnicia to Antioch, with intent to aſſure the affaires of his kingdome in that place, before the arriuall of Demetrius. He left behind him for his Gouernour in Cœloſyria Apollonius Danus: who comming vnto Iamnia with a great army, ſent a meſſenger vnto the High Prieſt Ionathan, ſignifying vnto him, that it was not conuenient that he onely ſhould liue in aſſurance at his owne eaſe and in authority, without ſubmitting himſelfe vnto a King; and that it was a great indignity for him in all mens eyes, for that he had not inforced himſelfe to ſtoope vnder the obedience of a King. For which cauſe (ſaid he) deceiue not thy ſelfe, neither hope thou by ſculking in the mountaines, or depending on thy forces, to continue thy greatnes; but if thou truſteſt to thy power, come downe into the field, and encounter with me and my army in the Plaine, to the end that the iſſue of the victory may ſhew which of vs is moſt valiant. Be not thou ſo ignorant that the nobleſt of euery City beare armes vnder one, who haue alwaies ouercome thy predeceſſors. For which cauſe I challenge thee to meete me in that place where we may vſe our ſwords and no ſtones; and where the vanquiſhed ſhall haue no aduantage by his flight. Ionathan whetted by this bitter meſſage, choſe out ten thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and departed from Ieruſalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came vnto Ioppe, and encamped without the City (becauſe the Citizens had ſhut the gates againſt him) for they had a garriſon planted in that place by Apollonius. But as ſoon as he addreſſed himſelfe to batter the Citie, the inhabitants were afraid, for feare leſt he ſhould ſurprize the ſame by force, & for that cauſe they opened him the gates. Apollonius vnderſtanding that Ioppe was taken by Ionathan, he tooke three thouſand horſemen, and eight thouſand footemen with him, & came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his army with a ſober march, foote by foote; and arriuing at Ioppe, he retired backe to draw Ionathan into the field, aſſuring himſelfe vpon his horſemen, and grounding his hope of victory vpon them. But Ionathan iſſuing out boldly, purſued Apollonius as far as Azot: who finding himſelfe in the champaine field, turned back vpon him and charged him. Ionathan was in no ſort abaſhed to ſee the thouſand horſemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambuſh neere vnto a certaine ſtreame, to the end they might charge the Iewes behind, but diſpoſed his army in ſuch ſort, that his ſouldiers on euery ſide turned their faces vpon the enemie; commanding his men to defend themſelues on both ſides, fighting with thoſe that aſſailed them either in the vantguard or the rereward. This battell continued vntill euening, and Ionathan had giuen his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to ſet vpon the enemies battell: as for himſelfe, he drew himſelfe and his ſouldiers into a forme of a battalion reſembling a Tortuſe, to the end that being couered with their bucklers, ioyned the one with the other, they might beare off the horſemens arrowes: to which all of them ſhewed themſelues obedient. The enemies horſemen ſhooting all their arrowes againſt them, did them no harme; for they pierced not as farre as the fleſh, but lighting vpon the bucklers (enclozed and faſtned the one within the other) they were eaſily beaten backe and borne off, and fell downe being ſhot all in vaine. But when as the enemies were wearied with ſhooting from betimes in the morning vntill euening, and that Simon perceiued they could charge no further, he ſet vpon them with his ſouldiers ſo couragiouſly, that he put them all to flight. The horſemen of Apollonius perceiuing that the footmen were diſarraid, grew heartleſſe likewiſe, and wearied alſo, for that they had fought vntill the euening: and hauing loſt the hope that they had in their footemen, they tooke their flight in great diſorder and confuſion: ſo that they brake their rankes of themſelues, and were ſcattered thorow all the plaine. Ionathan alſo purſued them as farre as Azot, and taking the City by aſſault, he ſlew diuers of them, conſtraining the reſt that were in deſpaire to flie into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the City by aſſault, he burned it with the villages round about, and ſpared not the Temple of Dagon, but burned it and all thoſe that were therin. The number as well of thoſe that were ſlain in the battell, as of thoſe that were conſumed by fire in the Temple, was eight thouſand men. Hauing therefore in this ſort diſcomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched towards Aſcalon: and as he was encamped without the City, the Aſcalonites came out vnto him, and both preſented and honoured red him. He willingly entertaining their good affection, departed from thence, and iournied towards Ieruſalem charged with great ſpoiles, which after his victory againſt his enemy, he draue before him, after he had ſpoiled the countrey.

The yeere of the world, 3818. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 146.

As ſoone as Alexander heard that Apollonius the Generall of his armie was diſcomfited, and forced to flie, he made a ſhew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was againſt his will that Ionathan had beene moleſted by warre, who was both his friend and his ally. Whereupon he ſent an Embaſſadour vnto him, to ſignifie vnto him how much hee reioyced at his victory, offering him preſents and honours, with a chaine of gold, ſuch as the Kings were accuſtomed to giue to thoſe of their kinred: he likewiſe gaue him Accaron and the countrey therunto belonging, to him and his heires for euer.

About the ſame time King Ptolomey Philometor ſet out an army by ſea, and another by land, to repaire into Syria, and to ſuccour his ſonne in law Alexander: and in his way all the cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as farre as the Citie of Azot: in which place all of them exclaimed before him, and challenged Iuſtice at his hand, for that the temple of Dagon was burned and deſtroied; accuſing Ionathan for the firing thereof, and the ſlaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing theſe accuſations, anſwered them not a word: But when Ionathan came to meete him at Ioppe, hee courted him with royall preſents, and all the honour that was poſſible, and after he had kept him company as farre as the flood called Eleutherus, he diſmiſſed him, and ſent him backe to Ieruſalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolemais, he hardly eſcaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexanders owne complotting, and Ammonius his friends mediation: Which treacherie being diſcouered, Ptolomey wrote vnto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might be puniſhed for his treaſon and conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, which in their natures required a ſeuere and cruell puniſhment. But ſeeing that Alexander deliuered him not vp into his hands, he coniectured and concluded, that he himſelfe was the author thereof, and conceiued a hainous diſpleaſure againſt him. In like manner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the meanes of the ſaid Ammonius, who had loaden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the end Ammonius was puniſhed for theſe his outragious miſdemeanors, and diſgracefully ſlaine like a woman, whileſt in a womans attire, he ſought to hide himſelfe, as we haue expreſſed it in another place.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7. Ptolomey Philometor repaireth into Syria with an army to aſſiſt his ſon in law Alexander. Ionathan meeteth with Ptolomey, and is honourably entertained by him. Treaſon intended againſt Ptolomey, and diſcouered: for which cauſe he taketh away his daughter from Alexander, and giueth her to Demerius for his wife.

At that time Ptolomey began to accuſe himſelfe for beſtowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refuſing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: ſo that hee brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawne his daughter from him, hee preſently ſent Embaſſadours vnto Demetrius to confirme a league of peace and affinity with him; promiſing him to beſtow his daughter vpon him in marriage, and to eſtabliſh him in his fathers kingdome. Demetrius very ioyfull to heare of this Embaſſage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There only remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to ſurmount, which was, how he might perſwade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, againſt whom they were ſo grieuouſly incenſed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty ouercame he by this meanes that enſueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, becauſe of Ammonius (as we haue expreſſed heretofore) and by that meanes were the more eaſily drawne to driue him out of the City. Hee perceiuing himſelfe to bee thruſt out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came vnto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and ſouldiers therein, proclaimed King, and was conſtrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Aſia, the other as King of Ægypt. He was a man of a gentle and iuſt nature, no waies ambitious; but ſuch a one as prudently did forecaſt what was to enſue: ſtriuing by all meanes poſſible to auoid the hatred and iealouſie of the Romans. For which cauſe (aſſembling the Antiochians together, hee wrought ſo much with them, that at laſt hee perſwaded them to accept of Demetrius, aſſuring them that if he ſhould receiue that benefit at their hands, hee would no more keepe in memorie thoſe things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father: proteſting for his own part, that he would inſtruct him both how to order the courſe of his life honeſtly, & to mannage his publike affaires rightly; & promiſing them that if he attẽpted to work them any incouenient, he himſelfe would be the formoſt to chaſtiſe him; alledging for his own part that he would content himſelfe to be King of Ægypt. And by this meanes the Antiochians were induced to receiue Demetrius.

Ptolomey perſwaded the Antiochians to accept Demetrius for their King, and refuſed the Diadem of Aſia.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great army, and was come into Syria, and had burned and ſpoyled the countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanyed with his ſonne Demetrius (for hee had already married his daughter vnto him) iſſued out with their armies, and obtained a ioynt and mutuall victory, by ouercomming Alexander, who was constrained to flie into Arabia. It came to passe in that conflict, that Ptolomeis horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled and stumbled in such sort, as hee threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceiued, they ran all together vpon him, and gaue him diuers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to haue been slaine, vnlesse his guard had rescued him: notwithstanding hee was so sicke for foure daies space, that hee could neither heare nor speake. But Zabel the Potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head vnto Ptolomey; who beeing somewhat come vnto himselfe after his wounds on the fift day, and hauing some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightfull in his eare, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemie. But some few daies after, he dyed himselfe, being full of ioy in that hee saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamed Balles, raigned for the space of fiue yeeres, as we haue elsewhere declared.

Alexander being ouercome, flieth into Arabia, and is slaine in that place. Ptolomeis death.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor, hauing obtained the kingdome, began through his malice to dismember Ptolomeis army; forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomeis daughter. But the men of warre hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselues from his wickednesse; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the high Priest Ionathan hauing assembled an army of all the countrey of Iudæa, began to besiege the castle of Ierusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Iewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Ionathan had raised to surprize the place, in the strength whereof they reposed too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came vnto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased thereat, & taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make warre vpon Ionathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, hee wrote to Ionathan and commanded him to come vnto him: notwithstanding Ionathan gaue not ouer the siege, but tooke the Elders and the Priests with him, with gold and siluer, robes, and a great quantity of presents to beare vnto Demetrius, and when he had deliuered them into his hands, he appeased his wrath; and after he had receiued many honors at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his Priesthood, in as ample manner, as hee enioyed it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Iewes accused him, yet did not Demetrius giue them any credit. Moreouer, Ionathan requiring, that for the whole countrey of Iewry, and for the three gouernments of Samaria, Ioppe, and Galilee, hee might pay no more then three hundreth talents for tribute, he granted him a ful exemption, and wrote his letters patents in these tearmes: King Demetrius to Ionathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Iewes: Peace and Ioy. We haue sent you the copy of the letter, that we haue written to Lasthenes, our father, to the end you may know the contents thereof, which is this: King Demetrius to Lasthenes his father: Ioy and Peace. Because the people of the Iewes are our confederates, and obserue our ordinances, my intent is to requite their good affection, & to assigne them the three gouernments of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which haue beene taken from Samaria and annexed to Iudæa. Secoudly, we remit all that which our predecessors Kings receiued of them that sacrificed in Ierusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered for the fruites of the earth and the trees; the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was leuied for the Crowne: so that henceforward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands, either for the time present or to come. See you therefore giue order that the Copy of these our present letters be sent and deliuered to Ionathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred Temple. See here what he wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiuing that the countrey was in peace, and that he liued without feare of any warre, hee dismissed his army, and cashiered his souldiers; hiring onely certaine strangers (who were mustered out of Candy and other Iles) whereby it came to passe that his owne souldiers conceiued an enuie and hatred against him, in that hee gaue them no wages; whereas his predecessors maintained them as well in peace as in warre, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards them; and that if need required to employ them, they might shew themselues more ready and couragious to fight for them.

TRYPHON APAMENVS ouercommeth DEMETRIVS, and giueth the kingdome to ANTIOCHVS the ſonne of ALEXANDER, and plighteth friendſhip with with IONATHAN.

A Certaine man called Diodotus, and by ſurname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation, and Generall of Alexanders army) hearing what mutiny there was amongſt Demetrius ſoldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing vp of Antiochus Alexanders ſonne, and wrought as much as in him lay, that he would commit Antiochus to his truſt, to the intent he might make him King, and eſtabliſh him in the ſoueraigne gouernment which appertained to his father. And although vpon this firſt motion of his, he could hardly be drawne to beleeue it; yet not long after, by the continuall inſtance of Tryphon he was perſwaded to condeſcend, and ſuffered himſelfe to be drawne by his perſwaſions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Ionathan the high Prieſt, diſiring that they within the cittadel of Ieruſalem, and thoſe wicked and Apoſtate Iewes, and in generall all thoſe that were in the garriſons thorowout all the countrey, might be diſplaced and diſmiſſed; he ſent Embaſſadors with rich preſents vnto Demetrius, beſeeching him to caſhire thoſe that were in garriſon in the fortreſſes of Iudæa: who not onely promiſed him that demand, but alſo matters of farre greater moment, after that warre which hee had then in hand, were determined. For the preſent troubles at that time, gaue him no leiſure to performe the ſame: he therefore praid him for the right of their friendſhip to ſend him ſome of his forces, giuing him to vnderſtand, that his army was reuolted. Whereupon Ionathan choſe out three thouſand fighting men, and ſent them vnto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both becauſe of the iniuries they had indured vnder him, as alſo for the hatred they had conceiued againſt his father, who had in like manner done them much wrong; ſo that they onely expected and watched their opportunitie to expulſe him. Vnderſtanding therefore that the ſuccours that Ionathan ſent vnto Demetrius were at hand; and foreſeeing that in ſhort time he would gather a great army, if they haſted not themſelues to preuent him betime; they betooke them to their weapons, and beſet the Kings Palace after the manner of a ſiege, and garded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who ſeeing himſelfe roundly beſet by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, tooke thoſe hired ſouldiers (with thoſe whom Ionathan had ſent him) and charged them: but he was forced to retire; and ouercomne by them, who were aſſembled in that place to the number of many thouſands. For which cauſe the Iewes perceiuing that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted vpon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence darted and ſhot againſt them, without any endamagement to themſelues (by reaſon of the diſtance and height of the place where they were) notwithſtanding they gauled the people grieuouſly, in ſo much as they droue them from the houſes neere adioyning, which they incontinently ſet on fire, whereby the flame thereof was ſpred thorow the whole Citie; ſo that the houſes that were cloſe builded the one by the other, & for the moſt part framed of wood, were burnt downe to the ground. The Antiochians perceiuing that they could not remedy the fire, nor extinguiſh the ſame, betook them to flight, and the Iewes chaſing them from houſe to houſe, purſued them after an incredible manner. When the King perceiued that the Citizens of Antioch ranne heere and there to ſaue their wiues and children, and for that occaſion had giuen ouer the battell, he ſet vpon them in a certen narrow ſtreight, whereas diuers of them were ſlaine, and all at laſt enforced to caſt downe their weapons, and to yeeld themſelues to Demetrius mercy, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that ſedition. After this he rewards the Iewes with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authours of his victory. Whereupon hee ſent them backe to Ionathan, with no ſmall acknowledgement and teſtimony of their proweſſe & virtue. But afterwards he diſcouered his euill nature towards him, and falſified his promiſes, menacing him to make warre vpon him, except hee paid him thoſe tributes, which the people of the Iewes ought, and were wont to pay vnto the Kings his anceſtors beforetime. And theſe deſeignes of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindred him: for he was enforced to turne thoſe forces that he had prepared againſt Ionathan, to make warre vpon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus (who at that time was vnder yeeres) he ſet the diademe vpon his head. All the army likewiſe that had abandoned Demetrius, for ſhortning them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open warre againſt their maſter, and vnder Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him and ouercame him, ſeizing both his Elephants, and the

But the G younger Antiochus sent Embassadors and letters to Ionathan, calling him his ally and friend, confirming the Priesthood vnto him, and allotted him the foure gouernments annexed to Iudæa; and besides these, hee gaue him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to weare the same: he gaue him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon Generall of his army, from the marches of Tyre as farre as Ægypt. Ionathan highly reioyced at these fauours of Antiochus, and sent Embassadours both vnto him and Tryphon, protesting that he was their friend and ally, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefits which he had receiued (notwithstanding that in his necessitie he had beene succoured by him) returned him euill for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

Ionathan for the fauours and benefits he receiued at Tryphons and Antiochus hands, offereth and performeth his best indeauours against Demetrius.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leaue to leuy a great army out of Syria and Phœnicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himselfe incontinently into the Cities, who receiued him very magnificently; yet did they not affoord him any men of war. Comming from thence vnto Ascalon, the Citizens in honourable array came out to meete him with presents; whom together with the cities of Cœlosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, & to follow Antiochus; to the end, that ioyning themselues with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefes which they had oftentimes endured by his meanes: & which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to prosecute their reuenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazeans to be of a far contrary dispositi on, then that which he expected; for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius; yet would they not ioyne their forces, or submit their Citie to his gouernment. For which cause Ionathan besieged their Citie, and spoiled their country: for with the one halfe of his armie hee begirt Gaza; and with the other halfe he ouer-ran the countrey, spoyling and burning the same. The Gazeans seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiuing that no succours came vnto them from Demetrius; but that their owne ouerthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off; and that which was worse, most vncertaine: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers vnto Ionathan, protesting that they K would be both his friends and confederates. For, men doe vnwillingly take knowledge of their » profit, before they haue bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and » was most expedient for them to performe before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt
» ued them into fauour, and tooke pledges of them, and sent them to Ierusalem; and from thence marched hee along the countrey as farre as Damasco. And whereas a huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as farre as the Citie Cedasa, neere vnto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to diuert Ionathan from Syria, by succouring and relieuing those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Ionathan went out speedily to meete with them, recommending the estate of Iudæa to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to be gathered thorowout all the countrey, encamped before Bethsura, a strong fort in Iudæa; and besieged it (for Demetrius beeing beforetime seized thereof, kept garrison therein, as before this we haue declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarkes and fitted his engines to assault the Citie, & employed all his study to surprize the same, they that were besieged waxed affraid, lest if he should take the towne by force, they should lose their liues. For which cause, they sent an Herald vnto Simon, requesting him that he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura with the safety of their liues & goods, and go vnto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the Citie, and he planted a garrison therein of their own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the meane while Ionathan, who was in Galilee, caused his army to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where hee was encamped, and marched towards the plaine of Azot, without any suspicion that his enemies had bin planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Ionathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed neere the mountaine, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battell in the Plaine. As soone as Ionathan perceiued their preparation to the battell, he arranged his army as conueniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Iewes vpon their backes, they fearing to be inclozed, and consequently easily slaine, began to flie; so that all of them abandoned Ionathan, except ſome few to the number of fiftie at the vttermoſt, and Matthias the ſonne of Abſalom, and Iudas the ſonne of Chapſæus, the Chieftaines of the army; who boldly entred, and like deſperate men charged the enemy in the vantgard with ſuch fury, that they made them amazed at their valour and force of handy blowes, compelled them to truſt to their heeles. Which when they that fled from Ionathan perceiued, they rallied themſelues and began to purſue them as farre as Cedaſa, where the enemies were encamped.

Ionathan putteth Demetrius ſouldiers to flight.

Now when Ionathan had obtained this famous victory, wherein there dyed about ſome two thouſand of the enemy, hee returned to Ieruſalem, and ſeeing that by Gods prouidence all things fell out according as he himſelfe deſired) he ſent Embaſſadours vnto Rome, purpoſely to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt them, and the people of the Iewes: commanding his Embaſſedours vpon their returne from Rome, to tranſport themſelues to Sparta, and renew their common friendſhip and acquaintance alſo in that place. As ſoone as they were come to Rome, and had preſented themſelues before the Senate, they declared how they were ſent from the high Prieſt Ionathan, who required the renouation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amitie of the Iewes, and gaue them their Letters of recommendation to beare vnto all the Kings of Aſia and Europe, and to the Gouernours of all the Cities, commanding them to grant them free paſſage to returne into their countrey. And in their returne they paſſed by the Lacedemonians, and preſented thoſe Letters which Ionathan had written vnto them, the copy whereof contained matters to this effect: Ionathan the high Prieſt of the Nation of the Iewes, and all the communaltie of the Iewes; To the Ephores, Senate and people of Sparta, Health. If you be in health, and both your particular and publike affaires haue their deſired ſucceſſe, we haue that which we deſire: For our ſelues we are in good diſpoſition. For as much as heretofore we haue receiued a Letter by the hands of Demoteles, written from Arius your King to Onias our high Prieſt, making mention of that acquaintance and alliance, which is betweene you and vs (the copy wherof we haue hereunder inſerted) and haue receiued your Letters with great content, and haue with all kindly acceptance required both Demoteles and Arius (notwithſtanding wee were not ignorant of this conſanguinitie long before, for that we were inſtructed therein by our ſacred Scriptures:) And whereas we haue not firſt of all acknowledged you for our kinſmen, it was to no other end but for feare we ſhould raiſh the honour of ratifying the friendſhip betweene vs, which wee intended alwaies ſhould be yours. Since which time wherein we haue contracted friendſhip with you, we haue on our holy and ſolemne dayes ſacrificed vnto our God, beſeeching him to continue and keep you in proſperitie: and on the other ſide, in as much as we haue beene inuironed with many warres, cauſed by the diſordered deſires of our neighbours, we haue neither thought it meete to be troubleſome vnto you, or to any other whatſoeuer. But now at this time, ſince we haue obtained a happy iſſue of all theſe troubles, we haue ſent Numenius the ſonne of Antimachus, and Antipater the ſonne of Iaſon, men honourable amongſt our councellers, both to the Romanes and to you alſo; to whom we haue giuen our Letters to be preſented vnto you, in our behalfe, to the end they might renew the amitie which is betweene you and vs: you ſhall therefore doe well if you write backe vnto vs, and certifie vs wherein we may ſtead you, in that we haue euer had an earneſt deſire and will to continue our loue towards you, or ought elſe what concerneth your welfare. Theſe Embaſſadours of his were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publike ordinance as touching their aſſociation, and amitie with the Iewes; which they deliuered vnto them.

Ionathan reneweth his friendſhip and confederacie with the Romanes & Lacedemonians.

In this time were there three Sects among the Iewes, who had different and contrary opinions as touching humane affaires: the firſt was that of the Phariſees; the ſecond of the Sadduces; and the third of the Eſſenians. The Phariſees affirme that ſome things and not all things, are directed by deſtiny; and that ſome other things were tyed to mens election, whether they would performe them or not. The Eſſenians ſaid, that deſtiny gouerned all things; and that nothing hapned amongſt men that was not diſpoſed thereby. The Sadduces auow that there is no deſtiny; and that humane affaires, in that deſtiny is not, cannot be gouerned and diſpoſed thereby: their onely opinion is, that all things depend vpon our owne diſpoſition; ſo as in reſpect of our good deeds, wee are the authors thereof; and in reſpect of our euill, they are the fruits of our irregard. But hereof haue I intreated more exactly in my ſecond booke of the warres of the Iewes.

Demetrius Captaines deſirous to aboliſh the diſhonour of that diſcomfiture, and recouer the loſſe that had lately befalne them, gathered together a greater power then the former, and went out againſt Ionathan; who hauing intelligence of their comming, marched ſpeedily to encounter them neere vnto the Plaine of Amath: for he resolued to preuent their intended roade into Iudæa. Encamping therefore some fiftie furlongs off of the enemy, he sent out spies to discouer of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view knowne all that possibly they could, returning tooke certaine prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the intent of the enemies was discouered vnto Ionathan; which was, that they would set vpon them on the sudden. But Ionathan with a prouident care speedily fortified his campe, and prepared all things necessary for defence, and placed a watch or Sentinell without his Hoast, keeping his souldiers vp in armes all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and ready, forasmuch as they must needs fight by night, to the end that they might not be surprized by the subtilties and policies of their enemies. But when the Captaines of Demetrius vnderstood that their intended purpose was discouered vnto Ionathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsell to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practice of subtill meanes to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselues not to be of sufficient strength to bid Ionathan battell in the plaine field; they therefore resolued to flie, and leaue great fires thorow all their campe, to the end their enemies might thinke they were asleepe: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Ionathan drew neere their campe to bid them battell, and saw it abandoned, and coniectured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but he could not ouertake them, because they had already past the flood Eleutherus, & were retired into their strong holds and places of securitie. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making warre on the Nabatheans, he spoyled their countrey, tooke great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco, and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon (his brother) marching thorowout all Iudæa and Palestine as farre as Ascalon, planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition, and finally came to Ioppe, which he tooke by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because hee was aduertised that they of Ioppe intended to surrender the Citie to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Ionathan had in this sort disposed all things, they came to Ierusalem, and assembled the people together in the Temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walles of the Citie, and to strengthen the inclosure of the Temple that was ruinated, aduising them to fortifie the same with strong towers: and besides this, hee caused another wall to be builded in the middest of the Citie, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that meanes they might cut off and stop vp the passages to victuall the fort. Hee aduised them likewise, to build farre stronger fortresses thorowout the countrey, then those that were already finished. Now when as the people had allowed of this his good aduice, Ionathan gaue order as touching all those things that concerned the building within the Citie, and set his brother Simon about the fortresses in the countrey. But Demetrius passing the riuer, came into Mesopotamia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the Citie of Babylon; that being seized thereof, hee might the better prouide for all the occurrences of his kingdome. For the Greekes and Macedonians, who inhabited that countrey, had sollicited him by often Embassadours to come vnto them, promising him to subscribe to his authoritie, and to warre with him against Arsaces King of the Parthians. He puffed vp with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resoluing with himselfe, that after he had ouercome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage warre with Tryphon, and easily driue him out of the kingdome of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the countrey with great affection, he leuied a great army, and assailed Arsaces, but he lost the day, and himselfe was taken prisoner, as we haue else-where declared.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. 2. Mac. 11. 13. Tryphon labouring to transfer Antiochus Kingdome into his own hands, & fearing Ionathans opposition, traiterously complotteth his death.

WHEN Tryphon vnderstood that Demetrius affaires had so vnfortunate an issue, he forsooke Antiochus and his seruice; and complotted with himselfe how he might kill him and make himselfe King. But the feare that he had of Ionathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolued first of all to deliuer himselfe of Ionathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young King away. Hauing therefore concluded with him

himſelfe to kill Ionathan by ſome ſtratagem of treaſon, he came from Antioch to Bethſan (which the Greekes call Scythopolis) whither Ionathan came to meete him with forty thouſand choſen men, ſuppoſing that Tryphon reſorted thither to make warre vpon him. But he knowing that Ionathan came thither with ſo much ſtrength, wrought him by preſents and counterfeit courteſies; commanding his Captaines to obey Ionathan, thinking by that meanes to perſwade him that he intirely and truely loued him, and to extinguiſh his ſuſpicion, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at ſuch time as he had leaſt ſuſpicion of him. He counſelled him to diſmiſſe his army likewiſe, becauſe hauing cut off all occaſion of warre, he had no reaſon to retaine them, for that there was no ſuſpicion of alteration. After this he inuited Ionathan to come to Ptolemais, and to bring with him ſome few of his ſouldiers, ſignifying vnto him that he would deliuer the Citie into his hands, and reſigne all the fortreſſes that were in the countrey to his poſſeſſion; vrging further, that he came into that countrey to no other end, but to performe it. Ionathan ſuſpecting no ſiniſter dealing, and beleeuing that Tryphon ſpake of good and entire affection, diſcharged his forces, and tooke onely three thouſand men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, and with one thouſand repaired to Ptolemais vnto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans ſhutting the gates as ſoone as he was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) tooke Ionathan priſoner, and ſlue all thoſe that attended vpon him. He preſently ſent alſo part of his army vnto the two thouſand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the ſword: but they hauing notice of that which had befallen their Chieftaine, taking vp their armes, ſpeedily departed out of Galilee. And although the ſouldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in number, yet were they not ſo hardy as to trie whether part were the ſtronger; becauſe they knew that the Iewes were ready to expoſe themſelues to all dangers, to defend their liues: and ſo they returned backe to him that ſent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The people maketh SIMON Generall of their army, and declareth him the High Prieſt.

THEY of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding of the ſurprizall of Ionathan, & the loſſe of his ſouldiers, grieuouſly lamented for this accident, that ſo great a man as he was, was taken from them, in that they feared (and that not without cauſe) that being deſtitute after his deceaſe both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them, would ſeeke their trouble and moleſtation: who hauing held themſelues quiet in admiration of him, would at that time lift themſelues vp againſt them; and not onely perſecute them with war, but bring them into extreme danger of their liues. Neither did their expectation deceiue them. For the neighbouring nations, vnderſtanding of Ionathans death, began preſently to make warre vpon the Iewes on all ſides, as againſt thoſe who had no longer any Chieftaine vnder whoſe conduct they might wage warre and ſhew themſelues valiant. And Tryphon likewiſe hauing gathered forces, was determined to aſcend into Iudæa, to warre againſt the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiuing that the Citizens of Ieruſalem were diſmaied with the feare, which they apprehended of thoſe rumours and new tumults of warre, and being deſirous to animate them againſt al incurſions and attempts intended by Tryphon, aſſembled the people in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this manner: You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, haue voluntarily offered our ſelues vnto death for your liberty. Since therefore, I haue abundance of ſuch like examples, and that it is the ordinary courſe of our family to die for our law and religion, there is no feare ſo great as can plucke out this reſolution out of my heart, as it may plant ſuch a deſire of life in me, as to be drawne to forget all honour. Wherefore ſince you haue ſuch a Chieftaine and Commander, as ſetteth light by all danger, whereby he may endure to act any thing for your ſafetie; it behoueth you to follow me couragiouſly to what place ſoeuer I ſhall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, whereby I ſhould ſpare my life; neither am I leſſe then they, whereby I ſhould through negligence and cowardize ſhun and forſake that which they haue eſteemed to be honorable, as is to die for the law and the ſeruice of our God. I will make manifeſt therefore by all the teſtimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawfull brother; for I truſt in God, that he will giue me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliuer not onely all of you, but your wiues and your children from the iniury which they intended againſt you; and by the grace of God I will preſerue the holy Temple, that it may not be ruinated by their prophane hands. For, I already perceiue, that the prophane nations ſet vs at nought, nought, and contemne you as if you had no Chiefetaine: and I know already that they are marching forward to fight with you. By theſe words Simon heartned the people, who were diſtracted with feare, ſo that they reuiued their ſpirits and conceiued better hope. Whereupon all of them cryed with a loude voice, that Simon was their Generall, and that he was to ſucceed his two valiant brethren Iudas and Ionathan in the Gouernment; and that as touching themſelues, they would be obedient in all things that he ſhould command them. He therefore aſſembled in one inſtant all the men at armes in that countrey, and haſted himſelfe to repaire the City walles, defencing them with high and ſtrong towers, and ſent a certaine friend of his called Ionathan the ſon of Abſalon, with an army to Ioppe; commanding him to expulſe the inhabitants of that City from thence, for that he feared leſt they ſhould ſubmit themſelues to Tryphon: As for himſelfe, he remained in Ieruſalem to ſecure the ſame.

Simon ſucceedeth his brothers Iudas and Ionathan.

Simon ſendeth Ionathan Abſalons ſon to Ioppe, to expulſe the inhabitants thereof.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great army, came into Iudæa; leading his priſoner Ionathan with him. Whereupon Simon with his army went out againſt him as farre as Addida (a Citie ſituate vpon a mountaine, at the foote whereof beginneth the Champaine countrey of Iudæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Gouernour of the Iewes, ſent meſſengers vnto him, intending to circumuent him by treaſon and policie; giuing him to vnderſtand that if hee were deſirous of his brothers enlargement, he ſhould ſend him one hundreth talents of ſiluer, and two of Ionathans children for hoſtages, to aſſure him, that being ſet at liberty, he ſhould not withdraw Iudæa from the obedience of the King.) For, till that preſent he was held and kept priſoner, by reaſon of the money which he ought the King.) Simon was no waies ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he ſhould both loſe his money, if he ſhould deliuer the ſame; and that his brother ſhould not be enlarged, no though his children were deliuered for hoſtages: on the other ſide he feared, leſt the people ſhould conceiue ſiniſterly of him, as if he had been the cauſe of his brothers death, both by not deliuering the money, neither yet the children: Hauing therefore aſſembled the army, he declared vnto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole ſcope of his actions were nought elſe but traiterous ſtratagemes and ſubtilties: yet notwithſtanding he told them, that he had rather ſend both the money & the children to Tryphon, then by refuſing his conditions and demands, to be accuſed to haue neglected the life of his brother. Simon ſent therefore both the money and children of Ionathan: but Tryphon hauing receiued both, kept not his promiſe; but detained Ionathan: and leading his army thorow the countrey, intended to paſſe by Idumæa to repaire to Ieruſalem. He came therefore to Dora a city in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping alwaies right ouer againſt him. They that were in the Caſtle of Ieruſalem, hearing newes hereof, ſent Tryphon word that he ſhould haſten and come vnto them, and ſend them munition: whereupon he addreſſed his horſemen, pretending that very night to ride vnto Ieruſalem; but the ſnow about that time fell in ſuch aboundance, that it couered the way in ſuch ſort and was ſo thicke, as the horſes could not trauell; which hindred his repaire to Ieruſalem. For which cauſe he departed from thence, and came into Cœloſyria; and ſpeedily inuading the countrey of Galaad, he put Ionathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon ſent vnto Baſca and tranſported his brothers bones, and interred them in his country Modin in his fathers ſepulcher, and all the people mourned and lamented for him many dayes. Simon alſo builded a great monument of white and poliſhed marble for his father and his brethren, and raiſed it to a great height, and garniſhed it round about with galleries and pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable worke to behold. Beſides that, he erected ſeuen Pyramides for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, ſo great and ſo faire, as they mooued admiration in thoſe that beheld them; and are as yet to be ſeene at this preſent day. So great was Simons care, that Ionathan and the reſt of his family ſhould be honoured with ſo magnificent a ſepulcher: which Ionathan died, after he had exerciſed the place of the high Prieſt, and poſſeſſed the Gouernment for foure yeeres. Thus much as touching his death.

As ſoon as Simon had taken poſſeſſion of the High Prieſthood, by the election of the people; the very firſt yeere of his Gouernment, he acquitted the people of the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This liberty and exemption from tribute hapned amongſt the Iewes, one hundreth and ſeuenty yeeres ſince the time that Seleucus ſurnamed Nicanor obtained the kingdome of Syria. And in ſo great honour was Simon amongſt the people, that in their priuate contracts and publike letters, the date began from the firſt yeere of Simon the benefactor and Gouernour of the Iewiſh nation. For they proſpered greatly vnder his gouernment, and had the victory of all their neighbouring enemies round about them. For he deſtroyed the Cities

A Cities of Gaza, Ioppe, and Iamnia: he razed alſo the cittadel of Ieruſalem, and leuell it with the ground, to the intent the enemies might be neuer ſeized thereof any more, nor retreat themſelues thither to endamage the Citie, as beforetime they had done. Which when he had brought to paſſe, he thought it not amiſſe, but very profitable, to leuell the hill whereon the Caſtle ſtood; to the intent the temple might be the eminenteſt place. All this perſwaded he the people to doe in a common aſſembly, laying before their eies how many euils they had ſuffered, by the meanes of the garriſons, and how much they were like to ſuffer hereafter, if a ſtranger ſhould once more be maſter of the kingdome, & build a cittadel in that place. By theſe exhortations he perſwaded the people to finiſh theſe workes, and all of them began to trauell without intermiſſion both day B and night, ſo that in the ſpace of three yeeres they planted the mountaine, and wrought it downe; and from that time forward there was nothing but the Temple that commanded the Citie. See here what Simon performed hitherto.

CHAP. XII.

SIMON beſiegeth TRYPHON within Dora, and contracteth alliance with ANTIOCHVS, ſurnamed the DEVOVT.

C NOT long after the captiuitie of Demetrius, Tryphon ſlew Alexander the ſonne of Antiochus ſurnamed God, notwithſtanding hee had the care and charge of his education for foure yeeres, during which time he raigned; and ſpreading abroad a certaine noiſe and rumour, that the young King in exerciſing himſelfe fortuned to dye, he ſent his friends and familiars vnto the men of warre, promiſing them that if they would elect and chooſe him King, hee would giue them a huge ſum of money; giuing them to vnderſtand, that Demetrius was a priſoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother ſhould obtaine the kingdome, he would puniſh them diuers waies, and reuenge their reuolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forſaking him. The army hoping, that if they beſtowed the kingdome on Trypon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclamed him King. But after he had attained the fulneſſe of his deſires, he ſhewed how malicious and wicked his nature was. For at ſuch time as hee was a priuate man, he flattered the people and made ſhew of moderation; and by ſuch allurements he D drew them to doe what him liſted: but after he had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, he diſcouered his hypocriſie, & ſhewed plainly that he was not vnaptly called Tryphon, that is to ſay, a triſler or mocker. By which meanes he drew the hearts of the better ſort from him: & as for his army, they grew ſo much in hatred of him, that they ſubmitted themſelues to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time ſhut vp both her ſelfe and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus, ſurnamed the Deuout, and brother to Demetrius, was driuen from place to place, and had not any Citie that would entertaine him for feare of Tryphon; Cleopatra ſent vnto him, inuiting him both to be her husband, and to take the poſſeſſion of the kingdome. And hereunto did ſhee the rather draw him, partly for that ſhee was thereunto perſwaded by her friends, and partly for the feare ſhe had, leſt ſome one of Seleucia ſhould betray the City to Tryphon. As ſoone as *An*E tiochus was arriued in Seleucia, and that from day to day his forces increaſed, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and ouercame him in battell, and droue him out of the higher Syria, and purſued him as farre as Phœnicia: where after hee had retyred himſelfe into Dora, a ſtrong and impregnable Caſtle, he beſieged him therein, and ſent Embaſſadours to Simon, the high Prieſt of the Ieweſ, to confirme a friendſhip and confederacie with him. Simon very courteouſly accepted his demands, and preſently ſent Antiochus both money and victualls, ſufficient to furniſh his army at the ſiege of Dora, ſo that in ſhort ſpace he was accepted amongſt the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place beſieged, taken and ſlaine, after he had raigned three yeeres.

But the young man hauing some inkling of their drift, retyred himselfe speedily into the City, and auoided the danger that they complotted against him; assuring himselfe of the good will of the people, in consideration of the benefits they had receiued at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare vnto Ptolomey; who intending to enter the City gates, was sharply repulsed by the Citizens, for that they had already entertained Hyrcanus.

WHEREVPON Ptolomey retyred vnto a certaine Castle situate beyond Iericho called Dagon: but Hyrcanus was made high Priest in his fathers stead: who after hee had recommended himselfe to God by the firstling sacrifices that hee offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make war vpon him. Now when he was fully addressed to besiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the aduantage in all other things; but only by the affection that he bare vnto his mother and his brethren, he was ouercome. For Ptolomey hauing taken them, and whipt them vpon the walls in all mens presence, threatned Hyrcanus that vnlesse he leuied his siege, he would cast them downe headlong from the top of the Castle: now wheras one way Hyrcanus had a great desire to enforce and surprize the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, through the desire that he had to redeeme those, whom he loued, from the enemies tyranny. True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake he would not giue ouer valiantly to assault the place; but that he should be the more encouraged to surprize the fortresse, and to lay hold vpon his enemy, and be reuenged on the wrong that was offered vnto his deerest friends: alleaging that she thought it better to die in the middest of a thousand torments, then that the enemy should escape vnpunished, who had beene so manifest an occasion of their miserie. When Hyrcanus heard his mother speake thus, hee was more furiously incensed to giue the assault: but as soone as he saw his mother so beaten and so sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and the feruent desire which hee before had to batter and beate downe the City, was presently allayd and cooled; and so the pittifull compassion of his mother, surmounted and ouercame his irefull affection of reuenge. Whilest thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the yeere of repose celebrated among the Iewes was come: For they obserued the seuenth yeere, as the seuenth day is obserued in the weeke; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was deliuered of this siege, who afterwards slue both Hyrcanus mother and brethren: which done he fled vnto Zeno surnamed Cotyla, who at that time tyrannized in the city of the Philadelphians.

ANTIOCHVS the Deuout maketh warre against HYRCANVS, and vpon the receit of three hundreth talents, contracteth alliance with him.

ANTIOCHVS calling to mind the manifold losses he had receiued by Simons meanes, inuaded Iewry in the fourth yeere of his raigne, and in the first of Hyrcanus gouernment, which was in the hundreth sixtie and two Olympiade. And after he had spoyled all the country, he locked vp Hyrcanus within the City of Ierusalem, which he had besieged with seuen campes; yet with no aduantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the walles, as in respect of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his Campe; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of raine, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of Aprill. On the North side also where there is a great Plaine, Antiochus caused one hundred towers to be erected euery one three stages hie, on which he planted certaine companies of armed souldiers; who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the meanes of a double and deepe trench, took from them all their commodities. They on the other side made often sallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the enemy on the sodaine, they made a great slaughter: but if they were discouered, they retyred souldier-like. But Hyrcanus considering the great number of people that were in the City, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any seruice, hee diuided those that were vnfit for warre, and sent them out of the Citie, retaining onely those with him, who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to haue free liberty to depart; so that wandring here and there betweene the walles and the campe, they were consumed with famine, and dyed miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affaires, they that were within had compassion of their countrimen, and drew them within the walles, and entertained them within the City. At this time Hyrcanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seuen daies, by reason of the solemnity of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare vnto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Ierusalem of Bulls with guilded hornes, and vessels full of diuers odors, with other vessels of gold and siluer. Those that had the charge of the gates, receiued the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the Temple. Antiochus himselfe also gaue the souldiers certaine meates to grace their festiuall, shewing himselfe herein to be of a farre better disposition then Antiochus Epiphanes, who after he had taken the Citie, caused swines flesh to be sacrificed vpon the Altar, and besprinkled the Temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the law of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled and conceiued a deadly hatred against him: but Antiochus of whom we spake at this present, was by all men called Deuout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the seruice of God.

Hyrcanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Embassadours vnto him, requiring him that he would permit them to vse the ancient policy of their forefathers. Whereupon the King sequestring all those farre off from his company, who counsailed him to destroy the Iewish nation, who liued apart and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckning of their words. And vnderstanding that al the conuersation of the Iewes was conformable vnto piety, he answered the Embassadours, that if the besieged would yeelde vp their armes and pay the tributes of Ioppe, and the other Cities that were out of Iudæa, and would receiue a garrison, such as hee should appoint; hee would discharge them of this warre. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receiue a garrison, lest they should be enforced to entertaine such with whom they could not conuerse; but in stead of the garison they gaue pledges, and paid fiue hundreth talents of siluer, of which the King receiued three hundreth in hand, with the pledges; amongst which was Hyrcanus brother: and after he had beaten downe the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence; hee raised the siege and departed. But Hyrcanus opening Dauids monument (who surpassed all other Kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same: whereby he tooke occasion first of all among the Iewes to entertaine a forraine army. There was also a friendship and confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the Citie with all his armie, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same: And that which is more, Antiochus hauing enterprized an exploit against the Parthians, Hyrcanus marched also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witnes hereof, writing after this manner,

CHAP. XVII.

Medio & Rufinus, chap. 16. Hircanus surprizeth diuers cities of Syria, and layeth desolate the Temple that was builded on the hill Garizim.

HIRCANVS hearing newes of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to finde them disfurnished both of garrisons and meanes of defence, as in effect it came to passe. He therefore tooke the Citie of Medaba at the end of sixe moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards he seized Samega, and the Cities thereabout: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the module of the Temple of Ierusalem (which Alexander the Great permitted Sanaballath to build in fauour of his sonne in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Iaddus, as we haue heretofore declared) which Temple was laid desolate two hundreth yeeres after it was builded. Hircanus also tooke certaine fortresses and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, vnder this condition, that they should consent to bee circumcised, and to liue according to the lawes and religion of the Iewes. They through the desire they had to liue in the place where they were borne, submitted themselues to be circumcised, and to liue according to the customes and ordinances of the Iewes; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Iewes.

Hircanus maketh a league with the Romans.

Whilest thus Hircanus was high Priest, hee thought good to renew the amitie betwixt the Iewes and the Romans; and to this effect he sent an embassage with letters vnto the Senate. As soone as the Senate had receiued his letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing: Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L.F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C.F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the sonne of Dositheus, Appollonius the sonne of Alexander, Diodorus the sonne of Ison, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Embassadours by the people of the Iewes, haue proposed; who haue dealt with vs as touching the confederation and amity that this nation had with the Romans, and haue likewise conferred as touching the affaires of estate, namely, that Ioppe and the ports thereof, Gazara and the fountaines thereunto belonging, and those other Cities of the countrey, which Antiochus tooke from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, should be restored vnto them: and that it may not be lawfull for the Kings souldiers, to passe thorow their countrey, neither any of those prouinces, that are vnder their gouernment: and that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this warre, contrary to the arrest and decree of the Senate, should be declared void, to the end that the embassadors sent in the Senates behalfe, may prouide for the restitution of those things, which Antiochus hath spoiled them of, and may rate and set downe the damages, which the countrey hath receiued by this warre. Item, that commendatory letters should be written in the behalfe of the Iewish embassadours, to the Kings and free people for their secure and safe returne into their countrey. It hath beene held conuenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation with men of so good respect, sent vnto them by a nation so good and faithful towards them. And as touching the letters, the answer was; that they should be written, at such time as the affaires of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would haue care that no iniurie should be offered them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded also to deliuer the embassadours money out of the common purse, to beare their charges home into their countrey: and thus did Fanius dismisse the Embassadours of the Iewes, after hee had giuen them siluer out of the common treasurie, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should conduct them, and giue them assured conuoy to returne into their countrey. And this was the estate of the affaires during Hircanus Priesthood.

But

A But King Demetrius being ſharpely whetted to make war againſt Hircanus, could haue neither time nor occaſion to exploit the ſame, by reaſon that both the Syrians and his men of war were ſcarcely well affected towards him, becauſe of his wickednes of life. For they ſent Embaſſadors to Ptolomey, ſurnamed Phyſcon, to require him to ſend ſome one of Seleucus race vnto them, to take vpon him the kingdome. Whereupon Ptolomey ſent them Alexander ſurnamed Zebina, accompanied with an army; who waging battell with Demetrius, put him to the worſt, and conſtrained him to flie to his wife Cleopatra to Ptolomais: who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was conſtrained to retire himſelfe from thence vnto Tyre; where he was taken, and after he had ſuffered many miſeries by the hands of his enemies, hee finally dyed. Alexander hauing by this meanes obtained the kingdome, made a league of amitie with Hircanus. And whereas it B ſo fell out, that Antiochus, ſurnamed Gryphus, the ſonne of Demetrius made warre againſt him, he was ouercome and ſlaine in the battell. When as therefore Antiochus had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Syria, hee forbare to make warre againſt the Iewes, for that he had intelligence that his brother by the mothers ſide (who was in like ſort named Antiochus) aſſembled an armie againſt him at Cyzicus. Remaining therefore in his countrey, he reſolued to make preparation againſt his brothers comming, who was called Cyzicenus, becauſe he was brought vp in that citie, and was the ſon of Antiochus called the Conſeruer, who dyed in the countrey of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus: and it ſo fell out, that both theſe brothers were married to one and the ſame Cleopatra, as wee haue heretofore expreſſed. When An- C tiochus the Cyzicenian was arriued in Syria, he made warre againſt his brother, which continued many yeeres: during all which time Hircanus liued in peace (for preſently after Antiochus death, he reuolted from the ſubiection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gaue them no ſuccours, neither as ſubiect, neither as friend; but his fortunes both augmented and flouriſhed greatly during the time of Alexander Zebina; and principally during the raigne of theſe two brothers. For the warre, wherein they conſumed one another, gaue Hircanus an opportunitie, to leuy all the reuenewes of Iudæa, without any contradiction: ſo that by the ſame meanes hee gathered infinite ſummes of money. For whileſt the Cyzicenian deſtroyed his brothers countrey, Hircanus alſo made knowne his inclination and diſpoſition: and ſeeing likewiſe that Antiochus was deſtitute of thoſe ſuccours he expected out of Ægypt, and that both himſelfe and his D brother alſo (through their naturall diſcords) weakened one anothers eſtates, he ſet as light by the one, as by the other.

CHAP. XVIII.

How ANTIOCHVS the Cyzicenian came to the reliefe of the Samaritanes: and how being conquered, he fled away.

FOR which cauſe he drew forth his army againſt Samaria (which was a ſtrong Citie) and is at this day called Sebaſta, becauſe it was reedified by Herod, as wee will make manifeſt in time and place conuenient. Hee therefore began to beſiege and batter the ſame with E all diligence; animated thereunto, becauſe of the extreme hate he bare the Samaritanes, in that onely to pleaſe the Kings of Syria they had offered many grieuous outrages to the Mariſſens, who were extracted from, and allied with the Iewes. Hee therefore made a trench round about the Citie, with a double wall of eightie ſtounds, and committed the generall command of this ſiege to his ſonnes Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſo diligently and valiantly behaued themſelues, that the Samaritanes being ouerpreſſed with extreme famine, were conſtrained to eate ſuch things as were vnuſuall and accuſtomed amongſt men; and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenian to their reſcous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulſed by Ariſtobulus ſouldiers, and being purſued by the two brethren as farre as Scythopolis, he hardly eſcaped; and they returning to their ſiege, freſhly aſſaulted and beſieged the Samaritanes within their owne wals: So F that once more they were conſtrained to ſend Embaſſadors to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie; who ſent vnto Ptolomey Lathyrus for about ſome ſixe thouſand men of warre, who furniſhed him with them contrary to his mothers minde, who therefore had almoſt thruſt him out of his dominion. As ſoone as hee had receiued them, he made a roade into Hircanus countrey, and ſpoiled and forraged the ſame as farre as Ægypt. For he durſt not bid him battell hand to hand, becauſe he had not competent forces; but thought that in ſpoiling the countrey he might cauſe them to leuy the ſiege, & forſake Samaria: but after he had loſt a great number of his men by diuers ambuſcadoes of his enemies, he went vnto Tripoli, committing the generall charge of that warre to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captaines. The Callimander more rashly then wisely attempting to set vpon the enemy, was himselfe slaine, and his souldiers discomfited. And Epicrates giuen ouer to couetousnes, did openly yeeld vp Scythopolis and other Cities into the hands of the Iewes: so that is was impossible for either of them to leuy the siege. Finally, after that Hircanus had continued his siege before the City for the space of one whole yeere, hee became master of the same: and not contenting himselfe with the surprizall hereof, he vtterly destroied it, enforcing the riuers thorow the midst thereof; yea he ruined the same in such sort, that the mud and soile both of the water and earth tooke away all the apparance of the Citie; so that it seemed as if it had neuer beene. Of this Hircanus there is a certaine incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his high priesthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the very same day wherein his sons fought against Antiochus the Cyzicenian, whilest being himselfe alone, he offered incense in the temple, that he heard a voice, saying, that his two sons had at that present ouercome Antiochus: all which he incontinently signified vnto the people at the gate of the temple; and according as he had said, so it came to passe. See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

Epicrates corrupted with money, selleth Scythopolis and other places to the Iewes.

Hircanus taketh Samaria.

Hircanns is foretold by a voice in the temple, of his sons victory.

About this very instant likewise, the affaires of the Iewes prospered not onely in Ierusalem & Iudæa, but also amongst the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus. For Queene Cleopatra rebelling against her sonne Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias the sonnes of that Onias, who had builded the temple in Heliopolis (according to the patterne of that in Ierusalem) her chieftaines. And hauing committed her army vnto their hands, shee acted nothing without their aduice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witnesseth, speaking after this manner: Diuers of those who came with vs, and of those who had beene sent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, sodainly reuolted to Ptolomey: Onely the Iewes that were of Onias faction, remained constant in their duty, because the Queene made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their countrimen. Thus farre Strabo. This great felicity and prosperity of Hircanus mooued the Iewes to conceiue a hatred against him, and especially the Pharises opposed themselues against him. These Pharises were one of the sects of the Iewes (whereof we haue heretofore intreated) which sect was so great in credit with the common people, that when they deposed any thing, were it against the King or the Priest, they were presently beleeued. Hircanus had beene one of their disciples, and was in like sort very much beleeued of them. Hee therefore inuited them to a feast, and entertained them with all humanitie: and seeing that they were set vpon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his minde, how that he desired nothing more then to be iust, and to square all his actions according to Gods will & direction, according as they themselues taught. He therefore required them, that if they perceiued that he mistooke himselfe in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redresse the same. Whereupon all of them gaue testimony of his perfect vertue. Wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and such a one as delighted in mutiny, said vnto him: Since you desire to heare the truth, if so be you affect the estimation of a good man, giue ouer the place of priesthood, & content your selfe with the gouernment of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cause wherefore he should forsake the Priesthood? Because (saith he) that we haue heard say by our ancestors, that your mother was a captiue during the raign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithstanding was a false report.) Hircanus hearing this, was sore mooued against him, and also all other of the Pharises, who were assistant in that place. Amongst the rest there was a certaine man called Ionathan, of the order of the Sadduces (who maintaine an opposite opinion against the Pharises) who was an inward & deare friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the iniurious speeches that Eleazar had spoken by him, who told him that (as he thought) Eleazar had spoken these words by the publike consent of the Pharises; and that he might discouer the same most manifestly, if he enquired of them what punishment Eleazar had deserued for speaking after this sort. Hircanus therefore questioned with the Pharises as concerning his punishment, telling them that hee should very well perceiue, that this iniury had not beene pronounced by the common consent of them all, if they condemned the offender to suffer a punishment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, that he ought to be punished by imprisonment and scourging, for (said they) an iniurie done in word, required no capitall punishment: and to speake vprightly, they in their thinking censured seuerely enough of this fault, for that the Pharises are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any question of punishment. But Hircanus was sore offended with this their answer, and imagined that this Eleazar had spoken after this manner by the common common instigation of the rest. This displeasure and conceiued dislike of his, did Ionathan aggraUate to the vttermost, and handled the matter in such sort, that he drew Hircanus to forsake the Pharises, and to subscribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, abolishing their ordinances, and causing them to be sharpely punished that obserue the same. These practices of Hircanus incensed the people against him and his sons. But hereof we will speake in another place. At this present I will declare how the Pharises haue made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the lawes of Moses: for which cause the Sect of the Sadduces reiecteth them, affirming that they ought to keepe the written ordinances, and not to obserue those that are grounded vpon the tradition of the fathers: And great dispute and dissensions haue beene raised among them vpon this occasion, because the richer sort onely, and not the baser sort of people, cleaued to the Sadduces: but the Pharises had the communaltie on their sides. But of these two sorts, and of the Essens, I haue more exactly intreated in my second booke of the warres of the Iewes. But Hircanus finally appeased this mutiny, and liued afterwards in much peace and happinesse, and after hee had most discreetly gouerned his Princedome for the space of one and thirty yeeres, he died; leauing fiue sonnes behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts; the gift of gouernment; the gift of Priesthood; and the gift of prophecy. For God spake vnto him diuers times by Oracles, and Reuelations, and gaue him the knowledge of things to come; which he in such sort foretold, that he declared that his two eldest sonnes should not possesse the principalitie any long time: whose end it shall not be amisse to set downe in what manner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may be the better knowne.

CHAP. XIX.

ARISTOBVLVS obtaineth the gouernment, and first of all placeth the Kingly Diadem on his head.

AFTER the death of their father, Aristobulus the eldest of his sonnes determined to exchange the principality into an absolute estate of a kingdome: and the better to attaine thereunto, hee first of all set the Diadem vpon his head, foure hundreth eightie and one yeeres and three moneths, since the people of the Iewes were deliuered from the seruitude of Babylon, and led againe into their countrey. And for that Aristobulus amongst all his other brethren, loued Antigonus best of all, who was the neerest vnto him in age; he accepted him as a companion in the gouernment of the kingdome: but as touching the rest, he shut them vp in prison. He locked vp his mother likewise, who had contended with him as concerning the gouernment (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her disposition) and so farre extended his cruelty, that he famished her to death in prison. After he had thus handled his mother, he slew his brother Antigonus also; whom he pretended to loue aboue all the rest, and whom (as hee made shew) hee had made partner of his kingdome. From whom he estranged himselfe, by reason of some slanders and false accusations raised vp against him; which at the first he gaue no credit to, both for that the friendship which he bare vnto him, made him slightly respect the same, as also for that he imagined that he was enuiously slandered. It came to passe that Antigonus, returning vpon a certaine time from the army with great magnificence, about the time of the feast of Tabernacles, chanced to repaire thither at that very time, wherein Aristobulus hapned to fall sicke. Antigonus intending to celebrate the solemnitie, ascended the Temple in great brauery, attended by some of his army, to make his speciall prayers for his brothers health. Whereupon certaine malicious wretches, desirous to breake the concord that was betweene them, made vse of this occasion, and of Antigonus magnificent pompe and good fortune; and came vnto the King, amplifying vnto him in malicious words, what pompe and maiestie hee had shewed in that solemnitie, telling him that in these his actions, hee demeaned himselfe in no sort like a priuate man; but that all his actions were leuelled at a royaltie: finally, that his intent was to enter the kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that he made his account that since he might bee King alone, it was a great simplicitie for him to haue a companion. But Aristobulus, although hee would very hardly be induced to beleeue these reports; yet notwithstanding being desirous both to extinguish the suspicion, and to prouide for his owne securitie, hee disposed certaine of his guard in a darke and priuie place vnder ground, and lodged himselfe in a certaine tower called Antonia, commanding that no man should offer violence, except to those who entred armed: Giuing a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, hee should be slaine.

Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repaire vnto him without weapons. Which when the Queene and they that complotted the murther of Antigonus vnderstood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that hee made warlike preparation and furniture for warre) that in that estate and pompe, and in those royall and warlike accoustrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witnesse of his braue furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foote toward Aristobulus, to shew himselfe in that brauery: and when hee came right ouer against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very darke, the Kings guard slew him.

By this accident a man may easily coniecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of enuy and slander, and that there is not any thing that may sooner breake off the good will and amitie amongst brethren, then these two passions. And aboue all, there is an occasion offered vs of great wonder, in respect of one that was called Iudas, of the Sect of the Esseans; who in all those things that he prophecied, varied in no sort from the truth. He seeing Antigonus come vp into the Temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the methode of prophecy) that he was weary of his life, because Antigonus securitie argued the vanitie of his prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he should be slaine at Stratons tower; whereas the place where hee should bee murthered, was sixe hundreth stounds off, and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to haue made a false prediction. Whilest he declared his doubts after this manner, and was wholly ouercome with choller, newes was brought that Antigonus was slaine in a certaine place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name with that other that standeth neere the Sea, which was afterward called Cæsarea; which ambiguitie troubled the Diuiner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himselfe, in that he had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grieuous sickenesse, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruell murther: so that with grieuous agony and torment hee vomited blood, as if all his entrals had beene torne in sunder. This blood so vomited by him, it fortuned (in mine opinion) by the diuine prouidence of God, that a certaine seruant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foot hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had bin soiled with the blood of slaughtered Antigonus. By which meanes they that beheld the same, raised a great crie, exclaiming that the Page had shed the blood in a conuenient place. Aristobulus hearing this out-cry, demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man addressed himselfe to satisfie him, he was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and neuer a man for feare of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon he altogether dismayed and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth abundant teares, and loaden with grieuous sighes, began to cry out in this manner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sudden punishment of my brothers murther pursueth mee: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detaine my soule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and brother? Why dost thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my blood, powred out so many times to those, whom I haue so traiterously slaine? While he pronounced these words, he dyed, after he had raigned one yeere. He was called Philelles, that is to say, a louer of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his countrey many waies, and subdued the Itureans, and ioyned the greater part of the countrey, to Iudæa; and had constrained them likewise, who should remaine in that countrey, to be circumcised, and to liue according to the lawes of the Iewes, he dyed thus miserably. Hee was by nature courteous and very shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this manner, by the authoritie of Timagenes; This was a courteous man, and profitable to his countrimen the Iewes in many things: for he inlarged their countrey, and conquered a part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he tyed vnto him by the bond of circumcision.

The exploits of ALEXANDER King of the Iewes.

The yeere of the world, 3863. before Christs Natiuitie. 101.

WHEN Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greekes called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we haue heretofore declared, he had shut vp prisoners) and made Iannæus (who was called Alexander) King; who both in age and modestie surpassed all the other brethren; but such mis-hap had he, that from his birth-day vpward, his father had conceiued so great a hate against him, that he neuer admitted him to his presence so long as he liued. The cause wherof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loued Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sonnes, with most intire affection, God appeared vnto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeede him? Wherupon God presented vnto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceiued that he should be heire of all his goods; and so much preuailed displeasure with him, that as soone as he was borne, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished and brought vp in that place. But God hath apparantly prooued that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the Kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe King: and as for the other, who resolued himselfe to liue in idlenes and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

Heidio & Ruffinus, cha. 19. Salome surnamed Alexandra Aristobulus his wife maketh Iannæus Alexander King.

Alexander executeth the one brother that affected the crowne, and honoreth the other.

C After that hee had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, hee led foorth his army against Ptolemais: and hauing obtained the vpper hand in the battell, he couped vp the men within their City, and afterward besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the Cities of the sea-coast, these two onely, namely Ptolemais and Gaza remained as yet vnconquered, and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seized of the tower of Straton and Dora where he gouerned. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizicenus were thus at debate and warre the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were trauailed with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army hee had vnder him, and gaue them some succours, by reason that (since these two Kings were whetted with intestine troubles and warres) he cast how to aduance himselfe to the crowne and soueraigntie. For these two Kings seemed to neglect their owne dangers, resembling herein those wrastlers, who though being wearied with fight; yet are ashamed to submit vnto their aduersary, but giue themselues a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had, were in the Kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Ile of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himselfe after he had been driuen out of his Kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadors as vnto their allie, requiring him to come and deliuer them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadors perswaded him, that if he would passe into Syria, he should haue both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreouer, they assured him that the Sidonians and diuers others would second him: and by this meanes so encouraged him with promises, that he hasted himselfe to set saile.

Zoilus tyrant of Straton and Dora.

But in the meane space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authority with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazzard thēselues in some vncertaine danger, wherewith the Iewes threatned them, then to deliuer themselues into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest seruitude. And moreouer, not onely to sustaine a present warre; but that which is more, an imminent warre from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should leuy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her selfe also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more returne againe to Cyprus; whereas they were to expect no lesse but extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, vnderstood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemais; and perceiuing that vpon his encamping, they of the City admitted not his Embassadors, neither in any sort gaue eare vnto them, he was wondrously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come vnto him, requiring him to yeeld them assistance, for that their country was destroied destroied by the Iewes, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais, for feare of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his owne countrey, he began to vse this stratageme. For couertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly hee made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to giue him foure hundreth talents of siluer, prouided that he would deliuer him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him vnto the Iewes. Ptolomey hauing made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he vnderstood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went and besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertaine him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces, he departed with the rest, to enter vpon and spoile the countrey of Iudæa. Alexander perceiuing Ptolomies intent, assembled about fiftie thousand fighting men of his owne countrey, (or as some historians haue written, eightie thousand) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who sodainly setting vpon Azoch a citie of Galile on a Sabbath day, tooke it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantity of other bootie.

CHAP. XXI.

How PTOLOMEY LATHYRVS fought against ALEXANDER, and obtained the victory.

HE afterwards set vpon Sephor a city neere vnto Azoch, from whence he departed with the losse of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him neere vnto Iordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right ouer against the enemy. He had in his vantgard eight thousand men, whom he called Combattants by the hundreths, who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomies foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceyuing themselues to bee inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazzard battell. But Philostephanus the campe-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to passe the floud, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the riuer on their backes, hee should bee the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselues from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought, with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiuing that Alexanders army had the better, he tooke a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselues. The wing of the Iewes vantguard that saw themselues freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so farre were those that marched next them, from yeelding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomies side behaued themselues farre otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarraied them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their armes with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slaine in the battell (Timagenes saith, fiftie thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and othersome fled vnto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, hee ouerranne and spoyled the whole countrey, and in the euening he quartered himselfe in certaine villages of Iudæa, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into pieces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod, to eate the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, and retired to their owne habitations, should know that their enemies would eate mens flesh; that by this meanes they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselues after this manner, as I haue declared. And Ptolomey tooke Ptolemais also by force, as I haue made knowne else-where.

But Cleopatra perceiuing how her sonne prospered, and how hee had spoiled Iewry without any preiudice, and subiected the city of Gaza to his command: shee concluded with her selfe, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that manner, considering it was vpon the borders of Egypt, whose soueraignty he affected. For which cause, she sodainly marched out against him, with an army both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Iewes; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Ile of Coos, with her nephewes, and her testament, to be reserued and kept there in safety. And after she had commanded manded her ſonne Alexander to ſet ſaile toward Phœnicia, with a great nauy, becauſe the inhabitants of that countrey were reuolted from her obeiſance: ſhe her ſelfe departed and came to Ptolemais, and beſieged it, when ſhee perceiued that they refuſed to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haſte to depart out of Syria, and to enter Ægypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he ſhould find the countrey diſfurniſhed of men of warre. But this purpoſe failed him. At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatras armie, died in Cœloſyria, being in purſuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra hauing tydings of her ſonnes enterprize, and that the ſucceſſe and fortune he expected in Ægypt had failed him, ſhee ſent part of her armie to driue him out of the countrey; ſo that he was enforced to returne backe againe out of Ægypt, and to go and ſpend his winter at Gaza. Meane while Cleopatra beſieged and tooke the Citie of Ptolemais, whither Alexander reſorted vnto her, with great preſents, and an anſwerable reſpect vnto his fortune, who had beene ſo vntowardly handled by Ptolomey, hauing now no other recourſe left him but to her fauour and aſſiſtance. Vpon his arriuall, certaine of her familiars counſelled her to lay hands on him, and to ſeize the countrey: and not to permit that ſo great a number of Iewes, and they ſo valiant men, ſhould become ſubiects vnto one man. But Ananias gaue her counſell to the contrarie, alleadging that ſhe ſhould commit an act of great iniuſtice, if ſhe ſhould depoſe him, who was her allie, from the gouernment; who was beſide that, very neerely allied vnto her. For (ſaid he) I would you ſhould know, that by committing this wrong, you ſhal raiſe in all the reſt of the Iewes a hainous hatred againſt you. Cleopatra conforming her ſelfe according to Ananias counſell, reſolued with her ſelfe to offer Alexander no iniurie; but in ſtead thereof, ſhe entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a Citie of Cœloſyria. Now whē Alexander perceiued, that he was diſcharged of the feare which he had conceiued in reſpect of Ptolomey, he incōtinently drew his army into Cœloſyria, and after ſixe moneths ſiege, tooke Gadara: he tooke ſhortly after Amath alſo (which is a great fortreſſe belonging to the inhabitants about Iordan) where Theodore the ſonne of Zenon had hoorded vp the richeſt and goodlieſt part of his ſubſtance: who ſurpriſing the Iewes at vnawares, ſlew about ten thouſand of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

This did not any waies aſtoniſh Alexander: but notwithſtanding the diſaſter, he marched forward toward the Cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, ſituate on the ſea-coaſts, and tooke them perforce; and ſeeing that Ptolomey was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Ægypt, he beſieged the Citie of Gaza, and ſpoiled all the countrey round about it, by reaſon of the diſpleaſure which he had conceiued againſt the Citizens, for that they had ſought their aſſiſtance at Ptolomeis hands againſt him. Againſt him Apollodotus Captaine of the Gazeans made a ſally by night, and entred the campe of the Iewes, hauing onely with him two thouſand ſtrange ſouldiers, and one thouſand of his owne followers. And as long as the night laſted, the Gazeans had the vpper hand, becauſe that they made their enemies beleeue that Ptolomey was come to their reſcue, and to aſſault the Iewes afreſh: but as ſoone as the day appeared, and this opiniō was found falſe, as ſoone as the Iewes were aſſured of the truth, they turned backe vpon them, and charging the Gazeans, they ſlew about ſome one thouſand fighting men of them.

But it came to paſſe that Apollodotus was ſlaine before his arriual, and the citie taken. For Lyſimachus his brother conceiued a iealouſie againſt him, by reaſon of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him, and hauing ſlaine him, & gathered thoſe fighting men that he might, he yeelded vp the Citie vnto Alexander, who at the firſt made a peaceable entrie, but afterwards diſperſed his ſouldiers, & gaue them licence to execute all hoſtilitie againſt the Citizens: ſo that they acted their crueltie in euery place, and ſlew many of the Gazeans: Neither died theſe citizens vnreuenged, but ſo manfully behaued they themſelues, that they butchered no leſſe number of Iewes, then they murthered citizens among them. Some of them likewiſe perceiuing themſelues to be alone, ſet fire vpon their houſes, taking away firſt that which was therein; to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their ſpoiles. Otherſome killed their wiues and children with their owne hands, meaning this way to deliuer them from the enemies ſeruitude. But the Senators, to the number of 5. hundreth, were fled into the Temple of Apollo (for at ſuch time as the enemy entred the towne, they were by chāce aſſembled in councell) all theſe did Alexander put to the ſword, and inſtantly razed and leuelled that Citie with the ground: which done,

But the people were ſo incenſed, that they ſet fire on his palace; whereby it came to paſſe, that both he and his friends were burned to duſt. During the time that Antiochus the ſon of Cyzicenus raigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre againſt him; but he was not onely ouercome, but both he and his army were put to the ſword. For repairing to Laodicea to ſuccour the Queene of the Galadenians, who made warre againſt the Parthians, he died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip poſſeſſed Syria, as hereafter ſhall be declared. As for Alexander, a domeſticall ſedition was raiſed againſt him; for the people aroſe and mutined at ſuch time, as he aſſiſted at the Altar to ſolemnize the feaſt of Tabernacles, and during the time that he intended the ſacrifice, they caſt Citrons at him: for (as wee haue declared elſe-where) the Iewes haue this cuſtome, that on the feaſt of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palme, and of Citrons. They vpbraided him alſo with many iniurious ſpeeches, reproching him, that hee had bin priſoner in warre; and that he was alſo vnworthy of the honour of the Prieſthood. Whereupon, he being mooued by theſe diſgraces, ſlaughtered about ſixe thouſand men: and hauing made an incloſure of wood about the temple and the altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Prieſts) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained alſo certaine ſtrange ſouldiers Piſidians and Cilicians. DEMETRIVS EVCÆRVS ouercommeth ALEXANDER in battell.

HE comming onward with his army, and taking with him thoſe who had incited him to the enterprize, came and encamped neere vnto the Citie of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together ſome twentie thouſand Iewes (whom hee knew to be well-affected towards him) with ſixe thouſand and two hundreth mercenary ſouldiers and ſtrangers, marched forward againſt Demetrius, who led with him three thouſand horſemen, and fortie thouſand footmen. Both on the one and the other ſide there fell out many ſubtill ſtratagems: the one of them ſtriuing on the one ſide to inueigle and withdraw the forraine ſouldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himſelfe to reconcile thoſe Iewes that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other preuailed ought at all by theſe deuices: ſo that finally they were driuen to decide their quarrell by the ſword: in which encountry Demetrius had the vpper hand. For al the ſtrangers that were on Alexãders ſide, were euery one hew'd in pieces, after they had made ſufficient proofe both of their faith & valor. There died alſo many of Demetrius

But after that Alexander had fled vnto the mountaines, diuers Iewes (to the number of ſixe thouſand) in commiſeration of his deſperate eſtate, and through the feare they had of Demetrius, reſorted vnto him; which when the Conquerer heard, he retired himſelfe. After this, the Iewes made war againſt Alexander, & in diuers loſſes which they receiued, there dyed a great number of them in diuers combates: Finally, after he had clozed vp the moſt ſtrongeſt amongſt them in the City of Bethom, he beſieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them vnder his ſubiection, he carried them to Ieruſalem, where he perpetrated an vnſpeakeable & cruell murther. For whil'ſt he banquetted with his concubines, in the ſight of them all, he commanded eight hundreth of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eies whil'ſt they yet liued, he cauſed their wiues and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to reuenge B himſelfe of thoſe wrongs which he had receiued: but he exceeded the bounds of humanity herein, notwithſtanding they had rebelled againſt him, and reduced him into a moſt pitious eſtate, & put him in danger both of his life and kingdome. For being not content to aſſaile and make war vpon him with their forces, they drew ſtrangers alſo in his countrey againſt him: and finally, they ouerpreſſed him in ſuch ſort, that hee was conſtrayned to yeld vp into the King of Arabias hands, the countries and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites; for feare leſt they ſhould ioyne with the Iewes, and make warre againſt him; beſides other inmumerable iniuries and outrages committed by them againſt him. This notwithſtanding it cannot bee excuſed, but that he ouerſhot himſelfe herein; ſo that by reaſon of this enormous cruelty, hee C was called Thracidas, that is to ſay, as cruell as a Thracian: and this title continued amongſt the Iewes. The ſouldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thouſand, fled by night into ſtrong and ſure holds; and as long as Alexander liued, they were in exile. But at the laſt, after he was deliuered of all theſe troubles, hee liued in quiet, and gouerned his kingdome peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Iudæa to Berœa, beſieged his brother Philip with ten thouſand footmen, and one thouſand horſe. But Straton Lord of Berœa, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces gouernor of the Parthians, vnto his helpe; who repairing vnto him with great forces, beſieged Demetrius in his owne trenches, in which they ſo incloſed him by continuall ſhooting of darts, and want of water, that they conſtrained him, and thoſe that were with him, to ſubmit themſelues to their mercy. When D as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were ſeized of Demetrius, they ſent him priſoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp, were ſuffered to depart with the ſafety of their liues and baggage, and to returne to Antioch. But Mithridates King of Parthia honoured Demetrius, by all meanes poſſible, vntill ſuch time as he was ſurprized with a ſickneſs, whereof he died. Incontinently after the battell, Philip came into Antioch, and hauing obtained the Kingdome, ruled ouer Syria.

The exploits of ANTIOCHVS DIONYSIVS againſt Iudæa.

AFTER this, Antiochus called Dionyſius (who was Philips brother) came into Damaſco to obtaine the ſoueraignty therein, and therein in ſhort ſpace accompliſhing his affaires, got poſſeſſion of the crowne. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readineſſe to inuade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damaſco with great ſpeede, and made him ſurrender vp the Citie, both by the meanes of Mileſius whom Antiochus had left gouernour in the Caſtle; as alſo by the conſent of the Citizens themſelues. But Philip ſhewed himſelfe vngrateful toward Mileſius, performing nothing of that which he had promiſed him, at ſuch time as he deliuered him the Citie; becauſe his intent was, that the world ſhould thinke that the feare of his power, & not Mileſius fauour, was the cauſe of the ſurprizall of Damaſco. Which act of his drew him into ſuſpicion with Mileſius, & was the cauſe that he loſt the City againe. For departing from thence to exerciſe himſelfe at tilt, Mileſius lockt the gates againſt him, and kept the City for Antiochus. Who hauing intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very inſtant led his army into Iudæa, in which there were eight thouſand footmen, and eight hundreth horſemen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deepe trench from Caparſabe (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the ſea of Ioppe (which was the only ſtreight whereby he might be aſſailed) & made a wall furniſhed with woodden towers, with their courts of guard, diſtant the one from the other an hundreth and fiftie furlongs, to keepe

After him Aretas raigned in Cœloſyria, who was called vnto that Kingdome by thoſe that held Damaſco and hated Ptolomey the ſonne of Mennæus. Aretas led his armie into Iewry, and got a victorie againſt Alexander neere to Adida: which done, he retired out of Iudæa, vpon a compoſition made betweene them. Moreouer, once more Alexander marched towards the Ci- H ty of Dion, and tooke the ſame. And afterwards he led his army againſt Eſſa, where Zeno had hoorded vp his chiefeſt riches: and before he aſſailed the fortreſſe, he inuironed the place with three huge walles, which he builded round about it; and hauing taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, and Seleucia: which when he had ouercome, he made himſelfe maſter of a valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortreſſe of Gamala. And obiecting many crimes againſt Demetrius the Lord of thoſe places, he diſpoſſeſſed him of his Gouernment. Finally, after he had made warre for the ſpace of three whole yeers, he returned into his countrey; where the Iewes entertained him willingly by reaſon of the happy exploits which he had atchieued.

Alexanders death.

CHAP. XXIIII.

After ALEXANDERS death, his wife ALEXANDRA gouerneth the kingdome.

AFTER that Alexandra had taken the Caſtle of Ragaba, ſhee conferred with the Phariſes, according to her husbands counſell, and committed vnto their diſcretion, not onely that which concerned her husbands obſequies, but alſo the gouernment of the kingdome: whereby ſhee not onely appeaſed the diſpleaſure which before-time they had conceiued againſt Alexander, but alſo obtained their good will and amitie. They therefore came and declaimed amongſt the people, making an Oration of the acts and geſts of Alexander, complaining euery where that they had loſt a good King, and by the inforced praiſes that they vſed, they incited the people to great griefe and lamentation: ſo that they buried him with more magnificence, then any King that raigned before him. This Alexander left two ſonnes behind him, the one called Hircanus, the other Ariſtobulus, and by his teſtament committed the gouernment of the kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affaires, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Ariſtobulus, who was the younger, was both actiue and fit for gouernment. The people were well affected towards Alexandra, becauſe ſhee had manifeſtly expreſſed how greatly ſhee miſ-liked her husbands miſ-gouernment.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 22.

Hircanus and Ariſtobulus Alexanders ſonnes.

Shee appointed Hircanus high Prieſt (both in regard of his age, as alſo for that by nature hee was compoſed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the diſpoſition of the Phariſes, commanding the people to obey and ſerue them. Shee alſo renued and confirmed that which Hircanus had diſanulled, and the Phariſes (according to the cuſtomes of their forefathers) had introduced; ſo that ſhee bare the name, and the Phariſes the authoritie royall. For they reſtored ſuch as were baniſhed, to their eſtates, and deliuered priſoners; and in all things they demeaned themſelues like great Lords, Alexandra alſo for her part vndertooke the care of the Commonweale, and kept a great number of ſouldiers in pay, and increaſed her power in ſuch ſort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and deliuered the hoſtages and pledges of peace. All the countrey was at quiet, onely the Phariſes troubled the Queene, perſwading her to put thoſe to death, who had counſelled King Alexander to put thoſe eight hundreth to death (of whom wee haue ſpoken before) and they themſelues afterwards ſlew one that was called Diogenes, and after him diuers others, one by one: vntill ſuch time as thoſe in authority came vnto the royall palace, accompanied with Ariſtobulus (who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, and who if the occaſion were offered, made ſhew that he would not permit his mother to gouerne after that manner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had beene, to expreſſe their dutie and loyaltie which they ought to their deceaſed maſter; and how for that cauſe they had beene greatly honoured by him; requiring her that ſhee would not vtterly fruſtrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their ſeruice, that now they that had eſcaped from the danger of their forraine enemies, were in their houſes murthered like beaſts by their priuate maligners, without any reliefe or ſuccours from any one. They furthermore vrged, that if their aduerſaries would content themſelues with thoſe they had ſlain, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reaſon of the ſincere affection they bare vnto their Lords: but if they muſt needly as yet ſuffer the like, they required that they might haue licence to depart. For that they would not procure their ſafetie, otherwiſe then by her conſent: and would rather ſuffer a voluntary death neere vnto her royall palace, if they might not be ſpared: for that it would be a ſhame both for themſelues, and for the Queene, if by her toleration, thoſe, who had bin her deceaſed husbands friends, ſhould be thus vexed by them which were his aduerſaries.

Hircanus high Prieſt.

The Phariſes admitted to the adminiſtration of the Commonweale, are greedy of reuenge.

Ariſtobulus and his followers accuſe the Phariſes of tyrannie.

That Aretas King of Arabia and other Princes, would be glad of this newes, to heare that ſhe ſhould eſtrange thoſe perſons farre from her, whoſe names haue beene dreadfull euen amongſt thoſe neighbouring Kings who haue but heard the ſame. And if ſhe had reſolued to make more account of the Phariſes fauour, then of their ſeruice, they beſought her that ſhe would at leaſtwiſe diſtribute them in ſeueral Caſtles, for that rather then any miſ-hap ſhould purſue their ſoueraigne Alexanders houſe, they were content to lead their liues in that contemptible and abiect condition. Whileſt thus they ſpake, and exclaimed on the ſoule of Alexander, praying him to haue compaſſion as well of thoſe that were already dead, as of thoſe who were in danger of their liues, liues, the teares ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus (aboue the rest was heartily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselues were the cause of their owne calamity, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a headstrong and ambitious woman to raigne ouer them, as if the King had no heires reserued to succeed him in the Kingdome. The Queene vncertaine how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castels into their hands, reseruing onely Hircania, Alexandrion, and Machæron, wherein the Princes mooueables and wealth was kept.

Alexandra committeth the custodie of the Castles to the Iewes. Aristobulus is sent to Damasco against Ptolomey. Tigranes inuading Syria, heareth newes of Lucullus pursuite of Mithridates, and returneth home.

Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennæus, who was an il neighbour vnto that Citie: but he returned thence without atchieuing any memorable action. About the same time newes was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia inuaded Syria, with fiue hundreth thousand men of war, intending shortly to set vpon Iewry. This rumour affrighted the Queene, and all the communalty (and not without cause.) Whereupon she sent Embassadours with many princely presents vnto Tigranes, who besieged the City of Ptolemais. (For Queene Selena, otherwise called Cleopatra, raigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadours met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to conceiue a good opinion of their Queene, and of all the whole nation of the Iewes: who receiued them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so far to doe him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and forraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this newes, returned backe into his countrey.

Alexandras sickneſſe, aud Aristobulus attempt.

After this, Queene Alexandra fell sicke of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus tooke occasion to intermeddle with the affaires of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie seruant, he repaired vnto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers Gouernment, and now was the more affraid that if she should happen to dye, all her posterity should be made subiect to the power of the Pharises. For he well perceiued how vnapt his elder brother was to gouerne the Kingdome, vnto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: only his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefest Potentates commanded, who entertained him with great ioy.

Aristobulus seizeth the castles, and great concourse of people resort to him.

The next day, the Queene hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to worke some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after ther second, all the rest had consequently bin surprized by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queene and the whole nation were dismaied, fearing lest he should presently vsurpe the soueraigntie; but aboue all they feared, lest he should reuenge himselfe on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle, that adioyned the Temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some 15. daies he tooke twenty and two forts, whither he made his retreats, and assembled an army of souldiers, and leuied them amongst the Lords that inhabit Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwaies resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintaine and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchie.

Hircanus and the Elders informe the Queene, and accuse Aristobulus. Alexandras death.

Hereupon the ancient Iewes and Hircanus repaired vnto the Queene, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsell and good aduice touching the present affaires, because that Aristobulus her sonne was already wellnigh Lord of the whole countrey, since he had so many forts vnder his command: Furthermore, that it was inconuenient and vndecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding shee were grieuously sicke, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The Queene willed them to doe that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weale; telling them that they had many meanes, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong; and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasurie: certifying them, that because she knew that she had not long to liue, she had no more reason to take care of those affaires. Anon after she had spoken thus, she died; after shee had raigned nine yeeres, and liued in all seuenty and three yeeres. This woman was adorned with

A with greater excellency then could be expected from one of her ſexe, and expreſſed both in her actions and ordinances how fit ſhe was to gouerne a kingdome, and how oftentimes men thorow imprudence ouerſhoote themſelues in affaires of eſtate. For making more account of the preſent then future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in reſpect of thoſe which are requiſite in a moderated gouernment, ſhee neuer vpon any inſtigation whatſoeuer peruerted iuſtice; notwithſtanding her family fell into ſuch inconueniences, that the ſame ſoueraignty, which ſhee had obtained by diuers dangers and trauels, was not long after that ruined and loſt for her ſcarce effeminate deſires. For ſhee gaue eare vnto thoſe, who were ill affected towards her poſterity, and left the kingdome deſtitute of ſuch as were fit to gouerne: ſo that the gouernment which ſhe enioyed during her life time, was after her death diſtracted with infinite troubles, and calamities, wherewith her family was repleniſhed. And notwithſtanding her regiment after this manner, yet during her life time ſhee kept the kingdome in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

WE haue already intreated in our former Booke, both of the actes, and death of Queene Alexandra: it now remaineth at this preſent to proſecute and continue the ſequell of our Hiſtorie, to the end that we neither omit any thing thorough ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulneſſe. For they that make profeſſion to write Hiſtories, and to recite ſuch things as are obſerued by Antiquitie, ought not only ſtudiouſly to conforme their ſtyle, but alſo to beautifie the ſame, with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the Reader may conuerſe in their writings with the more delectation. But aboue all things they muſt haue an eſpeciall care ſo exactly to ſet downe the truth, that they, who know not how theſe things came to paſſe, may be the more duly and fitly informed.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken vpon him the High Prieſthood, in the third yeere of the hundreth ſeuenty and ſeuenth Olympiade, and in the yeere that Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenſian) were Conſuls at Rome, Ariſtobulus ſuddenly vndertooke the warre againſt Hircanus, and fought with him neere vnto Iericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers ſubmitted themſelues of their owne accord to Ariſtobulus. Through which accident Hircanus was inforced to flye to the fortreſſe of the higher City, where Alexandra Ariſtobulus mother had impriſoned both his wife and children (as before this is ſpecified.) The reſt of the faction for feare of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themſelues within the enclozure of the Temple, where they were beſieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their different was accorded in this manner, that Hircanus ſhould paſſe the remnant of his life without intermedling with affaires of eſtate, but ſhould onely intend his ſecurity and peace; and Ariſtobulus ſhould command the Kingdome. This league was ratified betweene them in the Temple, and confirmed with oathes, coniunction of hands and embraces, in the ſight of all the people: which being finiſhed, Ariſtobuluus retired himſelfe into the Palace; and Hircanus to Ariſtobulus lodging, to lead a priuate and quiet life.

CHAP. II.

Of the race of ANTIPATER, and how he is aduanced to high eſtate, and how HIRCANVS flieth to ARETAS King of Arabia.

BVT a certaine friend of Hircanus (by nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being well monied, and by nature both factious and induſtrious, and through ambition but badly affected towards Ariſtobulus, the rather for that he affected Hircanus faction, but to ſtir much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damaſcene writeth of this man, that he was deſcended from the nobleſt amongſt thoſe Iewes who returned from out of Babylon into Iurie: but this he did of ſet purpoſe to gratifie Herod, Antipaters ſonne, who by a caſualty became afterwards King of the Iewes (as we will expreſſe hereafter in time and place conuenient.) This Antipater was at the first called Antipas, according to his fathers name; who (as it is reported) was made Antipater of Iudæa, as Nicholas Damaſcenus implies, firſt called Antipas.

A made Gouernour of all Idumæa by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Aſcalonites, corrupting them, and inſinuating himſelfe into their fauours by diuers great preſents beſtowed vpon them. This young Antipater conſidering with himſelfe what Ariſtobulus power was, and fearing leſt ſome miſchiefe might befall him through the hatred the young King had conceiued againſt him, he communicated with certaine of the greateſt reckoning amongſt the Iewes, and ſecretly and cunningly incenſed them againſt Ariſtobulus, telling them that they had done amiſſe, both to ſee and ſuffer Ariſtobulus to detaine the kingdome vniuſtly in his hands, and to diſpoſſeſſe his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. Hee likewiſe accoſted and ſounded Hircanus ordinarily with
B theſe words; telling him that he liued in danger of his life, and would doubtleſſe be ouertaken, except hee ſought his owne ſecurity, and fled his imminent perill: alleadging, that Ariſtobulus friends would neuer ceaſe to conſult how they might ſhorten his life, to the end that he might liue in more ſecuritie. To theſe inſtigations of his, Hircanus gaue ſmall credit (for that of his owne nature he was courteous, and could not eaſily be induced or ſeduced by detractions) but this negligence and careleſneſſe in him, was the cauſe that hee was accounted a ſilly and abiect man. On the contrary ſide, Ariſtobulus was of a different and more heroicke nature, being more actiue in performance, and carefull preuention.

Now although Antipater ſaw that Hircanus made ſmall account of his inſtigations; yet ceaſed he not daily to inuent and propoſe new ſurmizes and accuſations, vrging Ariſtobulus hatred and
C practice to murther him: and ſo much preuailed he by his importunitie, that at laſt he perſwaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promiſing him that in ſo doing, hee would giue him both aide and aſſiſtance. Hircanus hauing debated vpon theſe concluſions, at laſt thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined vpon Iewry.) Whereupon he firſt of all ſent Antipater to Aretas, to take aſſurance of him that hee ſhould not betray him into his enemies hands, if ſo be he ſhould ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and require his aſſiſtance. When as therefore Antipater had receiued this aſſurance from the King, he returned to Ieruſalem vnto Hircanus: and not long after that tooke him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great iourneies arriued at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall Court. And for that hee was inwardly familiar with the King, he beſought him to reeſtabliſh him in the kingdome of Iewry,
D and wrought ſo much, as by his importunitie and the preſents which hee gaue him, that hee perſwaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promiſed, that if hee confirmed him againe in his royall dignitie, hee would vpon the recouery of his Realme, reſtore vnto him thoſe twelue Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are theſe that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Liuias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Nariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, Oryba.

ARISTOBVLVS being vanquiſhed, is purſued as farre as Ieruſalem.

ARETAS induced by theſe promiſes, was content to ſend foorth an army againſt Ariſtobulus, and himſelfe in perſon conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thouſand men both on foote and horſe, and had the vpper hand of his enemy in ſuch ſort, as diuers after the attainment of this victory, of their owne accord ſubmitted themſelues to Hircanus: and Ariſtobulus perceiuing himſelfe to bee deſtitute of all his friends and followers, fled vnto Ieruſalem. After him the King of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and beſieged him in the Temple: In this ſiege the common people aſſiſted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Prieſts only that ſtucke to Ariſtobulus ſide. Whereupon Aretas marſhalled the forces he had, and buſily ſet the army both of Iewes and Arabians about the ſiege. Whileſt theſe things were vnder theſe termes, the feaſt of vnleauened bread, which we call the Paſſeouer, was at hand, and the Princes of the Iewes forſaking their countrey were fled into Ægypt. About that time, a certaine man called Onias (ſuch a one who for his vertue was beloued of God, and in times paſt had by his deuout prayers and ſupplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God) hid himſelfe, perceiuing that this ſedition would be of ſome continuance. This man therefore being ſurprized and brought into the campe of the Iewes, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water; ſo at that time likewiſe he would by his imprecations incenſe God againſt Ariſtobulus, and his complices. But whereas he contradicted and excuſed himſelfe, he was at laſt constrained by the people to performe their requeſt; ſo that ſtanding vp in the midſt of them, he ſpake after this manner: O God, King of the whole world, ſince they who are at this preſent here with me are thy people, and thoſe that are beſieged are thy Prieſts, I humbly beſeech thee, that when they ſhall require thee to be incenſed againſt their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewiſe they ſhall prouoke thee againſt the other, thou wilt not reſpect them. Hereupon, a certaine ſort of reprobate ſouldiers amongſt the Iewes, hearing theſe words of his, ſtoned him to death: But God incontinently puniſhed this cruelty in them; and the murther of Onias ſo curſedly perpetrated, was reuenged by this meanes which enſueth. At ſuch time as Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts were beſieged, the feaſt of Eaſter or the Paſſeouer fell out, during which time it was an vſuall cuſtome amongſt the Iewes to honour God with many ſacrifices: Now for that they who were with Ariſtobulus, had not any beaſts to offer vp in ſacrifice, they required the other Iewes which were without, that they might haue ſome deliuered vnto them for their mony. Whereunto it was anſwered, that if they would giue one thouſand drachmes for euery head, they ſhould haue ſome deliuered vnto them. To this demand of theirs, Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts that were with him, willingly condeſcended, and let downe the prefixed price and deliuered the ſame from the wall: but the others, after they had receiued the money, deliuered them not thoſe beaſts which they required them to ſell them for ſacrifice, but ſo farre were they giuen ouer to impiety, that they falſified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God alſo, in denying that which they had promiſed toward the furniſhing of their ſacrifice. For which cauſe, the Prieſts (being defrauded in this manner contrary to the oath and proteſtations of their aduerſaries) beſought God to ſhew vengeance on their countrey-men, that had committed this hainous and periurious impietie: neither did God deferre their puniſhment any long time, but incontinently after he ſent a great and violent winde, that ſpoiled all the fruits of the countrey; ſo that a meaſure of Wheat was ſold for eleuen drachmes.

CHAP. IIII.

HIRCANVS and ARISTOBVLVS ſend Embaſſadours to SCAVRVS, to couenant their peace with him.

MEANE-while Pompey ſent Scaurus into Syria (himſelfe being in perſon detained in Armenia in purſuit of the warre betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came vnto Damaſco, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the Citie; for which cauſe he marched onward towards Iewry: Where being arriued, certaine Embaſſadours came vnto him in the behalfe of Ariſtobulus, and others alſo in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacie in the behalfe of them both, and offering in eithers reſpect a tribute of foure hundreth talents. But Scaurus preferred Ariſtobulus promiſes, both for that he was a man of mightier ſubſtance and greater minde, and withall more moderate in his demand; wheras Hircanus was poore and couetous, and notwithſtanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promiſe of leſſe aſſurance: For it was a harder matter to ſubdue a Citie that was ſo defenced and ſtrong, then to repulſe a troupe of runnagate Nabatheans, and they ſcarcely well animated to proſecute that warre. For theſe cauſes therefore hee (receiuing his money) lenied the ſiege, commanding Aretas to returne; which if hee refuſed, hee declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damaſco, and Ariſtobulus led forth his army againſt Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and ſlew about ſome ſeuen thouſand of his enemies, amongſt the number of which was Cephalus Antipaters brother.

CHAP. V.

How ARISTOBVLVS and HIRCANVS debate their titles in the preſence of POMPEY.

NOT long time after this, Pompey came vnto Damaſco: and as he trauelled thorow Cœloſyria, diuers Embaſſadors reſorted vnto him from all parts of Syria, Ægypt & Iudæa. For Ariſtobulus ſent him a preſent of great valew, namely, a golden vine of fiue hundreth talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in theſe words: There came an Embaſſadour out of Ægypt, bearing a Crowne of foure thouſand pieces of gold; and another from Iewry, with a vine or garden, and the workmanſhip was called Terpole, that is to ſay,

A say, recreation: And this vine haue we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Iupiter Capitoline, hauing the inscription of Alexander King of the Iewes; and it was esteemed and valued at fiue hundreth talents. It is said that Aristobulus Prince of the Iewes sent the same. Straight after this, there came other fresh Embassadours vnto him (Antipater from Hircanus: and Nicodemus, from Aristobulus) who accused those that had taken mony, namely, Gabinius, for that he first of all had receiued three hundred talents beside other presents: and secondly Scaurus: who had receiued foure hundreth; alleadging that by that meanes they had incensed them against him. He therfore gaue direction, that they should repaire vnto him about the spring, each of them to iustifie and maintaine their seuerall rights: as for himselfe he drew his forces from their win-
B tring places, and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certaine fortresse which Antiochus the Cyzicenian had fortified in Apamæa. Hee visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus (who was a peruerse and wicked man, and no waies differed from Dionysius Tripolitane) who was punished with the losse of his head, and was vnited also with him in friendship and affinitie; yet acquited of the death hee deserued, by the meanes of a thousand talents ransome, which Ptolomey distributed amongst his souldiers for their pay. He razed likewise the Castle of Lysias (wherein a Iew called Sylæ tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chal-
C zis, and hauing likewise ascended the mountaine (which is betweene them) he came to Cœlosyria; and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gaue audience to the Iewes, and their Princes Hircanus and Aristobulus, who were at oddes the one against the other, as touching their particular interests, as all the whole nation against them both: alleadging that they would not be gouerned by Kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren (who were descended of the race of Priests) sought to draw their nation vnder a different forme of gouernment, to the intent to reduce them vnder seruitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder borne, he had bin depriued of his inheritance by Aristobulus, and had only but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incursions, that both by land and D sea Aristobulus followers had endamaged their frontiers with. For the people had not reuolted, if he had not beene a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principallest of the Iewes (drawne on by Antipaters perswasion) subscribed, who auerred and iustified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the kingdome, by reason of his incapacitie and naturall defects; alleadging for himselfe, that the gouernment was enforced on him by a necessitie, for feare it should be transported to others: in effect, he protested that he challenged no other Title, then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his witnesses certaine arrogant young men, who were hated for their pompe, purple robes, their curiositie in painting and curling their haire, and bard horse, and other braueries which they presented, not like men that intended to expect iudgement, but as if their pretence had beene to make shew of their pompe. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemned Aristobulus violence, but for that time he dismissed them (after some fauourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their countrey, and determine their differents, after hee
E had seene the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the meane-while to liue in peace. He vsed Aristobulus likewise very kindly, fearing lest he should incense the people, and shut vp his passage: which notwithstanding came to passe. For Aristobulus came into the Citie of Delion, and from thence went into Iudæa, without respect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

POMPEY hearing this, was sore displeased herewith; and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobulus: when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behind him, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Iudæa) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Castle situate vpon the top of a mountaine called Alexandrion, whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Embassadours to inuite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsell of many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre againſt the Romanes, came downe vnto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to returne againe into his Caſtle. And this did he two or three times, alwaies flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the kingdome, and making a ſhew that he would be obedient vnto him in whatſoeuer he would command. Meane-while he retired himſelfe, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for feare leſt Pompey ſhould transferre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he ſhould deliuer vp the fortreſſes that he held, and had written with his owne hand to the Captaines of the garriſons (who otherwiſe would not haue obeyed him) Ariſtobulus ſubmitted, and in diſcontent repaired to Ieruſalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certaine meſſengers comming from Pontus, certified him of Mithridates death, who was ſlaine by his ſonne Pharnaces.

They of Ieruſalem ſhut the gates againſt the Romanes.

WHEN Pompey was encamped neere vnto Iericho (in which place there was a number of Date trees, and where alſo groweth that balme which is the moſt precious of all other oyntments, diſtilling from a little ſhrub, which is opened and ſlit by a ſharpe cutting ſtone) the next morning he marched towards Ieruſalem. At that time Ariſtobulus (being ſorry for his misbehauiour) came vnto him, offering him money: and promiſing him to receiue him into Ieruſalem, he beſought him, that (diſmiſſing publike enmities and quarrels) he would peaceably doe what him liſted hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condeſcended to his requeſt, and ſent Gabinius with his ſouldiers, both to receiue the money, as alſo to enter the Citie; but his purpoſe failed him in both: for Gabinius returned, becauſe he was excluded out of the Citie; neither receiued he any money, for that Ariſtobulus ſouldiers would not permit that any promiſe ſhould be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth; ſo that after hee had committed Ariſtobulus to priſon, he went in perſon againſt the Citie, which was ſtrongly fortified on euery ſide, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was eaſie to be beaten downe: for this ſide is inuironed with a large and deepe valley, compaſſing the Temple, which is incloſed with a maruellous ſtrong wall of ſtone.

CHAP. VIII.

POMPEY taketh the Temple, and lower part of the Citie perforce.

BVT within the City, there grew a diuiſion and faction, by reaſon of the difference and diſſident opinions of thoſe that kept the ſame; for ſome thought good to yeeld vp the Citie into Pompeis hands; other ſome (that were of Ariſtobulus faction) counſelled that the gates ſhould be kept ſhut, and preparation for warre ſhould be made, for that the Romanes detained Ariſtobulus priſoner. Theſe latter preuailing more then the reſt, ſeized the Temple: and breaking downe the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, addreſſed themſelues to ſtand on their defence. But the others not onely deliuered the City into Pompeis hands, but the royall palace alſo: who ſent Piſo his Lieutenant thither with his forces to take poſſeſſion thereof, and to plant his garriſons therein, and to fortifie the houſes neere adioyning the Temple, & whatſoeuer conuenient habitation without the walles. Firſt therefore Piſo offered the beſieged certaine conditions of peace: which for that they refuſed, he fortified and ſhut them in on euery ſide, being in all theſe his endeauours aſſiſted by Hircanus. On the outſide of the Citie, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the temple (which was the eaſieſt & meeteſt ſide to be aſſaulted) on this ſide alſo there were certaine high towers, & a huge trench, beſides a deepe valley that begirt the temple. For towards the Citie all waies and paſſages were ſo broken vp, that no man could either goe vp or downe, and the bridge was taken away on that ſide where Pompey was incampt. Each day did the Romanes trauell earneſtly to raiſe a mount, and cutting downe all the timber round about them, & hauing fitly applyed the ſame, the trench being fild vp (although very hardly, by reaſon of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addreſſed, with which they inforced & darted ſtones againſt the temple: and had not the ordinance of the countrey commanded to keepe the Sabbath (which was the ſeuenth day of the weeke) holy, & to labour in no ſort on that day, the Romanes had neuer bin able to haue raiſed their bulwarke, if they within the temple had oppoſed themſelues againſt them. For the law permit-

Pompey maketh preparation to beſiege the Temple.

A permitteth to defend themſelues againſt their enemies, at ſuch time as they are aſſailed and vrged to fight, but not aſſaile them when they intend any other worke. Which when the Romans vnderſtood, they neither gaue aſſault, not proffered skirmiſh on thoſe daies, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, and planted their engines; ſo that the next day they were ready to put them in vſe againſt the Iewes. And hereby it is eaſie to coniecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how ſtudious and induſtrious they be in obſeruing the diuine lawes. For notwithſtanding any preſent or imminent feare, yet deſiſted they neuer to offer their ſolemne ſacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Prieſts offered vpon the altar; & notwithſtanding any difficulty or danger of the ſiege that might happen, they B omitted not the courſe of their oblations. For at ſuch time as the temple was taken (in the third moneth, and on a faſting day, in the hundreth ſeuentie nine Olympiade, in the yeere wherin Caius Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Conſuls) the enemy entred the Temple by force, and ſlue thoſe that withſtood them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the Prieſts ceaſed not to exerciſe their accuſtomed ſacrifice: & neither the hazard of their liues, nor the great number of thoſe that were dead, could force them to flie; but that they held it more conuenient for them to indure all things that might happen in attending vpon the Altar, then to tranſgreſſe or vary one iot from their ordinances. And that this may ſeeme to be no fable, or praiſe of their diſſembled deuotion, but the exact & perfect truth, al thoſe that write the Hiſtories concerning Pompey & his acts, doe witneſſe no leſſe: amongſt the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Liuius the Romane C Hiſtoriographer, the moſt famous among the reſt. The greateſt of thoſe towers was battered by theſe engins, & fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cauſe that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The firſt that aſcended the wall, was Cornelius Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla, with his ſouldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with thoſe that followed him, on the other ſide: & thorow the midſt of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a ſtrong ſquadron. The whole circuit was filled with murthers; and ſome of the Iewes died by the Romanes ſwords; other ſome ſlew one another; the reſt caſt themſelues downe headlong from the ſteepie places: many likewiſe ſet fire on their houſes, and conſumed themſelues therein, for feare they ſhould behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelue thouſand Iewes, and very few Romanes. Abſalom al- D ſo, who was Ariſtobulus father in law, and vncle, was taken priſoner. The religion of the Temple likewiſe was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the temple: Pompey and diuers others that accompanied him, entred the ſame, & ſaw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high prieſts onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a ſacred candleſticke, with diuers other veſſels and odoriferous drugs in great quantity; & whereas beſides that, there was about two thouſand talents of ſiluer in the ſacred treaſurie in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reuerence hee had of GOD; and heerein hee behaued himſelfe anſwerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded thoſe that had the charge of the Temple, to purge the ſame, and to offer ſacrifices vnto GOD, according to the law; committing the high Prieſthood to Hircanus hands, both for that he had ſtood him in great ſtead in many things, as for that hee had hindered the Iewes, that were of the countrey, from ioyning themſelues with Ariſtobulus. After this, he beheaded the authors of this warre, and honoured Fauſtus and the reſt with condigne gifts, who with great courage had firſt attempted and aſcended the wall. As for Ieruſalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Iewes thoſe Cities they had conquered in Cœloſyria, & aſſigning them a proper & peculiar gouernment. After this, he incloſed the nation within certaine limits, whereas beforetime their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, hee repaired Gadara, that not long before was deſtroyed: all which he performed in fauour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late ſeruant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azot, Iamnia, and Arethuſa, hee reſtored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were ſituate in the heart of the land: Beſides, Gaza, Ioppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton (cities ſituate vpon the ſea-coaſt, and ruinated beforetimes with diuers warres) he ſet at libertie, and annexed them vnto the prouince. As for the tower of Straton, it was magnificently builded by Herod, and decked with gates and faire Temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cæſarea. Thus Hircanus and Ariſtobulus, through their diſſenſions and ciuill broyles, were the cauſe of that ſeruitude and miſery that fell vpon the Iewes. For we haue loſt our liberty, and haue beene ſubdued by the Romans. Beſides that, we haue beene enforced to ſurrender vp thoſe Cities vnto the Syrians, which we beforetime by force of armes had conquered and SCAVRVS led forth his army against Petra a Citie in Arabia, and for that the Citie might very hardly be besieged, hee spoiled all the countrey round about. When as therefore his army was pressed with famine, Antipater by the commandement of Hircanus, furnished him with corne, and all other necessaries out of Iewry. Who being sent Ambassadour to Aretas from Scaurus, in that hee had sometime soiourned with him, perswaded him to contribute a certaine summe of siluer to warrantize his countrey from pillage; and hee himselfe also became pledge for three hundreth talents. This done, Scaurus finished the warre, according to his desire, and with no lesse contentment to Aretas and his countrey.

ALEXANDER ouercome by GABINIVS, retireth himselfe into a Castle, wherein hee is shut vp and besieged.

The yeere of the world, 3094. before Christs Nativity, 60.

NOT long after this, Alexander Aristobulus sonne, made diuers inroads into Iewry: for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which he atchieued) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, beeing otherwise exercised in building the walles of Ierusalem that were beaten downe by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were in Iewrie hindred him from performing the same. This Alexander trauailing thorow the whole countrey, assembled diuers Iewes; so that in short time, hauing gotten together tenne thousand footemen, & fifteene hundreth horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion neere vnto the Citie of Coreas. Hee fortified Machæron also in the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, hauing sent before him Marcus Antonius accompanied with other Chiefetaines of warre, who armed the Romans of their traine, and the Iewes that were vnder their obedience, whose Captaines were Pitholaus and Malichus. They tooke also those allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage came they to make head against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his troupes. Hereupon Alexander drew more neere with his army towards Ierusalem, where waging battell with the Romans, hee lost about three thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and inuited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And whereas many of his enemies had encamped themselues before the Fort, the Romanes charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adiudged to haue behaued himselfe very valiantly, in that he slew diuers of his enemies. Gabinius left a part of his Army in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof, he might goe and visit the countrey of Iudæa: hee commanded therefore all those Cities, which in his iourney he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired: for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with diuers others, were new builded: so that through the obedience that was giuen to Gabinius command, it came to passe that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had laine long time before desart.

Whilst therefore he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Embassadors vnto him demanding pardon at his hand for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of Hircania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion; which Gabinius leuelled with the ground. And whereas Alexanders mother came vnto him (who fauoured the Romane faction, and whose husband husband and children were kept prisoners in Rome) she obtained all that which she requested at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly disposed of her affaires, he led Hircanus to Ierusalem to take charge of the temple and Priesthood. He ordained also fiue iudgement seats and places of session, and diuided the prouince into answerable parts: for the one answered in Ierusalem; the second at Gadara; the third in Amatha; the fourth at Ierico; and the fift at Saphora; which is a towne of Galilee. By this meanes the Iewes were deliuered of their Monarchie; and liued vnder an Aristocracie, or gouernment of the Nobilitie.

ARISTOBVLVS escapeth out of prison, and flieth from Rome, and is apprehended againe by GABINIVS in Iudæa, and led backe prisoner to Rome.

BVT Aristobulus flying from Rome, returned into Iewrie, and determined to reedifie the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruinated. Against him Gabinius sent out certaine men of warre with their Captaines, namely Sisenna, Antonius and Seruilius, both to keepe him from the possession of the place, as to apprehend and surprize him likewise. For many Iewes resorted vnto him, being drawne thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had: who desired likewise to worke innouations. Pitholaus also (who was established Lieutenant Generall in Ierusalem) of his owne accord came vnto him, with a thousand men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the most part were not sufficiently furnished with armes; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Machæron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed, and were vnapt for any execution, and retaining onely eight thousand wel armed men, he tooke the field and marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and ouertaking him, fought desperately with him, and ouercame both him and his, notwithstanding their valiant resist. Beeing therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, & about fiue thousand of them were slaine; and the rest dispersed, wandring here and there, sought for their owne priuate securities: but Aristobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thousand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affaires had very slender successe; yet lost he not his hope: but after he had endured the siege some two daies, and receiued many wounds, he was taken prisoner, and with his son Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away captiue by Gabinius. Such was the aduenture of Aristobulus; that he was sent prisoner backe againe to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had beene King and his Priest three yeeres, and sixe moneths. A man in that dignity both magnificent and magnanimous: yet did the Senate send backe his children (according to the tenor of Gabinius letters) who had promised their deliuery to their mother, at such time as shee surrendred the Castles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Iewry. But Gabinius, intending to make warre against the Parthians, and hauing already past Euphrates, changed his resolution, and determined to returne into Egypt, and reestablished Ptolomey, as it is declared in an other place. In this expedition also he was furnished by Antipaters meanes, with victuals, money and munition; and by his aduice, those Iewes that inhabite Pelusium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were drawne into his society. When as therefore Gabinius returned backe out for Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult & rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus sonne, taking once more possession of the Kingdome, caused diuers Iewes from day to day to reuolt; and forraging the countrey with a huge army, he slew all those Romanes whom he met withall, and besieged all those that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinius seeing the affaires of Syria in that estate, sent Antipater before him vnto them to appease these commotions, and to heale them of their frenzie, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was a man of good discretion. In effect, he repairing vnto them, moderated diuers of them, and brought them vnder obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander, for he hauing thirty thousand souldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was ouercome, with the losse of some ten thousand of his men, neere vnto the mount Itabyr.

Crassvs intending to make warre against the Parthians, came into Iewry, and tooke away with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the summe of two thousand talents: He spoiled the temple also of all the gold that was in the same, to the summe of 8000. talents. Furthermore, he bare away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of three hundreth pounds, which pound amongst the Iewes containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that deliuered him this ingot, was a Prieſt, and the keeper of the sacred treasure, called Eleazar, who gaue him the same vpon no malicious intent (for he was a vertuous and iust man) but whereas he had the custodie of the tapestries of the temple, committed to his hands (which both were admirable to behold, by reason of their beautie and esteeme, & withall were in like sort tied aud fastned to his beame) and perceiuing that Crassus sought all the meanes that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing lest he should haue seized on all the ornaments of the temple, gaue him this beame for a ransome to redeeme all the rest: binding him vpon the deliuerie thereof by an oath, that hee should not take any thing away that was in the temple, but should content himselfe with that onely piece of great esteeme and value, which he gaue him. This beame was inclosed in another hollow became of wood; so that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Crassus therefore tooke this beame, as if he determined to leaue all other things in the tẽple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and carried away whatsoeuer was therein. Neither is it to bee wondred at, that there was so great riches found in our temple, sith all those Iewes that were dispersed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all those that feared God (both in Asia and in Europe) for a long time offered their presents in that place. The greatnesse and multitude whereof wanteth no testimonie: neither is it fained in way of ostentation, but diuers other Historians make mention thereof: and amongst the rest, Strabo of Cappadocia speaketh after his manner: And Mithridates sent men into the Ile of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that Queene Cleopatra had laid vp there, and eight hundreth talents of the Iewes. But we haue no publique money, but that which is dedicated vnto God. It is therefore a thing most manifest, that the Iewes that inhabit Asia, transported this money into Coos for the feare that they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they, who inhabited Iudæa, and had a Citie so stroug, and a temple so well defenced, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Iewes remaining in Alexandria should doe it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this warre of Mithridates. The same Stabo also saith in another place, that at such time as Sylla passed thorow Greece to make warre against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent men to Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and saith thus: There were foure sorts of people in the Citie of the Cyrenians: One of them were Citizens; the second were Labourers; the third were Soiourners; and the fourth were Iewes, who at this present are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, neither was there any nation that inhabit the same, wherein these haue not set foote and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being vnder the subiection of the same Princes) and diuers other regions, conformed themselues to their customes, and nourished assemblies of Iewes, and aduanced them, and more and more vsed the Iewish ordinances. It appeareth therefore that there was a colony of Iewes in Egypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the Citie is assigned to this nation. They haue likewise their peculiar magistrate, who gouerneth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if hee gouerned in his owne common-weale. By this meanes, this nation hath fortified and established it selfe in Ægypt, for that the Iewes had their originall amongst the Ægyptians, and for that Iudæa is neere vnto Egypt, from whence the Iewes are descended: And as touching Cyrene, they haue entred it, in that it confineth that countrey, which is vnder the obedience of the Ægyptians (in like maner as Iudæa doth) or rather for that in times past it appertained to the same kingdome. Thus farre Strabo.

After that Crassus had disposed all things according to his owne pleasure, hee dislodged and marched forward to make warre against the Parthians, where both he and all his army were destroyed (as it is declared in another place.) As for Cassius, he retired himselfe into Syria, and tooke possession thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians; who being proud of their victorie lately

A lately obtained, made excurſions ſo farre: and comming to Tyre, hee finally arriued in Iudæa, where vpon his firſt entrance hee tooke the Citie of Tarichæa, and led away from thence thirty thouſand priſoners. He put Pitholaus alſo to death, for that he maintained Ariſtobulus faction. This Antipater alſo made alliance with other Princes, and eſpecially with the Arabian, to whoſe cuſtody he committed his children, during the time he made warre againſt Ariſtobulus. AFTER Pompeys death, and that victory which Cæſar had obtained againſt him, Antipater (Gouernour of Iudæa by the commandement of Hircanus) was very profitable vnto Cæſar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certaine ſupplies, and could not bring them on, by reaſon of an arme of Nilus paſſing thorow Peluſium; but was conſtrained to ſtay at Aſcalon: Antipater came vnto him, and brought with him three thouſand ſouldiers, and ſo dealt with the Princes of Arabia to aſſociate them with Cæſar, that by his meanes, all they of Syria gaue him their aſſiſtance, and neuer altered their affection that they bare vnto Cæſar. Theſe were Iamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his ſonne; and Tholomæus the ſonne of Sohemus, dwelling on the mount of Libanus, and welny all the Cities. Mitnridates being departed from Syria, came to Peluſium, where being repulſed and excluded by the Citizens, he beſieged the Citie. Antipater in this warre behaued himſelfe valiantly, and after he had beaten downe a pane of the wall, he firſt of all ſet forward to enter the Citie. Whileſt Peluſium was in this eſtate, the Iewes that inhabited Ægypt in the countrey of Onias, would neither grant paſſage to Antipater, nor Mithridates that marched towards Cæſar. The conflict of the Ægyptians with Mithridates at Delta. Alias cap. 18.

WHEN hee was come to a place called Delta, hee fought with his enemies in a place, which is called The campe of the Iewes: in which battell Mithridates led the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handy blowes, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfited, had not Antipater (running with his souldiers along the banke of the riuer) obtained the vpper hand of his enemies, by putting the Ægyptians that were conquerors to flight, and restoring Mithridates. And so long pursued he them, that he got their campe, and called backe Mithridates, who chased the Ægyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that hee had recouered from the fugitiue enemy. In this fight there fell eight hundreth on the enemies side, and fiftie on Antipaters. Afterwards, Mithridates wrote hereof vnto Cæsar, and certified him that Antipater was cause of the victory, and their preseruation: so that Cæsar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his warre he made vse of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts: Whereby it came to passe that Antipater was grieuously wounded in diuers fights.

Now after that the warre was finished, Cæsar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hircanus to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Diuers men report that Hircanus, himselfe was an agent in this warre, and that he came into Ægypt: whereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, speaking after this manner by the authoritie of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entred Ægypt, with Hircanus the high Priest of the Iewes. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authoritie of Hypsicrates, that Mithridates issued alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared three thousand souldiers, because he was Gouernour of Iudæa, and incouraged the rest of the Gouernours; and Hircanus the high Priest also had a part in this warre. Thus farre Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne, to Cæsar, lamenting vnto him the inconuenient that had befalne his father, and how hee was slaine by poyson in his seruice, and how his brother had his head strooken off by Scipio; beseeching him to haue compassion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the kingdome. He K accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannicall and violent gouernment ouer their nation, and iniuries offered to himselfe. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himselfe in those points wherein he was accused; declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himselfe how much hee had trauelled, and how many exploits he had executed in the late warre, whereof Cæsar himselfe was a witnesse. Moreouer, he auowed that Aristobulus had beene iustly led twice into captiuitie to Rome, for that he had bin alwaies an enemy, and no waies well affectioned towards the Romanes. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, hee auerred that he was iustly punished by him, for his Larcinies, and not iniuriously and outragiously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hircanus high Priest, and gaue Antipater any gouernment whatsoeuer best him liked: who according to his choice, was appointed Prefect in Iudæa.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 17. al. 18. Hircanus by Cæsars permission repaireth the wals of Ierusalem. The Senates Decree as touching their league with the Iewes.

MOREOVER Cæsar permitted Hircanus to repaire the walles of Ierusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten them downe, they lay leuelled with the earth; and he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that this Decree should be registred in the Capitol. The example of which ordinance of the Senate containeth matter to this effect: Lucius Vaderius the sonne of Lucius the Pretor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the temple of Concord the 13. day of December) in the presence of L. Caponius the sonne of Lucius, and Caius Papyrius Quirinus; the requests made by Alexander the son of Iason, Numenius the sonne of Antiochus, and Alexander the sonne of Dorotheus, Embassadours in the behalfe of the Iewes, men of good regard, and our allies, and proposed by them in renuing the ancient fauours they haue receiued from the Romanes: and in testimony of the confederation; haue brought vs a viall and buckler of gold of fifty thousand crownes price; requiring our letters might be giuen them, addressed to the free Cities and the kings our confederates, to grant them passage thorow their countries and ports with all security, and without any offence. And we haue thought good to make friendship and alliance with them, and to grant them all that which they require, in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was high Priest and Prince, and in the ninth yeere of his princedome, in the month of Iuly.

Hircanus was in like sort honored by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendships that they receiued at his hands. They sent him also a decree which they ratified in his behalfe, the tenor whereof ensueth: The yeere wherein Dionysius the sonne of Asclepiades was Gouernour, and priest, in the moneth of Iuly, and on the 20. day this arrest or decree of the Athenians was deliuered to the gouernours by the Pretor Agathocles. Eucles the sonne of Menander the Alimusian hath written in the eleuenth of March in the assembly generall; and placed it in the Theater, and the suffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the high priest, with the chiefe assistants of the people. Dionysius the sonne of Dionysius published the same: Since that Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high Priest and Prince of the Iewes, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in especiall towards euery Citizen of Athens, and hath shewed them many friendships, receiuing with all humanity those Athenians that come vnto him, whether they resort thither as Embassadors, or for any other particular occasion whatsoeuer, and sendeth them backe after they haue prouided them of safe-conduct, whereof we haue heretofore had testimony by the report of Theodosius, the son of Theodorus Simeus; who hath made recitall vnto the people of his worthinesse, and of the will he hath to doe vs all the good that is possible. We haue thought good to honour him by sending him a crowne of gold in testimony of his courtesies, according to our custome and law; and by erecting a brazen statue vnto him in the temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our will is also that this be proclaimed by a Herauld in the Theater, during the Bacchanals, and at such time as the new Tragedies are plaide. Likewise in the solemnities Panathean and Eleusynian, and at the publike exercises: wee will also that the Gouernours prouide, that all that which we haue aduised for the honour, fauour, affection and good will toward this man, as he hath well deserued, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appeare how our nation reward, and entertaine such men as are vertuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart vnto him, may prouoke others to be the better affected toward vs. It is likewise decreed, that amongst all the Athenians there be certen Embassadours chosen, who shall beare this Decree vnto him, and exhort him to doe whatsoeuer is profitable for our common good, seeing himselfe so much honoured by vs. Let this suffice to expresse the honours bestowed on Hircanus by the people of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

Hircanus honoured by the Athenians.

After that Cæsar had giuen order for the affaires of Syria, hee returned backe by sea. And as soone as Antipater had brought Cæsar out of Syria, he returned into Iudæa, and sodainly builded vp the walles which were before time defaced by Pompey; and in riding circuit about the countrey, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces; but by counsailes also which he gaue euery one to liue in peace; certifying them that if they submitted themselues to Hircanus their Prince, they should liue happily, and enioy their possessions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to aduance themselues by any new commotion (supposing by that meanes to profit themselues some way) they should feele that in stead of a gouernor, they had a master; and in stead of a king, they should finde Hircanus a tyrant; and in stead of the Romans and Cæsar to be their gouernors, they should feele and find them to be their most hatefull enemies, for that they would not suffer, that any thing should be altered that they had established. By these and such like admonitions, he kept and continued all the countrey in peace.

CHAP. XVII.

ANTIPATER committeth the gouernment of Galilee to his sonne HEROD, and that of Ierusalem to PHASÆLVS his other sonne: and how SEXTVS CÆSAR aduanceth HEROD to great honours and dignities.

ANTIPATER perceiuing that Hircanus was slow and idle, he declared and appointed Phasælus his eldest sonne gouernour ouer Ierusalem, and the countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for hee was not at that time aboue fifteene yeeres olde) he committed Galilee vnto his charge: who although he were young in yeeres, yet did not his tender age any waies preiudice him, because hee was of a noble spirit, and found out this sodaine occasion to expresse that vertue that was in him. For hauing apprehended Ezechias, who was the Prince of those theeues, who ranged ouer all Syria a long time with a great troupe of outlawes, he put him to death with diuers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that meanes he rid their countrey of all those robbers, according as they desired. He was therfore praised thorow the villages, & Cities for this act, as he that had giuen them peace, and assured possession of their estates. For this cause he was made knowne to Sextus Cæsar, who was vncle to Cæsar the great. Furthermore his brother Phasælus was incited to follow his noble actions, and inforced himselfe to obtaine no lesse reputation then he had; for which cause he stroue to get the good will of the common people in Ierusalem, and gouerned the city with such discretion, that he acted all things to each mans content, and abused not his power to any priuat mans iniury: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no lesse respect then if he had beene their onely Lord and Soueraigne. Yet did not this eminency of estate so farre distract him, that he forgot the loue and duty he ought to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding diuers of the greatest amongst the Iewes (seeing Antipater and his sonnes so highly aduanced both by the publike fauour of the whole nation, as also by the reuenues, that they drew both out of Iewry, as also by the emploiment of Hircanus money) were grieuously incensed against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperors of Rome, and hauing perswaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same vnto himselfe, sending it not in Hircanus name, but in his owne; which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not mooued therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the Princes of the Iewes was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who gouerned after a royall and tyrannicall manner: For this cause they addressed themselues to Hircanus, and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) wil you dissemble and winke at those things that are daily practised? see you not that Antipater and his sons possesse in effect the royall power and authority of the kingdome, and that you haue onely the name? Assure your selfe that you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your selfe and your kingdome. For Antipater and his sonnes are not now your substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your countries good (whatsoeuer your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and Commanders. For Herod (Antipaters son) hath already put Ezechias and his complices to death, & thereby transgressed our lawes, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soeuer hee be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the councell: and notwithstanding this, hee hath been so bold, as to doe iustice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slaine, had incensed him by their continuall exclamations in the temple, exhorting the King and people to call Herod to account before the councell of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus mooued by these women, called Herod to answer vnto those accusations which were obiected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himselfe after the manner of a priuate person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconuenients. After therefore he had taken order for the affaires in Galilee (according as he thought meet in his owne discretion) & that he himselfe was sufficiently accompanied to make his voiage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leaue himselfe vnsecured in danger, he resorted to Ierusalem. Furthermore, Sextus Cæsar Gouernour of Syria wrote vnto Hircanus to absolue him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so bee hee should performe the contrary; which gaue Hircanus occasion to deliuer Herod in despite of the councell and their intent; the rather also for that hee loued him as intirely as his sonne. When as therefore Herod presented himselfe before the councell with his retinue, all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speake one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to doe. Now whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, a certaine man called Sameas, who was of vpright conuersation, and for this cause was not distracted with feare, arose and spake to his effect: Drad King, and you honourable assistants, I could neuer yet remember, that euer any man which was called in question to defend his cause before vs, hath appeared in this equipage; and I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath euer happened: but whosoeuer commeth into this place to receiue iudgement, hee presenteth himselfe with humilitie and feare, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, hauing his haire long, and his garment blacke: but this gallant Herod accused of murther (and for this occasion called before vs) who could imagine that he should appeare before vs in a purple robe, hauing his haires trimmed, and besides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent

that if we condemne him, according to law, he may put vs to death without law, that after hee hath violated all right, he might eſcape and ſaue himſelfe. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law: but I accuſe both you and the King, who haue giuen him ſuch aſſurance. Know therefore, that there is a ſoueraigne God, that will one day puniſh both you and the King, and him whom you will deliuer by the Kings meanes. And ſo generally fell it out as hee had ſaid: For as ſoone as Herod had obtained the kingdome, hee put all thoſe of the councell to death, and Hircanus himſelfe likewiſe, onely Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great eſtimation, becauſe of his wiſedome and iuſtice, and becauſe that at ſuch time as the Citie was beſieged by Herod and Soſius, Sameas perſwaded the people to receiue Herod, telling them that by reaſon of their ſinnes and offences, they might not eſcape from him; whereof we will ſpeake in place conuenient. Hircanus perceiuing that the Iudges were inclined to condemne Herod, deferred the ſentence till the next day, and ſent ſecretly vnto Herod, counſelling him to flie out of the Citie, aſſuring him that there was no other meanes to ſaue his life. Thus poſted he to Damaſco (as if he had fled from the Kings preſence) and preſenting himſelfe before Sextus Cæſar, after hee had aſſured his perſon, hee reſolued with himſelfe, that if the councell ſhould call him once more to his anſwer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the councell were diſpleaſed with Hircanus, and laboured to perſwade him, that all theſe things tended to his deſtruction: which hee well perceiued, yet knew hee not what to doe, he was ſo negligent and voide of foreſight.
